found Roman ſpoils taken from Varus and his ſlaughtered legions, and divided among thoſe who were now priſoners. Arminius being now put to flight, Segeſtes thought it his duty to wait upon his deliverer; and accordingly, from a confidence in his ſincere attachment to the Roman intereſt, he appeared before Germanicus, without betraying the leaſt fear, and, addreſſing him with a majeſtic air, enumerated, with great modeſty, the ſervices he had rendered the republic, which had drawn upon him the hatred of Arminius; offered his mediation for the German nation, if they perhaps would rather chuſe to repent than be deſtroyed; and earneſtly recommended to his known clemency his ſon and daughter, intreating him to forgive the former the error he had been guilty of in his youth, more out of imprudence than malice, and to conſider the latter rather as the daughter of Segeſtes than the wife of Arminius. Germanicus answered with his uſual good-nature and humanity, promiſing to take his ſon, daughter, and all his relations under his protection, aſſigned to him a ſafe retreat in one of the neighbouring provinces long ſince ſubject to Rome, and then returned with the army to his former camp, where the wife of Arminius was delivered of a male child (A)^k.

In the mean time, Arminius, more enraged than ever for the loſs of his wife, whom he tenderly loved, and the fate of his child doomed to be born in captivity, flew about the country of the Cheruſci, inflaming that warlike nation againſt Segeſtes and Germanicus, and encouraging them to let Arminius rather lead them to liberty and glory, than the wicked and treacherous Segeſtes to infamy and bondage. His credit, and the bitter inveſtives he was conſtantly uttering againſt the Romans, roused not only the Cheruſci, but all the neighbouring nations; nay, Inquiomerus, one of the chief lords of the country, and hitherto a friend to the Romans and in high credit with them, though uncle to Arminius by the father's ſide, was drawn into the confederacy, and prevailed upon to declare for his nephew, and join him with all his friends and dependents. Germanicus, upon intelligence of ſo powerful a confederacy, that he might not be obliged to engage ſuch numerous forces united, reſolved to make a di- verſion; and with this view detached Cæcina at the head of forty Roman cohorts to the river Amiſia, now the Ems, through the territories of the Brueteri. The cavalry took another rout, under the conduct of Pedo (B), who led them by the confines of the Friſians (C). As for Germanicus himſelf, he imbarqued the four remaining legions on a neighbouring lake, and transported them on rivers and canals to the place appointed for the general rendezvous on the banks of the Amiſia, where the three ſeparate bodies met. The Chauci, as the legions paſſed through their country, joined them: the Brueteri, upon the approach of Germanicus, attempted to ſet fire to their houſes and retire; but were reſtrained by Stertinius, who was detached againſt them. That commander had the good luck to find in the country of the Brueteri the eagle of the nineteenth legion loſt in the overthrow of Varus. The army, now united, purſued their march to the fartheſt borders of the Brueteri, and laid waſte the whole country between the rivers Luppias and Amiſia, that is, the Lyppe and the Ems. As the foreſt of Teutoburgium (D) was not far off, where the bones of Varus and the three legions

(A) Tacitus tells us, that this child was brought up at Ravenna, and promiſes to relate in a more proper place the miſfortune which beſel him. The fathers Catrou and Rouillé, in their Roman hiſtory, make the ſame promiſe. If Tacitus performed his, it was in his books which have not reached our times. We ſhall therefore be the more obliged to thoſe learned writers for the performance of theirs; for we know nothing of this unhappy captive or his miſfortunes.

(B) It is uncertain whether Pedo, mentioned here by Tacitus, was Pedo Albinovanus, or Pedo Pompeius. Seneca ſpeaks of the latter as a perſon of great merit (32), and Ovid commends the former as an excellent poet. Some fragments of his book intituled De navigatione Germanici, have reached our times (33). The elegy he wrote on the death of Drufus and inſcribed to Livia is a maſter-piece of the kind, and worthy of a heavenly poet, as Ovid ſtyles him

(34). Joſeph Scaliger aſcribes to him the elegy on the death of Mecænas, wherein he diſagrees with moſt other critics. Voffius ſuppoſes him to have written alſo epigrams, which he gathers from one of Martial's (35).

(C) The country of the Friſii was divided into two, called the Greater and the Leſſer. The former lay between the mouths of the Rhine and the Weſer. The latter extended along the coaſt of the ocean on the oppoſite ſide of the Rhine; but how far, we cannot determine.

(D) The foreſt of Teutoburgium, now Teuteberg, lay in Weſtphalia, between the Ems and the Lyppe. The preſent inhabitants pretend to ſhew the very ſpot where Varus with his legions were cut off. It is a plain in the neighbourhood of a ſmall town called Horn, and is known by the name of Winſeldt, which it took, they ſuppoſe, from the Germans winning the field.

legions slaughtered with him were said to lie still unburied, Germanicus, touched with a tender compassion on their unhappy fate, resolved to march thither and pay them the last offices. Accordingly Cæcina was sent before to clear the way, to examine the avenues leading to the forest, and lay bridges over marshy places. The rest of the army followed, and, marching in good order and with great caution, entered the gloomy forest, where they soon discovered the ruins of two Roman camps, the one very spacious and capable of containing three legions, the other much less in circumference, which, they concluded, had served for a place of retreat for the small number of legionaries, who had escaped the first day's slaughter. The ramparts of both were half ruined; and the ditches near filled up. The open fields were covered with bleached bones, some separate, some in heaps, as those unhappy men had happened to fall flying singly, or resisting in bodies. In the adjacent groves were seen still standing the altars, where the barbarians had sacrificed to their gods the tribunes and chief centurions, whom they had made prisoners. On the trees surrounding the altars were stuck the skulls of those unhappy victims. In Germanicus's army there were some who had served under Varus, and had the good luck to escape the general slaughter; and these related the particulars of that tragical event to the rest. Here, said they, the commanders of our legions were slain; there our eagles were taken: here Varus received his first wound; there he fell by his own hand: in that place stood the tribunal, whence Arminius harangued his men; in this he caused gibbets to be erected for the execution of his captives, &c. So many doleful objects awakened in the hearts of the Romans and their commander a tender compassion for the fate of their countrymen, friends, and comrades, and at the same time an eager desire of appeasing their manes, with the slaughter of an enemy so cruel and inhuman. With these sentiments they first carefully gathered the bones scattered up and down the fields; and, having dug a deep trench, buried them there six years after the slaughter, Germanicus laying the first turf on the common tomb (E). Having thus paid the last offices to their friends, they abandoned that solitude dismal to their sight and memory, and, full of resentment, advanced against the author of so many evils, who, understanding that he was pursued by Germanicus, retired, and incamped in an advantageous post close to the woods. The Roman general followed him, and coming up with him, ordered his cavalry to advance and dislodge him. Arminius, at the approach of the Roman horse, pretended to fly; but wheeling suddenly about, and at the same time giving the signal to a body of troops, which he had concealed in the forest, to rush out, he fell upon the enemy with such vigor, that the Roman cavalry, not able to stand the shock, began to give way. Germanicus immediately detached some cohorts to their relief; but they too were soon put in disorder and broken, more by their own men who fled, than by the enemy. Arminius, taking advantage of the confusion the Romans were in, doubled his efforts, and would have pushed them into a morass, had not Germanicus advanced at the head of his legions in order of battle. Arminius, finding his men already tired, did not think it advisable to engage the fresh legions, and therefore retired in good order, leaving the Romans masters of the field. Germanicus, not judging it safe to pursue the enemy through pathless woods and forests, contented himself with this small advantage, and returned with the army to the river Amisia. There he imbarqued with four legions, ordered Cæcina to reconduct the other four by land, and sent the cavalry to the sea-side,

They advance against Arminius.

Who at first gains some advantage; but in the end is defeated.

(E) Tiberius did not approve of this pious office performed by Germanicus and his army. Whether it was, says Tacitus, that he put a bad construction upon every action of Germanicus, or believed, that the sight of so many Romans slain by the enemy, and left thus unburied, might sink the courage of his men, and heighten their terror of so dreadful a foe. Besides, Germanicus was a member of the college of the augurs, and of the priests sacred to the deity of Augustus, and, as such, ought not, according to the ancient rites, to have been any ways concerned in the ceremonies and solemnities of the dead, since by them pontiffs, augurs, and priests of all denominations, were thought to be defiled. Hence Augustus, who was pontifex maximus, pronounced the funeral oration of Marcellus with a veil between him and the corps, as Suetonius informs us, that he might not be polluted with the sight of it. Plutarch tells us, that Sylla divorced his wife Metella a little before she died, and caused her to be conveyed into another house, that his own, as he was then pontifex and augur, might not be defiled with funeral ceremonies (36). But we are apt to believe, that Tiberius did not, out of any principle of religion, find fault with Germanicus's conduct; for he little mattered the gods or their rites, being himself a fatalist, and possessed with notions of astrology. What displeased him was, that Germanicus, by so popular an action, had gained the hearts of the soldiery and Roman people.

side, with orders to march along the shore to the Rhine. Tho' Cæcina was to return through roads well known, yet Germanicus warned him to pass with all possible speed the causeway called the long bridges (F). Cæcina made what haste he could; but nevertheless Arminius arrived there before him. This causeway led cross vast marshes, surrounded on all sides with woods and hills, which gently rose from the plain. The woods Arminius had already filled with his men, who, as soon as Cæcina approached, rushing out, fell upon him with such fury, that the legions, not able to manage their arms in the deep waters and slippery ground, were already yielding, and would in all likelihood have been entirely defeated, had not night coming on soon put an end to the combat. The Germans, encouraged with their success, instead of refreshing themselves with sleep, employed the whole night in diverting the courses of the springs rising in the neighbouring mountains, and turning them into the plains; so that the camp, which the Romans had begun, was all on a sudden laid under water, and their works overturned. We may well imagine what a melancholy night they passed under these circumstances. We are told, that Cæcina himself was terrified with a frightful dream: he thought he saw Quintilius Varus rising out of the marsh besmeared with blood, stretching forth his hand, and calling upon him; but that he rejected the invitation, and pushed him away. Cæcina had served either as a common soldier, or as an officer, forty years, was well experienced in all the vicissitudes of war, and thence undaunted even in the greatest dangers. Having therefore calmly weighed with himself all proper expedients for the present conjuncture, he at length resolved to attack the barbarians the next day, to drive them to their woods, and there keep them in a manner besieged, till the baggage and the wounded men had passed the causeway, and were out of the enemy's reach. With this view at break of day he drew up his legions, placing the fifth in the right wing, the one-and-twentieth in the left, the first in the van, and the twentieth in the rear. But the legions posted on the wings, seized with a sudden fear, as soon as day began to appear, deserted their stations, and took possession of a field beyond the marshes. Cæcina thought it adviseable to follow them; but the baggage sticking in the mire, as he crossed the marshes, and the soldiers about it being embarrassed and in great disorder, Arminius laid hold of this opportunity to begin the attack; and crying out, This is a second Varus; the same fate attends him and his legions, he rushed upon them at the head of a chosen body with a fury hardly to be expressed. As he had ordered his men to aim chiefly at the enemy's horses, great numbers of them were killed, and the ground becoming slippery with their blood and the slime of the marsh, the rest either fell, or casting their riders and galloping among the ranks, put them into disorder. Cæcina on this occasion distinguished himself in a very eminent manner; but his horse being killed under him, he would have been taken prisoner, had not the first legion rescued him. The greediness of the enemy was what saved Cæcina and his legions from utter destruction; for while they were already yielding and quite spent, the barbarians all on a sudden abandoned them to seize the baggage. The Romans, during this respite, struggled out of the marsh, and gaining the dry fields, tired as they were, formed with all possible speed a camp there, and fortified it in the best manner they could.

AND now the legionaries, quite spent and exhausted, retired to repose themselves a while after so fatiguing a combat. But their repose was soon interrupted by an accident, which, as it caused a general alarm in the camp, shews what fear and terror had seized them. A horse having broken loose and being frightened with the noise, as he strayed about, ran over some who were in his way. As this happened when it was dark, it raised such a consternation among the legionaries, imagining that the Germans had broke into the camp, that they all ran to the gate Decumana, which was farthest from the enemy, in order to make their escape. Cæcina, having learned the true cause of this general uproar, endeavoured to stop the fugitives, assuring them, that

(F) Tacitus tells us, that this causeway was made by Lucius Domitius, who, according to that writer, led an army over the Elbe, and advanced farther into Germany than any Roman before him, which procured him the ensigns of triumph. Whence we conclude him to have been the grandfather of Nero; for Suetonius, in his life of that emperor, tells us, that Lucius Domitius his grandfather was no less famous for his dexterity in driving chariots, than for the triumphal ornaments which he acquired by his conduct in the German war (37). This causeway, according to Lipsius, led cross the marshes between Lingen, Wedden, and Coe-verden, where some remains of it are still lying under water. These marches are now known to the Dutch by the name of Bretan-scheheyde, that is, the marshes of Bretan (38).

that their fear was quite groundless ; but none of them hearkening to him, he flung himself at length cross the gate. The awe and respect they had for their general restrained them from running over his body, and put a stop to their flight ; and, in the mean time, the tribunes and centurions satisfied them, that it was a false alarm. Then Cæcina, calling them together, told them, that they must be indebted for their lives to their valour ; but that their valour ought to be tempered with art ; that they must keep close within their camp till the Germans attempted to storm it, and then make a sudden sally, break through the enemy, and pursue their march to the Rhine. This, he told them, was the only means of retrieving their glory, of saving their lives. In the mean time, it was resolved in the German camp, pursuant to the advice of Inguiomerus, to attack the Roman entrenchments the next morning, no-body doubting, except Arminius, but they might be easily forced. That commander, no less prudent than brave, was for suffering the Romans quietly to depart, and falling upon them on their march, when embarrassed again amongst forests and marshes. But the advice of Inguiomerus prevailing, as soon as it was light, the Germans beset the camp, and having filled the ditches, were already climbing up the ramparts, when Cæcina ordered the signal to be given to the cohorts, who, sallying out with loud shouts, fell upon the aggressors, and made a dreadful slaughter of them, while they were busy in scaling the entrenchments. The Germans, who imagined that few Romans were remaining, and had therefore promised themselves an easy victory, were so surprised and frightened at this sudden and altogether unexpected attack, that they immediately betook themselves to a shameful flight. The Romans pursued them, and made a dreadful slaughter of the fugitives. Arminius had the good luck to escape unhurt ; but Inguiomerus was dangerously wounded. After this the Germans, as destitute of conduct in distress, as void of moderation in prosperity, appeared no more ; so that Cæcina pursued his march unmolested to the *Rhine*¹.

In the mean time, a report being spread, that the Roman forces were cut in pieces, and a German army in full march to invade Gaul, some timorous partizans of Rome were for breaking down the bridge which the Romans had built over the Rhine near Treves ; but Agrippina, who still continued in that city, not giving credit to the public report, opposed with a manly courage the execution of this design, and preserved the bridge. She had soon after the satisfaction to see the legions under Cæcina, which were supposed to have met with the same fate as those of Varus, arrive, ill-treated indeed and extremely fatigued, but victorious. As they drew near, this undaunted heroine went out with her son Caligula to receive them ; and, standing at the head of the bridge, commended, as they passed, their gallant behaviour, and returned them thanks for it in a most obliging manner ; nay, in the absence of her husband, she discharged all the duties of a general, relieved the necessities of the soldiers, bestowed medicines on the wounded, supplied some with cloaths, and to all extended the effects of her unbounded generosity. This behaviour, however commendable, roused the jealousy of Tiberius : It is not, said he, against foreigners only that she thus studies to win the affections of the soldiery ; she has already given manifest proofs of her aspiring views, in carrying her child, the general's son, about the camp in the habit of a common soldier, with the title of Cæsar Caligula. Sejanus, who was well acquainted with the distrustful temper of Tiberius, and already entertained ambitious designs, which he could not compass without the destruction of Germanicus's family, with his groundless and ill-natured suggestions, heightened the emperor's jealousies, and sowed in his mind the seeds of an irreconcilable hatred against Agrippina.

In the mean time, Germanicus, having conveyed the four legions he had with him down the Amisia into the ocean, in order to return by sea to the Rhine, and finding that his vessels were overloaded, delivered the second and fourteenth legions to Publius Vitellius, one of his lieutenants, with orders to reconduct them by land. But this march proved fatal to great numbers of them, either buried in the quick-sands, or swallowed up by the billows and overflowing tide, to which they were utter strangers. Those who escaped lost their arms, utensils, and provisions, and passed a melancholy night on an eminence, which they had gained wading up to the chin. The next morning the land returning with the tide of ebb, Vitellius with a hasty march reached the river Ufingis, which some judicious critics take for the Hoerenster, on which stands the present city of Groeningen. There Germanicus, who had reached that that river with his fleet, took the two legions again on board, and conveyed them^a to the mouth of the Rhine, whence they all returned to the city of the Ubii, or Cologne, when fame had given them for lost. Germanicus on his arrival found in that city Sigimerus, the brother of Segestes, with his son Sesithacus, who, having renounced the confederacy of their countrymen, were come to implore the clemency of the Romans, and enter into an alliance with them. The father, though one of the chief authors of the revolt, was kindly received by Germanicus; but it was with much ado that he prevailed upon himself to pardon the son, who was said to have insulted the dead body of the unfortunate Varus. In this expedition Germanicus gained no great advantages, and lost a vast number of men. The greater part of those, who had escaped so many dangers, returned without arms, horses, utensils, &c. half-naked,^b lamed, and unfit for the service; but the fame of his name and amiable qualities having already filled both the Gauls, Spain, and Italy, the inhabitants of these countries strove who should be most forward in supplying him with arms, horses, money, and whatever else was necessary for the prosecution of the war. Germanicus thanked them for their zeal; but accepted only the horses and arms, defraying the other charges of the war with his own money. We shall soon see what success attended him in this war: but let us return, in the mean time, to Tiberius.

Tiberius affects popularity by various methods.

THOUGH the jealous emperor repined at the glory of the brave Germanicus, yet, glad of his success, he confirmed to him the title of imperator, which the legions had bestowed on him, and decreed the triumphal ornaments to Aulus Cæcina, Lucius Apronius, and Caius Silius, three of his lieutenants, who had distinguished themselves above the rest. To gain to himself the affections of the people, which seemed to centre wholly in Germanicus, he affected popularity, rejecting the pompous titles offered him by the senate, relieving the distressed with great generosity, and easing the inhabitants both of Rome and the provinces of several taxes, with which Augustus had burdened them. A senator, by name Pius Aurelius, his house falling, had recourse to the senate for relief. The prætors of the treasury opposed his suit; but nevertheless Tiberius, who, as Tacitus observes, was generous upon honest occasions, even after he had renounced all other virtues, ordered him the price of his house. Propertius Celer, once prætor, desiring to resign the senatorial dignity, as too burdensome to his small estate, Tiberius, upon information that his misfortunes were owing to his father, and not to himself, presented him with a thousand great sesterces. The Tiber having overflowed the lower parts of the city, he caused the bed of that river to be cleaned, and appointed according to Dion five, according to Tacitus only two, magistrates of the senatorial order, whose whole business was to watch the overflowing of the Tiber, and restrain it within its banks. These magistrates were for diverting the chanel of the several rivers and lakes by which it was swelled; but this project met with great opposition in the senate, where it was resolved, that nothing should be altered, the direction of nature, which appointed to rivers their courses and discharges, being, as it was suggested, best in all natural things. The provinces of Achaia and Macedon, begging to be eased of their public burdens, were this year taken from the senate and given to the emperor (G). Hence it is manifest, that the government of the prætors, who commanded in the provinces immediately subject to the emperor, was less burdensome than that of the proconsuls, who were sent into the senatorial provinces; but in what the one was more chargeable than the other, we are no-where told. Thus Tiberius affected popularity; but nevertheless did not acquire the reputation of being truly popular, having this very year revived the law of treason or majesty with relation to libels or words; a law above all others execrable to the people, since by it those, who wrote or spoke any thing reflecting on the emperor, were deemed guilty of high treason. In the times of the republic, says Tacitus, actions were punished, but words were free. Augustus was the first, as we have related above, who brought words under the penalties of this law; and Tiberius, exasperated by satyrical verses dispersed about the city, exposing his cruelty, his pride, and the misunderstanding which already began between him and his mother (H), thought it necessary to revive this majesty.

(G) Achaia and Macedon were afterwards restored by the emperor Caius to the senate (39). Hence we read in the Acts, that Gallio was proconsul of Achaia at the end of that prince's reign (40).

a this dreadful law ; a law which occasioned under him and his successors so much bloodshed in Rome and all the parts of the empire. He did it, however, with great address, and freely forgave the first criminals ; for, being asked by Pompeius Macer the prætor, whether, in the execution of his office, he should proceed against the authors of libels as guilty of treason, he answered, The laws must be executed. Tiberius's answer was no sooner known, than several persons were prosecuted upon this law, the emperor having as he was naturally suspicious and distrustful, his spies and emissaries dispersed all over the city. Some of these accused Falanius, a Roman knight, of having admitted into his house, where he had erected an altar in honour of Augustus, among the other adorers of the deified emperor, one Cassius a pantomime, infamous for his debaucheries. To this charge they added another, viz. that having sold his gardens, he had sold with them the statue of Augustus. Rubrius, another Roman knight, was charged with swearing falsely by the divinity of Augustus. Tiberius, well satisfied with having restored this law to its former vigor, and by that means checked the freedom of speech and the licentiousness of libellers, would not allow any punishment to be inflicted on the pretended criminals ; but wrote to the consuls, that the senate, in bestowing divine honours on his father, did not intend thereby to lay a snare for the people ; that his mother Livia had never excluded Cassius, nor others of his profession, from the scenic sports, which she consecrated to the memory of Augustus ; that it did not affect religion to comprehend his statue, as well as the images of other gods, in the sale of houses and gardens ; that as to the swearing falsely by his name, it was a crime of the same nature, as if Rubrius had profaned the name of Jupiter : but that it belonged to the gods to punish affronts offered to the gods. By these answers, judicious in themselves and in appearance full of clemency and moderation, Tiberius hoped to decline the odium, which the revival of such a dangerous and ensnaring law carried along with it. But, notwithstanding all his art, it was not long ere he betrayed his real intention, and plainly shewed, that he designed to make more account of such informations than he would then have believed ; for soon after Granius Marcellus, prætor, or rather proprætor, of Bithynia, being charged with high treason of this nature by his own quæstor Cæpio Crispinus, Tiberius, in a manner forgetting himself, flew into a violent passion, and in that sudden transport was for condemning without further inquiry the pretended criminal. Marcellus was accused of having spoke with disrespect of the emperor ; and the accuser, to render his accusation more credible, collecting whatever was most detestable in the prince's character, alledged it as the expressions of the accused. To this he added, that Marcellus had placed his own statue higher than those of the Cæsars ; and that having taken the head from off the statue of Augustus, he had placed the head of Tiberius in its room. This enraged him to such a degree, that, no longer able to dissemble his resentment, he cried out, That he would himself in this cause give his vote openly and upon his oath. Hereupon Cneius Piso asked him, In what place, Cæsar, will you chuse to give your opinion ? If first, I shall have your example to follow ; if last, I am afraid I may disagree with you. These words touched Tiberius to the quick ; nevertheless he bore them patiently, being ashamed of his transport, and suffered Marcellus to be acquitted of high treason (H)^m. It was not out of any principle of religion, nor from any regard to Augustus, that Tiberius was for punishing the supposed crimes against his godhead, but because he apprehended the same affronts might be one day offered to himself. We shall see in the

THE dissensions of the theatre, which had begun the year before, broke out now with great violence, and rent almost the whole city into factions and parties, some protecting one player, and some another; nay, the opposite parties often came to blows, and turned the play-house into a field of battle. In one of these frays, several, not of the people only, were killed, but of the soldiers who attended in the play-house and at the gate to prevent disturbances, and among them a centurion; even the tribune of a prætorian cohort was wounded, while he was endeavouring to secure the magistrates from insults, and to quell the licentious rabble. The senate took this affair into consideration, and several expedients were proposed for the preventing of such riots. The majority were for empowering the prætors to whip the players, who, as was supposed, were the chief authors of these tumults. But Haterius Agrippa, tribune of the people, opposed this motion, alledging, that Augustus, upon a certain occasion had declared, that players should not be whipt; and indeed that emperor, who took great delight in such diversions, had, as Suetonius informs usⁿ and we have hinted above, restrained the power of punishing the players, which, by an ancient law, the magistrates had till that time exercised over them in all places and ages. Asinius Gallus with great sharpness reprimanded the tribune for his opposition;

which, however, prevailed, out of respect to Augustus, whose laws were to be inviolably observed. In order therefore to curb the insolence of the players, their wages were, by a decree of the senate, curtailed; and it was moreover enacted, that no senator should visit a player, that no Roman knight should attend them abroad, and that they should act no-where but in the theatre or public play-house. What gave occasion to this decree was, the great court which the nobility paid them; for not only the people, but knights and senators, as Pliny informs us^o, attended their levees, and waited upon them when they went abroad. Hence Seneca called the nobility of his time the slaves of the pantomimes^p. They acted not only in the public theatre, but in private houses, gardens, &c. drawing after them vast crowds, and by that means heaping up immense wealth. The above-mentioned decrees of the senate were therefore well calculated to humble their pride, and check that insolence which naturally arises, especially in persons of a mean condition, from wealth and honours. As to the spectators, the prætors were empowered to punish with banishment such of them as should raise the least disturbance in the theatre^q. Thus was an end put for a while to these riots and tumults. This year Tiberius discharged the legacies which Augustus had left to the people; but sullied the glory naturally accruing from so plausible and popular an action, by another equally base and cruel; for as he seemed not to be in haste to satisfy the people, a merry jester seeing a dead body carried by to the grave, accosting the bier, and pretending to whisper in the ear of the deceased, said aloud, Remember to let Augustus know, that the legacies which he left to the people, are not yet paid. This pleasantry being related to Tiberius, he commanded the jester to be brought to him; and, having paid him his full due, caused him to be put to death immediately, telling him, That he should go himself to Augustus, since he could give him fresher accounts than the deceased. However, a few days after, he paid the legacy^r. This same year, the people intreating him to ease them of the tax of one per cent. established at the end of the civil wars upon all vendible commodities, he declared by an edict, that the fund for maintaining the army (I) depended intirely upon this tax;

(I) This fund is called by Suetonius ærarium militare, the military treasury: "That the soldiers," says that writer, speaking of Augustus, when discharged, might not be tempted to raise disturbances by their age and poverty, he assigned to each of them an allowance according to the time and quality of their service; and that the province allotted them might be easy and perpetual, he established a military treasury, and imposed

"new tributes for their maintenance(41)". The superintendency of this fund was committed to three persons, as Dio informs us (42), who had been prætors, chosen by lot, and continued in the office three years. They were styled prefects, or superintendants of the military treasury, as we gather from the following inscription on an ancient marble found in Samnium: L. Neratius C. F. Vol. Proculo, Præ. Ærari. Militaris.

tax; and that even thus the republic would not be able to defray the vast charges attending the final dismissal of veterans before the twentieth year of their service. By this decree, the concessions made to the soldiery, during the late sedition, were implicitly revoked, and they obliged to serve twenty years as before, instead of sixteen^a. Thus Tiberius, even while he was studying to win the hearts of the people and soldiery, gave them just motives to complain of his present, and to dread his future; behaviour. Let us now leave Tiberius for a while, and return to Germanicus.

THAT brave prince spent the winter, when Sisenna Statilius and Lucius Scribonius Libo were consuls, in vast preparations for another expedition into Germany, having his heart and mind wholly bent on the intire reduction of that vast continent. He weighed with himself the methods he had hitherto pursued in that war, the misfortunes and successes which had attended him since he first undertook it; and finding that the Germans were chiefly indebted for their safety to their woods and marshes, to their short summers and early winters, and that his own men suffered more from their long and tedious marches than from the enemy, he resolved to enter the country by sea, hoping by that means to begin the campaign earlier and surprise the enemy. Having therefore built, with great dispatch during the winter, a thousand vessels of different sorts (K), early in the spring Germanicus ordered them to fall down the Rhine, appointing the island of the Batavians (L) for the place of the general rendezvous, as the most convenient for receiving the forces, and conveying them from thence to those parts of Germany which he designed to invade. While the fleet sailed, Germanicus detached Silius, one of his lieutenants, with orders to make a sudden irruption into the country of the Catti, and in the mean time he himself, upon intelligence that a Roman fort upon the Lupia was besieged by the enemy, hastened with six legions to its relief. Silius was prevented by sudden rains from doing more than taking some small booty, with the wife and daughter of Arpus prince of the Catti; neither did those who had invested the fort stay till Germanicus arrived, but, upon the news of his approach, breaking up the siege, fled and dispersed. However, in their retreat, they threw down the monument lately raised in honour of Varus and his legions, and also an altar formerly erected to Drusus (M). The altar Germanicus restored, and performed with the legions the funeral ceremony of running round it to the honour of his father, according to the ancient custom (O); but not thinking fit to set up the monument again, he fortified with new works the whole space between the fort, which the enemy had besieged, the Aliso, now the Yffel, and the Rhine (P). In the mean time,

(K) Some of these vessels, says Tacitus, were short, sharp at both ends, and wide in the middle. Vessels of this kind are still in use among the Dutch. Some had flat bottoms, that they might run aground without danger. Several had rudders at each end, that the rowers might, only by turning their oars, work them either way. This kind of vessels, now no longer in use, Tacitus describes in his book of the manners of the Germans, and likewise in his history, where he styles them cameræ (42).

(L) Tacitus describes the island of the Batavians thus: The Rhine, says he, flowing in one chanel, or only broken by small islands, is divided at its entering Batavia, as it were, into two rivers. One continues its course through Germany, retaining the same name and violent current, till it falls into the ocean. The other, washing the coast of Gaul with a broader and more gentle stream, is called by the inhabitants Vabales; which name it soon changes for that of the Mosa, by the immense mouth of which river it discharges itself into the same ocean; so that, according to Tacitus, the island of the Batavians was bounded by the ocean, the Rhine, and the Vabales, now the Wale. Cæsar extends it to the Mosa or Meuse; but Pliny agrees with Tacitus (44). However, the island of the Batavians was of greater extent in Tacitus's time than in Cæsar's, Drusus, the father of Germanicus, having, by a new canal, conveyed the waters of the Rhine into the ocean a considerable way north of the former mouth of that river. By this means the ancient chanel being dried and filled up, the island of the Batavians extended to the new canal (45).

(M) Dio and Suetonius tell us, that a monument was erected in honour of Drusus upon the banks of the Rhine. Some writers place the altar mentioned here close to this monument, and both at Mentz; but it is manifest from this passage in Tacitus, that the altar stood not on the Rhine, but between that river and the Lyppé.

(O) The ceremony of celebrating the funerals of great men with races, was practised in Homer's time, and is described by most of the ancient poets, among the rest very minutely by Statius (46). Livy tells us, that this ceremony obtained even amongst the Carthaginians (47).

(P) Some commentators take Aliso to be the name of the fort, and read Tacitus thus, cuncta inter castellum Alisonem, & Rhenum, &c. but Vertranius, Frienshemius, and Lipsius, cuncta inter castellum, Alisonem, & Rhenum, more agreeable perhaps to what we read in Dion Cassius, who tells us, that Drusus built a fort at the conflux of the Lupias and the Aliso (48). The latter river, now known by the name of Alme, runs at a small distance from the city of Paderborne.

time, the fleet arriving at the island of the Batavians, the provisions and warlike engines were put on board and sent forward; ships were assigned to the legions and allies, and the whole army being imbarqued, the fleet entered the canal formerly cut by Drusus, and from his name called Fossa Drusiana, or the canal of Drusus (Q). Here the pious general did not forget to invoke the manes of his father, beseeching him to encourage with his example, and inspire with wholesome counsels, his son, who was following his footsteps. Hence he sailed prosperously through lakes (R) and the ocean to the Amisia or Ems, and having landed his troops at the mouth of that river (S), marched strait to the Visurgis or Wefer. While he was incamping on the banks of that river, news was brought him, that the Angrivarii (T) had revolted behind him. Hereupon he immediately dispatched a body of horse and light-armed foot against them, under the command of Stertinius, who with fire and sword spread desolation throughout their country. In the mean time, the famous Arminius, being informed of Germanicus's design, appeared on the opposite bank of the Visurgis (U) at the head of his Cherusci, determined to dispute with the Romans the passage of the river. However, before hostilities began on either side, he asked, whether Germanicus was come; and being answered that he was, he begged leave to speak with his brother, who, under the name of Flavius, had long served in the Roman army, and had lost an eye in fighting under Tiberius. His request being granted, Flavius advanced; and Arminius, having first saluted him and ordered his own attendants to withdraw, desired, that the Roman archers, who were drawn up close to the bank of the river, might likewise retire. When they were removed, How came you, brother, by this deformity in your countenance? said Arminius. Flavius having told him in what place and battle he had lost his eye; And what reward, asked Arminius in the next place, have you received for so dangerous a warfare? Increase of pay, answered Flavius, a crown, a chain, and other military gifts; which Arminius treating with derision and styling the vile wages of slavery, a warm contest arose between the two brothers, the one extolling the greatness of the Romans, the power of the emperor, the unhappy condition of the conquered, the Roman clemency to such as submitted, the kind treatment of the wife and son of Arminius, not used like captives, &c. Arminius, on the

(Q) The Fossa Drusiana was a canal cut by Drusus to convey the waters of the Rhine into the Sala, now the Sale, and from thence through the lake Flevus into the ocean. It extended eight miles, from the present village of Iseloort to the town of Doefburg, and was very convenient for the conveying of the Roman troops by water, to the countries of the Frisii and the Chauci. It was this convenience that put Drusus upon such an undertaking. By means of this new canal the Rhine came to have three branches, and to discharge itself into the ocean by three separate and distant mouths, of which the northern was called Ostium Flevum, the western Ostium Helium, and the middle Ostium Medium or Ostium Rheni. Cæsar, in describing the course of the Rhine, says, that it discharges itself into the ocean by many mouths; but he was therein mistaken, depending probably on the accounts of others, or taking the canals, which were cut for the draining of the neighbouring lands, for mouths of the Rhine. It was well known to the geographers of his time, that the Rhine emptied itself into the ocean by two mouths only; for Strabo, who maintains this opinion, confirms it with the authority of Afinius Pollio, who was contemporary with Cæsar (47). Hence Virgil gives the Rhine the epithet of bicornis, or two-horned. By means of the canal cut by Drusus between the north branch of the Rhine and the Sala, these two rivers ran in one channel to the lake Flevus, and from thence emptied themselves into the ocean. This mouth was called Ostium Flevum. Tacitus and Mela, who wrote after Drusus's time, mention only two mouths, viz. the Flevum and Helium, the middle one being very inconsiderable and almost quite choked up, after the stream was by the Fossa Drusiana conveyed into the Sala.

(R) From this and several other passages in Ta- citus, it is manifest, that, in former times, there were several lakes in this country, though, at present, there is but one, called in the language of the country the South Sea.

(S) In this place Tacitus charges Germanicus with two oversights. The first is, that he landed his troops too near the mouth of the river, by which means they suffered much upon the return of the tide, which reached and overflowed the plain where they landed. The other is, that he landed them on the wrong side of the river, so that many days were spent in making bridges. That Germanicus, not yet well acquainted with the flux and reflux of the ocean, was guilty of the first mistake, is not unlikely; but that he should land his men on the side of the river most remote from the enemy, and then consume many days in making bridges to convey them over, is a blunder so palpable and notorious, that we could hardly charge with it the most unthinking man of his army, much less a person of his penetration and forecast. We shall therefore conclude, without entering into the long and tedious disputes of the critics, that this passage is not genuine, but has been some way or other maimed and corrupted.

(T) The Angrivarii had often changed their habitation, as Tacitus informs us (48); but at this time dwelt, as is manifest from the passage before us, between the Amisia and Visurgis. Some modern geographers think, they possessed part of the present province of Overyssel, of the country of Bentheim, and of the diocese of Paderborne.

(U) The Visurgis, as Lipsius observes in this place, is chiefly indebted to Tacitus for its fame, and Tacitus for his to the Visurgis; for in a monastery on this river were found the five first books of his annals, after they had been long looked upon as lost.

the other hand, alledged the rights of their common country, their ancient liberty, the gods of their ancestors, beseeching him by their common mother not to prefer the name of a traitor, of a betrayer of his friends, relations, and country; to that of their general and commander. By degrees they came to reproaches, and, though parted by the river, would have come to blows, had not Stertinius laid hold of Flavius, and, calling for his horse and armour, restrained him. On the opposite bank, Arminius, swelled with rage, was heard to utter dreadful threats, and menace the Romans as he departed with an approaching battle; for with his native language he mingled many Latin words, which he had learnt while he served as general of his countrymen in the Roman armies.

THE next day, the German army appeared on the opposite bank of the Visurgis in order of battle. But Germanicus, not thinking it adviseable to attack them, ordered the horse to ford over under the conduct of Stertinius and Æmilius, who, to divide the enemy's forces, crossed the river in distant places. At the same time Cariovalda, leader of the Batauvians, passed it where it was most rapid; but being drawn into an ambuscade by the enemy and furrounded on all sides, he fell under a shower of darts, while he was with incredible bravery attempting to break through the enemy's numerous battalions. Many of the Batavian nobility fell round him; the rest were saved either by their own bravery, or by the cavalry of Stertinius and Æmilius, who, upon the first notice of their danger, flew to the relief of their distressed allies. Germanicus having, during this skirmish, passed the Visurgis without molestation, was informed by a deserter, that Arminius, being joined by several German nations, had resolved to attack his camp by night. Hereupon the Roman general sent out scouts to reconnoitre, who, upon their return, reported, that they had heard a great noise of men and horses, and discerned the enemy's fires in a neighbouring wood. Then Germanicus, no longer doubting, but they designed to venture a decisive battle, in order to be informed in this critical conjuncture of the real inclinations of his soldiers, and not to depend on the reports of the tribunes and centurions, who were often apt to conceal the truth and relate only what was pleasing, in the beginning of the night, went out of the prætorium in disguise, only with one attendant; and listening from tent to tent to the discourses of the soldiery, while over their meals they frankly disclosed their hopes and fears, he had the satisfaction to hear his own praises in every one's mouth, and the soldiers encouraging each other to exert themselves in the approaching battle, out of gratitude to so deserving a general. While Germanicus was thus agreeably employed, one of the Germans, who spoke Latin, riding up to the Roman intrenchments, offered in the name of Arminius to every deserter a wife, land, and a hundred sesterces a day, as long as the war lasted. This offer the legions looked upon as an affront; and, full of rage and resentment, Let day come, said they, we will seize their lands; we will take, not receive, German wives. About the third watch the enemy approached; but finding the Romans ready to receive them, they retired without discharging a single dart. Early next morning, Germanicus, having assembled his troops, acquainted them with his design, which was to put an end to so tedious and fatiguing a war with a decisive battle; made them sensible of their advantage over the enemy both as to their arms and manner of fighting; represented the Germans as men of a frightful aspect and violent in the beginning of a battle; but disheartened with wounds, unaffected with their own disgrace, unconcerned for their general, cowards in distress, in prosperity despisers of all divine and human laws. In the end of his speech he exhorted his men to put an end of so great fatigues by sea, to their tedious marches by land, by making him conquer in those very countries, where his father and uncle had conquered. His harangue inspired the whole army with great ardour, which was expressed with a general shout and loud acclamations. Neither did Arminius and the other German chiefs neglect to animate their respective corps, and encourage them, either to maintain by their bravery the liberty they had received from their ancestors, or to prevent slavery by a glorious death. Having thus animated their men, they led them calling for battle into a plain called Indistavisus (W), which was bounded on one side by the Visurgis, and on the other by a ridge of

(W) Lipfius, who surveyed with great care, and no less pleasure, the places here described by Tacitus, takes the plain called by him Indistavisus to be that plain, which begins at a village called Vegeſack, about of hills. Behind this plain was a forest of tall trees, thick of branches above, but clear of bushes below. The Germans were all drawn up on the plain and at the entrance of the forest, except the Cherusci, who were posted on the hills, and ordered to fall upon the Romans from thence in the heat of the fight. Germanicus had scarce entered the plain with his troops in battle array, when he observed the Cherusci, impatient of delays, pouring down the hills. Hereupon he commanded a chosen body of horse to charge them in flank, and at the same time detached Stertinius with the rest of the cavalry, ordering him to wheel about and fall upon their rear (X). In the mean while, the Roman infantry advancing attacked the enemy in front with such vigor, that the Germans, not able to stand the shock, immediately gave ground. Those who were posted at the entrance of the forest fled to the plain, and those in the plain to the forest. The Cherusci alone maintained the fight, being encouraged by the example of the valiant Arminius, who, though wounded, would have broke through the Roman archers, had not the auxiliary cohorts of the Rhetians, Vindelicians, and Gauls hastened to their relief. However, by his own valour and the swiftness of his horse, he escaped the present danger, having first dyed his face with his own blood, to avoid being known. Some writers have related, that the Chauci, who served in the Roman army, having known him, suffered him to retire unmolested. The same bravery or connivance procured Inguiomerus's escape; the rest were either cut in pieces, or drowned in attempting to swim cross the Visurgis. The slaughter lasted from morning till night, and the country was covered ten miles round with arms and dead bodies. Among the spoils chains were found, which they had brought, not doubting of success, to bind the Roman captives. The Romans were no sooner returned from the pursuit, than Germanicus, ascribing the whole glory of so remarkable a victory to Tiberius, under whose auspices he had fought, caused him to be proclaimed emperor on the field of battle, and raising a mount, placed upon it as trophies the arms of the enemy, and inscribed underneath the names of the conquered nations.

THE Germans, though vanquished, and already determined to abandon their country and seek for shelter beyond the Albis or Elbe, were so enraged at the raising of this mount, which they looked upon as an affront not to be borne, that, forgetting their wounds and misfortunes, they ran to arms again, people, nobility, young and old, all in a confused body, rushed suddenly upon the Romans, like men in despair, and put them, as they were on their march and under no apprehension of an enemy, into some disorder. Being repulsed, they incamped in a plain shut in between a river and a forest; the forest was surrounded by a deep marsh, except on one side, which was inclosed by a broad rampart raised formerly by the Angrivarii, as a barrier between them and their neighbours the Cherusci. In this plain the enemy posted their infantry, concealing their cavalry among the neighbouring groves, that they might fall upon the rear of the Roman army, as soon as they had entered the forest. Germanicus, being informed of their design and of every step they took, ordered Seius Tubero, one of his lieutenants, to enter the plain at the head of the cavalry; his infantry he divided into two bodies, commanding the one to attack the enemy in the wood, and leading the other himself to force the rampart. The foot, that fought on even ground, broke easily in; but the attack of the rampart cost Germanicus dear, the Germans defending it with great boldness and intrepidity. However, having at length, by showers of darts poured upon the enemy from his engines, beat them off and taken the rampart, he entered the wood at the head of the prætorian cohorts, and there made a most dreadful havock of the enemy, who fought indeed with as much courage as the Romans, but could not, for want of room, manage their long spears. However, they made a most vigorous resistance, and disputed the ground inch by inch. Arminius did not on this occasion exert his usual activity, being disabled and weakened by a wound he received; but Inguiomerus, with great intrepidity, flew about the ranks, animating his countrymen more by his example than by words. Germanicus, that he might be known, pulled off his helmet, and animated his men to pursue the slaughter: No quarter, he cried; we want no captives, nothing

^u Idem ibid. c. 11—13.

(X) Tacitus tells us, that as the troops were marching towards the enemy, eight eagles were seen to fly towards the wood and enter it; which Germanicus looking upon as a presage of victory, Advance, he cried, follow the Roman birds; follow the tutelar gods of the legions.

^a nothing but an utter destruction of these perfidious nations will put an end to the war. ^{The Germans defeated ancw.} However, as the day was already far spent, he detached a legion to form a camp for his weary troops; but the rest continued the slaughter till night, when they retired glutted with the blood of the enemy. This second victory was intirely owing to the foot, for the horse fought with double success. Germanicus, having from his tribunal commended his victorious troops, of the arms taken from the enemy formed a monument with this inscription: TO MARS, TO JUPITER, AND TO AUGUSTUS, THE ARMY OF TIBERIUS CÆSAR, HAVING INTIRELY VANQUISHED THE NATIONS BETWEEN THE RHINE AND THE ALBIS, CONSECRATES THIS MONUMENT. He made no mention of himself, either to avoid giving umbrage to Tiberius, or because ^b he thought the recording of the fact a sufficient testimony of his valour and conduct. After this he detached Stertinius against the Angrivarii, who by a ready submission ^{The Angri-varii submit.} prevented the calamities that threatened them. Germanicus, no less compassionate than brave, pardoned them without reserve, and suffered them to live quietly, according to their own laws, under the protection of Rome ^w.

As the summer was already far spent, Germanicus with the reduction of the Angrivarii ^{Germanicus returning by sea suffers a violent storm.} put an end to the campaign, sending some of the legions back into winter-quarters by land, and imbarquing himself with the others on the Amisia in order to return by sea. The ocean proved at first very calm and the wind favourable; but all on a sudden a storm arising, the fleet, consisting of a thousand vessels, was dispersed; some of ^c them were swallowed by the waves, others dashed in pieces against the rocks, or driven upon remote and inhospitable islands, where the men either perished with famine, or lived upon the flesh of the dead horses, with which the shores appeared soon strewed; for in order to lighten their vessels and disengage them from the shoals, they had been obliged to throw over-board their horses and beasts of burden, nay, even their arms and baggage. The galley of Germanicus alone landed on the coast of the Chauci, where the good-natured general, deeply affected with the misfortunes of his fellow-soldiers, wandered day and night about the rocks and promontories, keeping his eyes stedfast on the sea, in hopes of descrying some of the dispersed vessels. As none of them appeared, he was heard accusing himself as the author of this ^d dreadful havock; nay, distracted with grief, he would have thrown himself head- ^{His great concern.} long into the deep, had not his friends with much ado restrained him. At length to his infinite satisfaction he discovered part of the fleet returning, though in a very bad condition, some of the vessels being without oars, others without sails, using in their stead the soldiers cloaks; many were quite disabled, and towed by such as had suffered less. The latter he caused to be immediately repaired, and dispatched them to the neighbouring islands in quest of his dispersed legionaries. By this means the greater part of them were at length brought back. The Angrivarii, who had lately submitted, to give Germanicus on this occasion an undoubted proof of their fidelity, redeemed many, who had been made captives by their neighbours, and restored ^e them. Some, who had been driven into our island, were generously sent back by ^{Recovers many of his men.} the petty kings, who at that time reigned here ^x (Y).

UPON the news of this wreck, the Catti, taking new courage, ran to arms; but Caius Silius, detached against them with thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse, kept them in awe. As for Germanicus himself, at the head of a more numerous body, ^f he made a sudden irruption into the country of the Marfi (Z), where he was informed by one Malovendus, who had once commanded their troops but had lately taken party with the Romans, that the eagle of one of Varus's legions was concealed underground in a neighbouring grove, and guarded only by a small body of troops. This intelligence filled Germanicus with joy: he immediately dispatched two parties, the one to face the enemy and draw them from their post, the other to fall upon their rear and dig up the eagle. Success attended both, and the Roman general, having ravaged ^{Invaades the country of the Marfi, and recovers one of Varus's eagles.}

(Y) Tacitus tells us, that those who came from distant countries related wonders at their return, and entertained their comrades with strange accounts of violent whirlwinds, of birds never before heard of, of sea-monsters, which from their ambiguous forms appeared to be a new species between men and beasts. Travellers we find have ever been apt to magnify what they have seen, and relate what they have never seen:

(Z) Before the canal, of which we have spoken above, was cut by Drusus, the Marfi inhabited part of the territories of Veluwe and Zutphen, where the present cities of Arnhem, Grolle, and Bredfort stand: but afterwards they settled between the Rhine and Isala, and in process of time changed the name of Marfi for that of Marfasi or Marfatti.

ravaged and laid waste the enemy's country, brought back the eagle in triumph; he then returned to the frontiers of Gaul, and there put his troops into winter-quarters, having by this glorious and successful expedition, retrieved, in some degree, the glory of the Roman name, and balanced his late misfortune at sea. He hoped in one campaign more to complete the reduction of Germany, and, in order to keep up the spirit of the soldiery, and encourage them to pursue with alacrity that great work, he made good at his own expence all the losses they had sustained in the late storm, causing as much to be paid to each legionary as each declared he had lost.

He is recalled by Tiberius. BUT, in the mean time, Tiberius, jealous of the great fame and reputation which his nephew acquired, by his repeated victories over the Germans and his popularity, resolved to separate him from his old and faithful legions. In order to this, he pressed him by frequent letters to return to Rome, and there enjoy the triumph decreed him: he urged, that he had already undergone dangers enow; that though success had attended him, yet he had sustained great losses, which indeed were owing to no fault of his, but to the winds and waves; that he himself, having been sent nine times into Germany by Augustus, had more by policy than force of arms brought the Sicambri into subjection, and drawn the Suevi and Maroboduus king of the Marcomanni to conclude a peace with Rome: he added, that the Cherusci and other barbarous nations, now the Romans had been fully revenged on them, might be left to pursue their domestic feuds and destroy one another. Germanicus, in answer to the emperor's letters, earnestly intreated him to indulge him but one year more to complete his conquest, since the enemy were already concerting measures for obtaining peace. Tiberius was inflexible; in order therefore to intice him home, he offered him a second consulship, adding in his letter, that if the war was still to be pursued, he ought to have some regard for his brother Drusus, and not ingross all the glory to himself; that Rome had at present no other enemies to wage war with but the Germans, and Drusus no other field of glory but Germany. Though Germanicus was well apprised, that these were but specious pretences; suggested by envy, to rob him of the glory he was likely to acquire by another campaign; however, finding it was in vain to persist any longer, he complied at length, and, leaving Germany, set out for Rome with his wife and children. But, before we speak of the reception he met with from Tiberius and the Roman people, we shall give a succinct account of what passed in the metropolis, while he was signalizing himself in Germany.

Libo Drusus accused of high treason. Tiberius had the foregoing year revived, as we have related above, the law of majesty, and upon this law was now arraigned Libo Drusus, tried, and condemned, and his estate divided amongst his accusers, which was encouraging that baneful set of men, and sounding the trumpet, to use the expression of Ammianus Marcellinus, to informations and arraignments. Lucius Scribonius Libo Drusus was descended of the Scribonian family, one of the most illustrious in Rome, was the great grandson of Pompey the Great, nephew of Scribonia, once the wife of Augustus, nearly related to the Cæsars, and no ways inferior in nobility to the reigning house. His high quality rendered him obnoxious to Tiberius, which a senator, by name Firminus Catus, being well apprised of, resolved to gain the emperor's favour, by giving him a plausible pretence to deliver himself from his fears. With this view, having insinuated himself into the favour of the unwary youth, by flattering his hopes and ambition and constantly magnifying the nobility of his family, he prevailed upon him to consult the Chaldeans and magicians, whether he should not be one day vested with the sovereign power, to which he had as good a claim, said the treacherous Firminus, as the family of Tiberius who enjoyed it. This was sufficient matter for a charge of high treason; and accordingly Firminus immediately acquainted the emperor by means of Flaccus Vesularius, a Roman knight, who had free access to him, with the pretended crimes of the unhappy youth, whom he had basely ensnared with specious delusions. Tiberius, though overjoyed at this information, refused the accuser a private audience, sending him word, that the communication might be still carried on by the same Flaccus, and accordingly Firminus by his means informed the emperor of all Libo's steps and words; for the unwary youth, deluded by the predictions of the Chaldeans and astrologers, began now to entertain thoughts of soaring above the rank of a private citizen. In the mean time, Tiberius with the deepest dissimulation preferred Libo to the prætorship, entertained him at his table, and familiarly conversed with him, without ^a without ever betraying the least resentment, either in his words or countenance. At length Libo, having recourse to one Junius, who pretended, by charms and the superstitious rites of the magicians, to call up the infernal shades, and learn of them future events, the magician discovered this to one Fulcinus Trio, a famous informer, who immediately hastening to the consuls, imparted the whole to them, and demanded that the senate might meet forthwith to deliberate upon an affair of so much moment, and of such dangerous consequence to the state. The fathers, not doubting but Tiberius was at the bottom of this prosecution, did not fail to assemble at the time appointed, when Libo appeared in the habit of a suppliant, and presenting himself before Tiberius who was present, endeavoured by his tears and intreaties to soften him. The emperor

^b heard him with a countenance quite unmoved, and, instead of returning him any answer, recited to the conscript fathers the charge against him and the names of the accusers, without betraying the least emotion of anger or resentment, or seeming either to lessen or magnify the crimes laid to his charge. When the emperor had done, four accusers

^c appeared against the criminal, viz. Firminus Catus, Fulcinus Trio, Fonteius Agrippa, and Caius Vibius, and produced such extravagant, foolish, and chimerical articles, as rather deserved pity than punishment. One of these, from which we may judge of the others, was, that he had asked the fortune-tellers, whether he should not one day be possessed of riches sufficient to cover with money the great Appian road from Rome to Brundisium? Vibius produced a paper containing the names of the Cæsars, that

^d is, of Tiberius, Drusus, and Germanicus, and those of some senators, with mysterious characters and magical notes joined to them. These the accuser pretended were written with Libo's own hand, which he denying, it was moved, that his slaves should be examined upon the rack, but because by an old Roman law slaves could not be put to the torture in a trial touching the life of their masters, the crafty Tiberius found a trick to evade that law without seeming to violate it: he ordered the slaves to be sold to the public, that they might then be evidence against their late master: this poor evasion was first contrived and practised by Augustus, as we have shewn above. The unhappy Libo, concluding from this step, that Tiberius was resolved upon his destruction, begged the conscript fathers that they would put off till the next day the

^e final decision of his cause. His request being granted, he returned to his own house; whence soon after he sent Publius Quirinius to speak to the emperor in his behalf. Quirinius was nearly related to Libo and in great favour with Tiberius, having been formerly, as we have related above, instrumental in reconciling Caius Cæsar to him while he lived in the island of Rhodes, and by that means the chief cause of his returning into favour with Augustus. But, unmindful of ancient obligations, he received Quirinius with great coldness, and returned him no other answer, but that he must apply to the senate. This answer threw Libo into a deep melancholy, which, however, he dissembled, and ordered a great entertainment to be got ready, in order to pass the last night of his life in the company of his friends and relations. But the banquet

^f was scarce begun, when a band of soldiers, surrounding the house, with a studied noise and dreadful cries, so terrified the guests, that many of them, rising from table, endeavoured to make their escape. Libo, not doubting but they were sent to dispatch him, drawing his sword, offered it to his slaves, begging them to put an end with it to his unhappy life: but they, trembling and shunning the sad task, fled with such hurry and confusion, that they overturned all the lights, and then Libo in the dark gave himself two mortal wounds. As he fell and groaned, his freedmen ran in; and the soldiers seeing him dead retired; for they had been sent on purpose to frighten him, so as to make him lay violent hands on himself, Tiberius hoping by that means to avoid the odium, which, he was well apprised, the execution of one of the most illustrious citizens of Rome would reflect upon his person and government. The charge, however, was carried on in the senate, as if he had been still alive; but the deceitful Tiberius at the same time declared upon oath, that he would have interceded for his life, had he not prevented his clemency by laying violent hands on himself. The deceased was by the senate declared guilty of high treason, and his estate divided amongst his accusers: such of the informers as were of the senatorial order (for the first lords of the senate were not ashamed to debase themselves to this vile office) were, without the regular method of election, named prætors for the ensuing year. This was the most effectual means imaginable of multiplying these pests of the empire: they were raised to the highest offices in the state, and the metropolis of the world often saw her public dignities bestowed, as spoils, upon parricides, for spilling her best blood. may well imagine, that the servile senate did not let slip so favourable an opportunity of gaining the emperor's favour, by branding the memory of the pretended criminal. Cotta Messalinus moved, that the image of Libo might not be carried at the funerals of his posterity; Cneius Lentulus, that none of the Scribonian family should thenceforth take the name of Drusus: at the motion of Pomponius Flaccus days of thanksgiving were appointed. Lucius Publius, Asinius Gallus, Papius Mutilus, and Lucius Apronius were of opinion, that gifts should be presented to Jupiter, to Mars, and to the goddess Concord; and that the ides of September, the day on which Libo killed himself, should be for ever observed as a festival². So great was the debasement of the once venerable Roman senate, even in the beginning of Tiberius's reign. It was not enough for the conscript fathers to have condemned Libo; they issued a decree for driving astrologers, magicians, and the whole herd of fortune-tellers out of Italy; nay, Lucius Pituanus, one of them whom Libo had probably consulted, was thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock; and Publius Marcius, another of the same profession, was by the consuls sentenced to death, and executed accordingly, without the Esquiline gate.

At the next meeting of the senate, Quintus Haterius, once consul, and Octavius Fronto, formerly prætor, moved, that a stop might be put to the excessive luxury which prevailed in the city; and at their motion a law passed, forbidding all to use plate of massy gold, and men to debase themselves with wearing silks, which were then thought peculiar to women. Fronto went farther, and proposed, that the quantity of silver-plate, the expence of furniture, and the number of slaves might be regulated. But he was opposed therein by Asinius Gallus, who with plausible arguments defended the prevailing luxury. Besides, Tiberius himself did not approve of Fronto's motion; for after Gallus had done speaking, he added, that it was not a season for reformation, and that if there was any corruption of manners, there would not be wanting one to redress that evil, alluding thereby, no doubt, to himself and his office of perpetual censor. As it was common for the senators to depart from the present debate, and offer as their advice whatever they judged conducing to the public welfare, Lucius Piso, who still retained the ancient Roman spirit and declared his sentiments with great freedom, after having bitterly inveighed against the corruptions of the state, particularly against the pestilent pursuits of the informers, who were daily arraigning and circumventing all men, protested, that he was resolved to leave Rome, and live in some quiet and distant corner of the country. With these words he went out of the senate; but Tiberius, though highly provoked, smothered his resentment, and following Piso, endeavoured to sooth him with kind intreaties; nay, he even condescended to solicit his relations to divert him with their prayers and authority from the resolution he had taken; which they did accordingly. Piso not long after gave another instance of a spirit truly Roman, in suing for a debt one Urgulania, a woman of distinction, and placed by the favour of Livia above the laws. Piso summoned her to appear before the prætor; but she, despising the summons, fled for refuge to the palace; whence Piso would have carried her by force before the prætor, notwithstanding the complaints of Livia, had not Tiberius, to prevent disturbances, obliged her to comply with the summons, and at the same time proposed, in civility to his mother, to attend the trial and assist her favourite. On the day appointed for the decision of the cause, the emperor left the palace, ordering his guards to follow him at a distance; but walked so slow, that before he reached the forum the trial was over, and Urgulania adjudged to pay the sum claimed by Piso. The money was immediately advanced by Livia, who, finding Piso inflexible and the emperor no-ways inclined to oppose him, was glad to redeem her favourite from the trouble, which so bold and resolute a creditor would not have failed to create her (A). The proceeding of Tiberius on this occasion was highly applauded by the Roman people, as was also his generosity at this time towards some necessitous senators, whom with his gratuities he enabled to live suitable to their rank. However, he rejected with haughtiness the petition of Marcus Hortalus, the grandson of Hortensius the famous orator, who, as we have related above, had been encouraged by ² Idem ibid. c. 27—32.

(A) Tacitus tells us, that the power of Urgulania was so great, that she disdained to appear as a witness in a certain cause before the senate; so that a prætor was sent to examine her at her own house, though it had been always usual even for the vestal virgins to attend the forum and courts of justice, whenever their evidence was required.

^a Augustus, with a bounty of a thousand great sesterces, to marry, in order to prevent the extinction of his illustrious family. As he had now four children, he placed them before the door of the senate house, and shewing them to the conscript fathers, in a moving speech besought both them and the emperor to defend from want the offspring of so many consuls, the descendants of so many dictators, whom he had not brought into the world by his own choice, but in compliance with the desire of the deified Augustus. The conscript fathers, touched with compassion, were inclined to relieve him; but Tiberius opposed it, saying, that if they relieved all who were poor, and took upon them to maintain their children, the public would soon fail; that if the public treasury came to be exhausted by popular bounties, it must be supplied with rapine and oppression; that by such bounties industry would languish, and sloth prevail, &c. The greater part of the fathers sufficiently declared with their silence, that they did not like this speech; which Tiberius perceiving, after having paused a little, to qualify what he had said, added, that his answer was addressed in particular to Hortalus, but that if the senate thought fit, he was ready to give his sons two hundred great sesterces each. The senators returned him thanks for his generous disposition; but Hortalus himself was silent, affronted at the emperor's speech, and even in poverty full of the ancient grandeur of his family; which so estranged Tiberius from him, that he never after took any notice of him or his family, though reduced to extreme poverty ^a.

^b This same year, a slave of Posthumus Agrippa, by name Clemens, would have raised great disturbances in the state, and kindled a civil war in the bowels of Italy, had he not been prevented in good time. As he was much about the same age with his late master, and not unlike him in his person, he took upon him his name, and caused it to be reported in all parts by his emissaries and associates, that Agrippa was still alive. This raised great tumults in many cities of Italy, and brought over to the pretended Agrippa vast numbers of people, such as are ever fond of public disturbances and changes. The report was even credited at Rome, and his supposed arrival at Ostia privately celebrated in the city by multitudes of people. Tiberius, informed by his emissaries of all that passed, was long in suspense whether he should order his troops to march against the audacious slave; or suffer the imposture to vanish of itself, which he was well apprised must soon happen. On one hand, he was ashamed to betray any fear of a vile slave; and on the other he apprehended the danger which might arise from the credulity of the people, if they were not soon undeceived. In this perplexity he committed the whole affair to Sallustius Crispus, the same whom he had employed to dispatch Agrippa. Crispus chose two of his clients, or, as some write, two soldiers, in whom he could confide, and sent them to the supposed Agrippa with a considerable sum, directing them to feign that they believed him to be the true grandson of Augustus, to present him with the money, and to pretend a great zeal for his cause. They executed his orders with great address, and finding that Clemens reposed in them an intire confidence, they underhand got ready a proper band of men, seized and gagged him while his guards were asleep, and carried him without noise to the palace. When he was brought before Tiberius, the emperor asked him, How he was become Agrippa? Just as you became Cæsar, answered Clemens. Though Tiberius had him wholly in his power, yet so great was his fear or policy, that he did not execute him publicly, but ordered him to be dispatched in a secret part of the palace, and his body to be privately conveyed away; and though many of the emperor's household, many knights and senators were said to have assisted and supported him with their counsels and fortunes, yet no farther enquiry was made after his accomplices ^b. Towards the end of this year a triumphal arch was raised near the temple of Saturn as a monument for the recovery of the eagles of the Varian legions: a temple was dedicated to Valiant Fortune in the gardens which Julius Cæsar had bequeathed to the Roman people, and a chapel to the Julian family; statues were also consecrated to Augustus at Bovillæ in the neighbourhood of Rome.

In the mean time, Germanicus arriving with his wife and children in the capital, was there received by Tiberius with all possible marks of a seeming friendship and affection; he congratulated him on his past dangers, seemed highly pleased with his conduct, extolled his mighty feats, and with the deepest dissimulation commended him to the senate, as well deserving the greatest honours it was in their power to confer upon him.

Tiberius resolved on his destruction.

Archelaus king of Cappadocia called to Rome, where he dies.

him. The triumph, which had been decreed him, was put off till the following year, when Caius Cælius, or, as some style him, Cæcilius Rufus, and Lucius Pomponius Flaccus were consuls. During their administration, Germanicus triumphed on the twenty-sixth day of May over the Catti, the Angrivarii, the Cherusci, and all the German nations between the Rhine and the Albis, or the Elbe. Germanicus had not indeed extended his conquests to the latter of these rivers; but the emperor, to make him amends for stopping him in the full career of his victories, counted those conquests as complete, which he had prevented him from completing. The triumph, an honour now very uncommon, was performed with extraordinary magnificence. Before the triumphal chariot were carried representations of mountains, rivers, and battles, and an incredible number of captives loaded with chains, among whom were many of the German chiefs, and the wife of Arminius, carrying in her arms her infant son. But what above all heightened the shew and the satisfaction of the beholders, was the extraordinary gracefulness of Germanicus's person, and his chariot filled with his five children, viz. Nero, Drusus, and Caius; and his two daughters, Agrippina and Drusilla. Tiberius, to render the solemnity more complete and the joy of the people more universal, distributed among them in the name of Germanicus a large sum, three hundred sesterces a man, and named himself his colleague in the consulship for the ensuing year. But, notwithstanding all these demonstrations of kindness and affection, the people still suspected his sincerity; and their joy was greatly allayed by the melancholy reflections, that popular favour had proved fatal to his father Drusus; that his uncle Marcellus was snatched from the people, who adored him, in the flower of his youth, and that the favourites of the Roman people had ever been unfortunate and short-lived. And truly, their fears were not ill grounded; for Tiberius, jealous of the glory of the young prince and the high favour he was in both with the people and soldiery, was already resolved on his destruction, and meditating with himself how to compass his wicked design, and at the same time avoid the irreconcilable hatred, which, he well knew, would thence arise to him from all orders of men. While he was wholly taken up with these thoughts, a favourable opportunity offered, or rather, was craftily framed by Tiberius for removing from Rome the darling of the people. Archelaus (B) king of Cappadocia had many years before incurred his displeasure, by neglecting to pay his court to him, during his retirement at Rhodes (C). This the revengeful emperor remembered, and therefore having inticed the king to Rome by means of letters from his mother Livia, promising him his pardon, provided he came in person to implore it, he not only received him with great haughtiness, but caused him to be accused as a criminal in the senate. As the crimes laid to his charge evidently appeared to be mere fictions, he was by the conscript fathers declared innocent; but the unhappy prince, not able to brook such treatment, soon after either died of grief, or laid violent hands on himself, after having reigned fifty years^c. Some time after Cappadocia was reduced to a Roman province, which enabled Tiberius to abate the tax of one in the hundred upon all vendible goods, and reduce it to one in the two hundred; which relief, however, the people did not long enjoy.

(B) Torrentius, Riccioli, and Salian confound Archelaus king of Cappadocia with Archelaus, the son of Herod, king of Judæa. They were led into this mistake by a passage in Suetonius, who in the life of Tiberius tells us, that he pleaded the cause of Archelaus, which was his first essay in eloquence. This cause the abovementioned writers take to be that which Archelaus the son of Herod maintained at Rome against his brothers about his father's last will, as we have related in our history of the Jews (49). But it is evident both from Josephus and Dion Cassius, that Tiberius at the time of this trial was not at Rome, but lived in retirement at Rhodes; nay, the latter writer tells us in express terms, that Tiberius undertook the defence of Archelaus king of Cappadocia, against his own subjects; and that the Cappadocian prince incurred his displeasure by seeming to neglect him in his disgrace, notwithstanding the kindness he had shewn him on that occasion (50). He was the great grandson of the famous Archelaus, who commanded the troops of Mithridates the Great, king of Pontus, against Sylla, and afterwards, abandoning his own prince, sided with Lucullus. His daughter Glaphyra was first married to Alexander, and afterwards to his brother Archelaus, both sons to Herod, as we have related elsewhere (51). It is surprizing the abovementioned writers should be guilty of so gross a mistake.

(C) It was not out of ingratitude or contempt, as Tacitus informs us, that Archelaus declined attending upon Tiberius, while he resided at Rhodes, but because he had been warned by his friends at the court of Augustus to take no notice of him, lest he should incur the displeasure of the emperor.

enjoy . At the same time, died Antiochus king of Comagene and Philopator, king of Cilicia, which occasioned great disturbances in those countries, some being for the Roman government, and others for a king of their own. The provinces too of Syria and Judæa being overloaded with taxes, applied to the emperor and senate for relief^e. Neither was Parthia without troubles; that warlike nation having driven out Vonones, whom they had demanded of Augustus for their king, placed in his room on the throne Artabanes, a prince of the family of the Arfacidæ, but at that time, according to Josephus, king of the Medes^f. These disturbances and commotions in the east proved very favourable to the wicked designs of Tiberius, who represented to the senate, that they could not be well composed but by the wisdom and abilities of Germanicus; as for himself, he was, he said, in the decline of his age, and that of his son Drusus was not yet ripe. Hereupon all the provinces of the east were readily decreed to Germanicus, and a greater power conferred on him, than had been given to any governor since the time of Pompey the Great. But to balance and restrain the extraordinary authority with which he was vested, Tiberius had already removed from the government of Syria Creticus Silanus, whose daughter was betrothed to Nero, the eldest son of Germanicus, and placed in his room Cneius Piso (D), a man of a most violent and untractable temper, and to such a degree elated with the nobility and wealth of his wife Plancina (E), that he scarce yielded to Tiberius, and despised his sons, viz. Drusus and Germanicus, as persons beneath his rank: in short, he was in every respect the most proper person in Rome to execute those fatal purposes for which he was chiefly chosen. His wife Plancina, who was still of a more haughty temper than her husband, had secret instructions from Livia to exert her spirit, and by all manner of indignities prosecute and insult Agrippina (F). Before Germanicus left Rome, Drusus was sent into Illyricum on occasion of a bloody war, which broke out, soon after the departure of the Romans, between Maroboduus king of the Suevians, Marcomanians, and Lombards on one side, and the Cherusians on the other, headed by the brave Arminius. Maroboduus was overcome in a great battle, and obliged, most of his men abandoning him, to retire into the country of the Marcomanians, whence he sent ambassadors to Tiberius imploring his assistance. The emperor answered, that it was very surprizing he should recur to the Romans, and beg their assistance against the Cherusians, since he had sent none to them, while they were waging war with the same enemy. However, he laid hold of this opportunity to remove from Rome his son Drusus, who seemed over fond of the gaieties of the city, to inure him to the toils of the camp, and procure him the affections of the soldiery. What success attended him in this expedition, we shall relate anon.

(D) Cneius Piso was the son of Cneius Calpurnius Piso, who, as we have related above, maintained with great intrepidity the republican party against Julius Caesar in Africa. Afterwards he joined Brutus and Cassius, but after the battle of Philippi was allowed to return to Rome, where he scorned to sue for any public offices, chusing to live in retirement, till Augustus prevailed upon him to accept the consulship. Festus tells us, that the Calpurnian family pretended to derive their origin from one Calpus or Calphus, the son of Numa Pompilius (52). However that be, it is certain, that the Calpurnian family was one of the most ancient and illustrious in Rome, and no ways inferior to the Claudian, of which Tiberius was descended.

(E) Plancina was either the daughter or the niece of the famous Munatius Plancus, of whom we have spoken in several parts of this work. Dion Cassius calls her Munatia Plancina, and so she is styled in an inscription, which is still to be seen at Rome, in the palace which at present belongs to the family of the Chigi.

(F) Tacitus tells us, that the whole court was rent into parties, some favouring Drusus, and others Ger- manicus. Tiberius was partial to Drusus, as his son by nature, whereas Germanicus was his son only by adoption; but the greater part favoured Germanicus for two reasons, says Tacitus; first, because they knew he was hated by the emperor; and secondly, because he was by his mother of a more illustrious descent. Germanicus and Drusus were the sons of two brothers, and consequently by their fathers of the same family. But on the mother's side Germanicus had the advantage, he being the son of Antonia Minor, the daughter of Marc Antony the triumvir by Octavia the sister of Augustus; so that Marc Antony was his grandfather, and Augustus his great uncle. On the other side, a private Roman knight was the great grandfather of Drusus; for his mother Vispania was the grand-daughter of the famous Pomponius Atticus. Besides, Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus, far excelled Livia the wife of Drusus in virtue, and all the accomplishments peculiar to her sex. However, the two brothers lived in perfect concord and friendship, no ways disturbed or interrupted by the contention and emulation that reigned among their relations and adherents (35).

Asia.

THIS year was remarkable for one of the most dreadful earthquakes recorded in history: twelve famous cities of Asia were overturned by it, viz. Sardis, Magnesia, at the foot of mount Sipylus, Mosthene, Ægæ, Hierocæsarea, Philadelphia, Temolus, Temnus, Cyme or Cumæ, Myrina, Apollonia, Hyrcania. To these mentioned by Tacitus, Eusebius adds Ephesus^g. *Pliny*ⁱ and *Strabo*ⁱ make particular mention of this event, calling it the most dreadful concussion that had ever been felt (G). It happened in the night, and proved the more dreadful, as it was less expected. Most of the inhabitants were crushed under the ruins of their houses, and those who fled to the fields, swallowed up by the opening of the earth. It is reported, says Tacitus, that huge mountains sunk into the earth, that plains were raised up into high hills, and that dreadful flashes and eruptions of fire were seen among the ruins. Phlegon^b of Tralles, who has wrote a very particular account of this terrible event and the evils which it occasioned, says, that many cities of Pontus, of Sicily, and of Calabria in Italy were greatly damaged by it; and adds, that the earth opening in many places, bodies were discovered of a monstrous size, from one of which a tooth was taken above a foot in length, and presented to Tiberius, who would not suffer the whole body to be brought to him, saying, that he deemed it a great crime to disturb the dead. However, to satisfy his curiosity, he caused a head to be engraved proportionable to the tooth which had been brought him, and which he immediately after ordered to be restored to the place, whence it had been taken^k. Tiberius, to do him justice, shewed, on occasion of this great calamity, a spirit truly generous and worthy of a person in his station: for he not only remitted the inhabitants of the ruined cities their taxes for five years, but presented them with large sums to rebuild their habitations. To the Sardians, who had suffered most, he sent a hundred thousand great sesterces, and the rest relief proportionable to their losses; nay, he immediately dispatched into Asia Marcus Aletus, a senator, who had been prætor, to view the desolations on the spot, and make good the losses of every particular; for he was fond of being liberal, as Tacitus observes, on honest occasions, a virtue which he long retained, after he had utterly abandoned all other virtues. The inhabitants of the cities thus rebuilt, and by the liberalities of Tiberius restored to their former splendor, erected to their common benefactor a colossus in the Roman forum, surrounded with the statues of their twelve cities, as a lasting monument of the prince's generosity, and their gratitude^l.

liberalities.

THE reputation which Tiberius gained by this noble bounty to the public, was greatly heightened by his private liberalities. For the estate of a wealthy freedwoman, by name Æmilia Musa, who died this year intestate, being claimed by the treasury, the emperor generously yielded it to one Æmilius Lepidus, to whose family she seemed to belong (H). With the same disinterestedness he surrendered to Marcus Servilius the whole inheritance of Patuleius, a rich Roman knight, though part of it had been bequeathed

(G) Orosius takes this to be the earthquake mentioned by the evangelists as happening at the death of our Saviour; a notorious mistake! which, if admitted, would overset every system of chronology, it being past all doubt, that the earthquake, which overturned the twelve cities of Asia, happened in the fourth year of Tiberius's reign, and consequently was at least fourteen years prior to the other. According to Eusebius our Saviour was crucified the fourth year of the hundred and second olympiad; and the earthquake, which proved so fatal to Asia, happened, according to the same writer, the second year of the hundred and ninety-ninth olympiad. Orosius would fain corroborate the accounts of the sacred penmen with the testimonies of the Greek and Roman historians, and this is what led him into the abovementioned mistake.

(H) Tacitus does not tell us, that Æmilia Musa was a freedwoman; but from her Greek cognomen it is manifest, that such was her condition; for we have not one instance in history of a Roman assuming a Greek name. The prænomen of Æmilia she probably borrowed from some of the Æmilian family, to whom she had formerly belonged. Perhaps she was related to the famous Antonius Musa, the freedman and physician of Augustus. As she died intestate, her estate, supposing her to have been a liberta, or freedwoman, and to have no relations of her own then living, fell, according to the Roman law, to her former master and his heirs of blood. Si libertus intestato decesserit, patronum, aut filium, nepotemve ejus ad successionem vocari indubitatum est, says Julian (54); and Ulpian, Liberto intestato mortuo, primum suis deferri hereditatem verum est: si hi non fuerint, tunc patrono (55). But what title had the exchequer to her estate? It appears from this passage of Tacitus and the laws we have quoted, that if a freedman or woman had no surviving relations, and their former master's family was extinct, their estate fell to the prince. In the present case one Æmilius Lepidus, as heir of blood to Musa's former master, claimed her estate, and Tiberius generously surrendered it to him, though he could not plainly make good his claim.

bequeathed to himself. Neither could he ever be prevailed upon to accept legacies; but from his intimate friends, utterly rejecting the inheritances of such as were strangers to him, or out of hatred to their relations appointed him their heir. His bounties were, generally speaking, well placed; for as he readily relieved such senators as were by misfortunes reduced to poverty, so he excluded without pity from the senate those who had wantonly squandered away their estates in luxury and debauchery. Of this number were Vibidius Varro, Marius Nepos, Appius Appianus, Cornelius Sylla, Quintus Vitellius, and Attilius Buta. The latter was a man of pleasure, and used constantly to pass the night in revels and debaucheries, and sleep the greatest part of the day; by which course of life, being soon reduced to great indigence, he had recourse to the emperor for relief; but Tiberius rejected his petition, without returning him any other answer, than that he had awaked too late^k. But the applause Tiberius gained by his public and private bounties were counterbalanced, by the countenance he gave to informations and arraignments upon the law of violated majesty. Informers multiplied daily, the spirit of accusing grew common, and the dread of it universal, Apuleia Varilia, grand neice to Augustus by his sister (I), was accused by one of that infamous profession of having reviled the deified Augustus, Tiberius, and his mother Livia, and of having dishonoured with adultery the blood of the Cæsars, which, according to the construction Augustus had put upon the law of majesty, was high treason (K). Tiberius admitted the accusation, but shewed great moderation in the prosecution of the accused: for as to the adultery he said, that sufficient punishments had been already appointed for that crime by the Julian law, which was implicitly declaring, that it did not fall under the law of treason. As to the other crimes, he desired they might be distinguished: If Apuleia, said he, has uttered impious speeches against the deified Augustus, she must be condemned; but for her invectives against me I will not suffer her to be called to any account. But she has had the impudence to attack the reputation of your mother, replied one of the consuls. To this Tiberius returned no answer then, but the next time the senate met, he begged in his mother's name, that the words spoken against her might not be construed into treason. Hereupon she was tried only upon the words spoken against Augustus, and found guilty, but pardoned by Tiberius, who likewise begged a mitigation of her punishment for adultery; so that, instead of undergoing the severe punishments inflicted on that crime by the Julian law, of which hereafter, she was only removed two hundred miles from Rome; but Manlius, who had debauched her, was banished Italy and Africa^l. This same year, Tacfarinas, a native of Numidia, who had served among the Roman auxiliaries, having drawn his countrymen and the neighbouring nations into a revolt, was overthrown in a pitched battle by Furius Camillus, proconsul of Africa, who till that time had passed for a man quite unacquainted with the art of war. For this victory, which Camillus gained with one legion and a small body of auxiliaries, a handful of men, when compared with the numberless troops of the enemy, the ensigns of triumph were by the senate decreed to the conqueror; which honour, says the historian, did not prove fatal to him, because he was a man of extraordinary modesty, and chose to live in retirement^m. This year died, according to *Eusebius*ⁿ, Ovid at Tomos in Pontus, and, according to S. Jerom,

(I) Augustus had two sisters, viz. Octavia Major and Octavia Minor; but by which of these Apuleia Varilia was grand neice to Augustus, history does not inform us. Neither do we know of any writer who mentions the marriage or offspring of Octavia Minor. The other sister married Marcellus; and had by him two daughter, Marcella Major and Marcella Minor; one of these was, we conjecture, from what we read in Dion Cassius, married into the Apuleian family; for that writer calls Sextus Apuleius, who was consul the year Augustus died, συγγενὴς Αὐγούστῳ, that is, Augustus's kinsman (56). If we admit this conjecture, which is not ill grounded, Apuleia Varilia was daughter to an Apuleius by one of the Marcellæ, and consequently grand-neice to Augustus by his sister Octavia Major.

(K) Augustus, as Tacitus informs us (57), to a fault common between men and women gave the grievous name of sacrilege and treason; and as his daughter and grand-daughter were prostitutes, he punished, according to the law of treason, which he had thus wrested, all their adulterers and gallants either with death or exile. This sort of treason was, as Tacitus seems to insinuate, limited to the reigning house and the blood of the Cæsars; for that writer tells us, that Varilia, being nearly related to the emperor and guilty of adultery, was arraigned of high treason. Augustus found his account in declaring the gallants of the two Julias traitors; for as those traitors were very numerous, and considerable for their quality and credit, he had here a good pretence to get rid of many eminent citizens, who gave him uneasiness and jealousy.

Jerom°, the famous historian Livy at Padua, his native city. We are told, that Livia had designed the latter for præceptor to Claudius, the younger brother of Germanicus; but he was prevented by death from enjoying that honour. He was the last of those illustrious writers who once adorned the court of Augustus, and will render his age ever memorable. He has been our chief guide in the compiling of this history; for which we can make him no better return, than to repeat here what Seneca said of him many centuries since, that the genius of Livy was equal to the grandeur and majesty of the Roman empire^p.

sets out for the Levant:

TOWARDS the end of the year, Germanicus, leaving Rome, set out for the Levant with his wife Agrippina and his son Caius, surnamed Caligula. After a long and dangerous passage both in the Adriatic and Ionian seas, he arrived in Dalmatia, whither he had first steered his course to visit his brother Drusus, who, as we have related above, had been sent into that country. From Dalmatia by the coast of Illyricum he reached Nicopolis, which city Augustus had built on the Ambracian bay, in memory of his victory at Actium. There he entered upon his second consulship, having Tiberius, now the third time consul, for his colleague. The emperor held this dignity to the ides of May, and then resigned it to L. Seius Tuberus, who had served under Germanicus in quality of lieutenant^q. Germanicus spent a few days at Nicopolis to refit his fleet, and in the mean time viewed the bay of Actium, the spoils which Augustus his grandfather had consecrated after his famous victory, and the camp of Antony his great uncle. From thence he proceeded to Athens, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of honour (L). Next he sailed to Eubæa, and thence to Lesbos, where his wife Agrippina was delivered of Julia her last child: then he steered his course to the cities of Perinthus and Byzantium in Thrace, entered the straits of Propontis, and the mouth of the Pontic or Euxine sea, being desirous of seeing those places so much celebrated by fame. In his return he endeavoured to touch at the island of Samothrace, being fond of beholding the religious ceremonies practised there, of which we have spoken in our description of that island^r; but he was prevented from satisfying his laudable curiosity by contrary winds. Having therefore visited ancient Ilium, which gave birth to Rome, he regained the coast of Asia, and put in at Colophon, to consult there the oracle of the Clarian Apollo, of which we have given an account elsewhere^s. The priest, by whose mouth the god was believed to utter his oracles, is said to have foretold, but in dark and doubtful terms, the approaching death of Germanicus^t.

Piso and his wife set out
for Syria.

IN the mean time, Piso and his wife Plancina, hastening to the execution of their wicked designs, left Rome, and arriving at Athens, gave there the first proof of their hatred to Germanicus. For Piso, in a speech to the inhabitants, abused them in a most outrageous manner, not without an indirect censure upon Germanicus, for having debased the dignity of the Roman name in paying an excessive regard not to the Athenians, whose race was long since extinct, but to the mixt scum of different nations (M). Piso did not stay long at Athens, but being in haste to reach Syria before Germanicus, left the metropolis of Attica, and taking the shortest course, though the least safe, sailed through the Cyclades, and appeared off of Rhodes, soon after Germanicus had put condescension towards the Athenians, during his residence in their city, as did also Tiberius towards the Rhodians, walking up and down without a lictor or viator, and conversing familiarly with the Greeks, as if they had been his equals (58).

(L) The Athenians received Germanicus with extraordinary marks of esteem, which lest he should undervalue, as that nation made then but a very indifferent figure, they put him in mind of the glory of their ancestors, by carrying before him on tablets succinct accounts of their most famous exploits. By this means they enhanced the honours they had conferred on him, and, to use Tacitus's expression, dignified their flattery. On the other hand, Germanicus, out of respect to them, divesting himself in a manner of his power, appeared among them almost like a private citizen, being attended only by one lictor. By thus removing the ensigns of power, the Romans declared, that they treated those with whom they conversed, not as subjects, but as friends. Antony, as we have observed above, used the same

(M) Piso seems to us to have been not a little inconsistent with himself in his reproaches; for on one hand, he would not allow the present inhabitants of Athens to be descended from the ancient Athenians; and on the other, he charged them with all the crimes, of which the ancient Athenians had ever been guilty. He was also an enemy to their city, as Tacitus informs us, upon a private account, because they would not pardon at his request one Theophilus, condemned by the Areopagus for forgery.

a put in there; but being overtaken by a violent storm before he could enter the port, he was driven upon certain rocks, and must have inevitably perished, had not the good-natured Germanicus, though already informed of the invectives Piso had uttered against him at Athens, dispatched galleys to rescue him from the wreck. This generous kindness and humanity made no impression upon the hard-hearted Piso, who, having staid but one day with his benefactor, put to sea again in order to arrive in Syria before him. He no sooner reached his province, than he began to court the common soldiers by bounties and caresses, to form factions among the troops, to remove the ancient centurions and tribunes, and place in their room his own creatures, or men recommended only by their crimes: he permitted the soldiery either to live quite idle in the camp, or to ramble about, and commit with impunity all manner of disorders in the villages and cities. By this criminal indulgence Piso won the hearts of the idle and disorderly multitude to such a degree, that he was by them honoured with the title of Father of the legions. On the other hand, Plancina, forgetting the modesty peculiar to her sex, appeared often on horseback, assisted at the reviews, and was not ashamed, which in those days was thought very unbecoming in a woman, to be seen at the public exercises and military evolutions. She laid hold of these occasions to drop reproachful and injurious reflections on the conduct of Germanicus and Agrippina, in order to prejudice the minds of the soldiery against them. As to the officers, they were privately told, that their paying court to Germanicus and his wife would not recommend them to the favour of Tiberius. Though these proceedings were well known to the young prince, yet overlooking the unaccountable behaviour of Piso and Plancina, in pursuit of the glorious ends of his expedition, he hastened into Armenia, where with the approbation of the nobility in a great assembly he placed the diadem upon the head of Zeno, the son of Polemon king of Pontus, a friend and ally of the Romans. From Armenia he proceeded first to Cappadocia, and thence to Comagene, both which kingdoms, then vacant by the death of their sovereigns, he reduced to Roman provinces, appointing Quintus Veranius governor of the former, and Quintus Servæus of the latter. The pleasure which Germanicus reaped from thus successfully settling the affairs of the allies was greatly allayed, by the proud and haughty behaviour of Piso, who being commanded either to lead in person, or to send under the conduct of his son, part of the legions into Armenia, contemptuously neglected to do either. At last they met at Cyrrum, a city of Syria, and there had an interview, to which Germanicus admitted only a few of his intimate friends. He reproached the president of Syria with his strange conduct and haughty behaviour, and charged him, his wife, and their sons, with many imputations. On the other hand, Piso pretended surprise, but at the same time betrayed, even in submitting to Germanicus as his superior, great scorn and contempt; so that they parted declared enemies. Thenceforth Piso seldom appeared at the public assemblies, where Germanicus presided, or, if he did, it was only to contradict him. Not long after he gave a public proof of his malice, spite, and ill-will to Germanicus. For at a grand entertainment made by the king of the Nabatheans (N), golden crowns of great weight being presented to Germanicus and Agrippina, and such as were much lighter, to Piso and the rest of the guests, the haughty president, offended at this distinction, with an air of contempt threw his away; and, uttering many invectives against luxury, withdrew with these words; Rome abhors such scandalous luxury; I thought I had been invited to a banquet made for the son of a Roman prince, not of a Parthian king. Germanicus was highly incensed at this insult; but, the natural sweetness of his temper getting the better of his resentment, he took no notice of such a provoking behaviour. Soon after ambassadors arrived from Artabanus king of the Parthians to renew the ancient alliance between the two empires, and intreat Germanicus in their master's name to remove Vonones, who had been lately driven from the throne, out of Syria, lest he should find means, being so near to Parthia, to raise disturbances in that kingdom. Germanicus renewed the ancient alliance, and removed Vonones to Pompeiopolis, a maritime city of Cilicia, not so much in compliance with the request of Artabanus, as to separate him from Piso, with whom he

by Tiberius.

THE following year, Marcus Silanus and Lucius Norbanus being consuls, Germanicus travelled into Egypt to view the rarities and antiquities of that famous country. His journey proved very beneficial to the inhabitants, whom he relieved from a great famine, causing the granaries to be every-where opened, and the price of corn abated. He did not imagine, that the prohibition made by Augustus, extended to him; and nevertheless the jealous emperor in a letter to him censured him with great severity for presuming to enter that province, when Augustus among other secrets of state had strictly forbidden all senators and Roman knights of any figure to travel thither, without special licence^w. While Germanicus was thus passing the summer very agreeably in Egypt, Drusus was busy in sowing feuds among the Germans, and was therein attended with great success. For Maroboduus, king of the Suevians, whose power Rome dreaded, was this year driven out of his dominions, and obliged to pass the last eighteen years of his life at Ravenna in Italy. Catualda, whom Drusus had underhand stirred up against him, had the same fate; and recurring to the Romans for protection, was conveyed by them to Forum Julium, now Frejus, a colony in Narbonne Gaul. As both these chiefs were followed by great numbers of their countrymen, Tiberius, fearing they might disturb the quiet of the provinces, gave them settlements beyond the Danube, between the rivers Cusus and Marus, now the Wag and the March, on the frontiers of Moravia, appointing them for their king one Vannius, by nation a Quadian (O), who reigned over them for the space of thirty years, but was driven out in the reign of Claudius. With the same policy Tiberius circumvented and inticed to Rome Rhescuporis, a petty king of Thrace, who having murdered Cotys (P), his nephew, had seized on that part of the kingdom which Augustus had bestowed upon him. To deceive Rhescuporis, Tiberius employed Pomponius Flaccus (Q), whom he preferred to the government of Mæsia, as being one of the king's most intimate friends, and therefore better qualified to betray him; which he did accordingly, having inticed him into the Roman dominions, and then sent him under a strong guard to Rome, where he was accused before the senate by the widow of Cotys, and banished to Alexandria, where he was slain attempting to make his escape, or falsely charged with it. This part of Thrace was divided between Rhemetalces, the son of Rhescuporis, and the sons of the Cotys; but the latter being minors, Trebellienus Rufus, once prætor, was appointed governor of their share. About this time Vonones, who had been removed to Pompeiopolis in Cilicia, attempting to make his escape, was overtaken and killed by one Remmius, a veteran, to whose custody he had been committed (R).

^w TACIT. c. 59. SUET. in Tiber. c. 5.

(O) The country of the Quadi was at first bounded by Bohemia, the Danube, and the river March; but afterwards they extended their confines to the Sarmatian mountains in the neighbourhood of Er-law in Hungary. We shall have frequent occasion to speak of them in the reigns of Marcus Antoninus and Gallienus.

(P) Cotys was the son of Rhemetalces, upon whose death his kingdom was divided by Augustus between his son Cotys and his brother Rhescuporis, as we have related at length in our history of Thrace (61), to which we refer our readers for a full account of the transactions, we have only hinted at in this place. Cotys, though a Thracian, was not unacquainted with the muses; for to him Ovid inscribed the ninth elegy of his third book de Ponto, the unhappy poet being confined by Augustus to his kingdom.

(Q) Ovid mentions Pomponius Flaccus in one of his epistles inscribed to Græcinus:

*Præfuit his, Græcine, locis modo Flaccus, Et illo Ripa ferox Istris sub duce tuta fuit.
Hic tenuit Mysas gentes in pace fideli;
Hic arcu fissos terruit ense Getas* (62).

He was indeed a good soldier, but a man of a vile character. We have related above his flattering motion against the memory of Libo Drusus. He was preferred to the government of Mæsia on purpose to betray Rhescuporis, with whom he lived in close friendship, which he did not in the least scruple to do: and indeed Rhescuporis, who treacherously betrayed and murdered his own nephew, deserved to have no other friends but men of his own stamp, traitors and assassins. Pomponius was rewarded by Tiberius for his treachery with the government of Syria, in which employment he died (63).

(R) The circumstances of this unhappy prince's death are differently related by the ancients. Tacitus tells us, that having corrupted his keepers, he obtained leave of them to hunt in the neighbouring forests, and under that pretence attempted his escape to Armenia, with a design to pass from thence thro' the countries of the Albanians and Heniochians into Scythia, and there take sanctuary with one of the kings of that country, who was his kinsman. But the country people, being soon apprised of his flight, broke down the bridges of the Pyramus, a river of Cilicia; so that the prince, as the stream was not fordable,

IN the mean time, Germanicus, having satisfied his curiosity with viewing all the rarities and antiquities of Egypt, left that kingdom, and returned to Syria, where to his great surprise he found all the regulations he had made utterly abolished, and the orders he had left with the legions wholly neglected. Hereupon, no longer able to bear with such insults, he reproached Piso in very sharp and severe terms, which, notwithstanding his natural boldness, heightened by the confidence he placed in the protection of Tiberius, so frightened him, that he resolved to leave Syria and abandon his government. But while he was making the necessary preparations for his departure, Germanicus being taken ill, he thought it adviseable to wait the issue of the distemper. The young prince soon recovered, and, as he was universally adored, his recovery was celebrated at Antioch, where he then was, with public vows, sacrifices, and all possible demonstrations of the most sincere and unaffected joy. This proved new matter of rage to Piso, who, no longer master of himself, ordered his lictors to drive away the victims, to overturn the altars, and disperse the people assembled to celebrate the festival: a bold attempt this! and therefore Piso immediately after it leaving Antioch, withdrew to Seleucia. Soon after his departure Germanicus relapsed, and his persuasion that Piso had caused him to be poisoned heightened the violence of the distemper. Some of his domestics too had the imprudence to tell him, that on the floors and walls of his house had been found bones of human bodies taken out of the grave, ashes mixed with blood, charms, incantations, and the name of Germanicus engraved on sheets of lead. These reports and the frequent visits of persons, who were supposed to be Piso's creatures and to have been sent by him to watch the progress of the malady, doubled the young prince's anxiety and apprehensions. If my house, said he, is thus beset by treacherous friends in my life-time, what will become after my death of my unhappy wife, of my little children? Piso, impatient to command alone the legions, to govern alone the province, thought poison too slow in its operation, and therefore had recourse to charms and incantations. In the height of the resentment, which these reflections raised in his mind, he wrote a letter to Piso, utterly renouncing his friendship, according to the custom which obtained among the Romans, and was a solemn declaration that they intended to have no farther intercourse or communication with the person, whose friendship they thus renounced. Some authors add, that he commanded him to depart the province. Be that as it will, Piso soon after put to sea; but kept hovering upon the coast of his province, that he might return the sooner, should the government of Syria become vacant by the death of Germanicus. In the mean time, the violence of the malady somewhat abating, the young prince's friends began to entertain some hopes of his recovery. But short-lived was their joy; a sudden relapse threw them into despair; and the unfortunate Germanicus, finding his end approached, sent for his friends, and spoke to them in this manner: *Were I to die a natural death, yet should I have just cause to complain of the gods for thus snatching me from my relations, my children, and my country, in the flower of my age. But being thus brought to an untimely end by the malignity of Piso and his wife, the last favour I beg of you, my faithful friends, is, that you acquaint my father and brother, with what persecutions afflicted, I end a most miserable life by a most inglorious death. My relations, dependents, and even those whom envy provoked against me while living, will bewail my misfortune and hard fate, in thus falling by the perfidious arts and treachery of a woman, after having escaped so many dangers in war, and survived so many battles. But it is a duty incumbent upon you, my faithful friends, to do something more, than to commemorate my death with useless tears. fordable, was overtaken and seized on the banks of that river by Vibius Fronto, who had pursued him close with a body of horse. Soon after Remmius, his late keeper, came up, and, pretending to be transported with rage, ran him through with his sword. It was commonly believed, that Remmius, gained by the prince's presents, had connived at his escape, and therefore in an affected rage slew him through fear of being discovered (64). According to this account, Tiberius had no hand in his death. But Suetonius throws the whole blame of this cruel action upon the emperor. Vonones, says that writer, being driven out of his kingdom, retired to Antioch with great wealth, and there continued some time, thinking himself safe under the protection of the Roman people; but was in the end, contrary to all justice and faith, not only pillaged by the emperor's order, but most treacherously slain (65). We take the account of Tacitus to be the most genuine, that writer being no ways inclined to lessen or suppress the faults of any of the Cæsar's, but where truth, to which he ever pays the utmost regard, obliges him.

fulfil their last desires. If therefore you loved me rather than my fortune, you will revenge my death, you will complain to the senate, and prosecute the authors of my misfortunes as our laws direct. Shew to the Roman people my wife, the grand-daughter of Augustus, shew them our six children (S). This sight will move the conscript fathers to compassion, which will prove favourable to you, who accuse; and the accused, if they pretend wicked commands, either will not be believed, or not pardoned. At these words his friends, drowned in tears, taking the dying prince by the hand, all swore, that they would sooner lose their lives, than their revenge. Then turning to his wife, he conjured her by his memory, by their common children, and all the bonds of nuptial love, that she would lay aside her haughty spirit, and yield to the cruel shocks of fortune, lest on her return to the city she should by an unseasonable competition provoke those who were more powerful than herself. Thus much he spoke openly, other things he said in secret, whence it was conjectured, that they related to Tiberius, warning her perhaps to be upon her guard against his snares. However that be, the words he spoke to her in secret were his last; for he had scarce done, when he fainted away, and soon after expired, to the unexpressible grief of the province and all the neighbouring countries. His funeral was performed without any pomp, and his body, before it was burnt, exposed naked in the forum of Antioch, where the funeral pile was erected. Tacitus tells us, that it remained uncertain whether any marks of poison appeared on the body, the people, who saw it, giving opposite accounts, as they pitied Germanicus, or favoured Piso. But Suetonius says, that the body appeared covered with black and blue spots, that foam flowed from his mouth, and that his heart, the body being burnt, was found among the ashes, untouched by the flames; for the naturalists of those days believed, that the heart, if in the least touched or infected with poison, could not be consumed with fire. Vitellius, who afterwards charged Piso before the senate with the death of Germanicus, made use of this argument to prove, that the prince had been poisoned, and openly declared, that his heart was found intire among the ashes*. But after all, this argument, even allowing the truth of the fact, was no ways convincing, since in the opinion of the ancients the hearts of such as died of the malady called by the physicians Cardiaca passio, were equally proof against fire^y. The ashes of the deceased prince were carefully gathered by his wife Agrippina, and inclosed in an urn in order to be conveyed to Rome.

He is universally lamented.

SUCH was the end of the renowned Germanicus Cæsar, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, a prince no less famous for his military prowess, than his extraordinary accomplishments and inimitable virtues. The Roman people had so great an opinion of his rare talents and eminent qualities, that they were not afraid openly to declare on several occasions, that since the time of Scipio Africanus the gods had not blessed Rome with such a citizen. He was, says Tacitus, alike venerable, whether you saw him or heard him; and, without ever betraying the least arrogance or pride, yet supported the dignity of his high station. His complaisance to all, his humanity even to his enemies, his clemency, moderation, and engaging behaviour, won him the hearts not only of the Roman people, but of the barbarians themselves, who, though enemies to Rome, yet could not refrain their tears upon the first news they received of the death of Germanicus. Some of them at war with one another, and even with Rome, forbore hostilities for some time to bewail so great, so general a loss. Some of their princes cut off their beards, and shaved their wives heads, a token among them of the deepest sorrow. The proud monarch of the Parthians denied himself for some time the pleasure of the chase, without appearing at the ordinary entertainments given by the princes and lords of his court; which was a token of grief, like the shutting of the courts of justice among the Romans, and never used but upon some very extraordinary disaster. As for the people of Antioch, they carried their grief to impiety; for hearing that Germanicus was dead, in the transport of their sorrow they

(S) Germanicus had by Agrippina nine children; Nero, Drusus, Caius, surnamed Caligula, three other sons, who died infants, and three daughters, born successively in the space of three years, Agrippina, the mother of Nero, Drusilla, and Li villa, commonly called Julia. One of the sons that died was so beautiful a child, that Livia had caused him to be painted in the habit of Cupid, and consecrated the picture in the temple of Venus Capitolina, whence it was removed to Augustus's chamber, who used constantly to kiss it when he came in (66).

a they threw stones at their temples, overturned their altars, flung contemptuously their household gods out of doors, &c. nay, some of them, in the height of their grief and indignation, exposed and forsook their new-born children. Strange tokens of sorrow these ! It is more easy to conceive than express the consternation which the news of his death occasioned in Rome, where he was adored by all ranks of men (T). The first account of his illness alarmed the whole city ; but while they were impatiently waiting between hope and fear for farther intelligence, in the evening a report was spread, no body ever knew how, that he was recovered and in good health. Hereupon the people, not able to refrain their joy, flew immediately with victims and sacrifices to the capitol, impatient to discharge the vows they had made for his recovery. Tiberius, awaked out of his sleep with the noise of their mutual congratulations and loud shouts of joy, had the mortification to hear the following words echoed in every street, Salva Roma, salva patria, salvus Germanicus ; Rome is safe, our country is safe, since Germanicus is safe. But their joy was soon changed into the deepest sorrow ; certain news of his death arriving the next day, nothing was heard in the streets, nothing in the houses, but sighs, outcries, lamentations, and complaints. Without any orders from the prince or senate, all the courts of justice, the houses of the citizens, and shops, were shut, and the most frequented streets, no one appearing abroad, turned into a desert. The emperor by several edicts endeavoured to restrain these public expressions of grief ; but even the most cautious, not able to moderate their sorrow, in spite of all his edicts, continued to mourn, though invited by the festivals of December to mirth and jollity^z. His death was the more regretted, as he was commonly supposed to have been poisoned by Piso, at the instigation of Tiberius and Livia, the only two persons in the whole Roman empire, says Dion^a, who were not affected with so great, so general a loss (U).

AND now the government of Syria being vacant by the death of Germanicus and flight of Piso, the lieutenants of the legions and senators, who were at Antioch, committed the administration of the province to Cneius Sentius, who, at the suit of Vitellius and Veranius, two illustrious senators and friends to Germanicus, immediately seized

(T) He was to such a degree beloved by the people, says Suetonius (67), not only of Rome, but in the provinces, that when he departed or arrived at any place, such crowds attended him, that he was often in danger of being stifled in the throng. On his return from Germany, after having appeased the mutinous legions, all the prætorian cohorts went out to meet him, though two only had orders to pay him that compliment. As for the people, the road was thronged with persons of all ages and ranks for twenty miles distance (68). The people, says Tacitus (69), adored him, not only on account of his own good qualities, but likewise for the sake of his father Drusus, whose memory was dear to every true Roman, no one doubting, but he would have restored Rome to her ancient liberty, had he ever succeeded to the empire. Of Germanicus they entertained the same hopes ; and hence their partiality for him, before he was of an age to gain their affections by his personal qualities.

(U) Germanicus was not only an excellent commander, but an eloquent orator, and, if Ovid did not flatter him, one of the best poets of his age (70). He expressed his thoughts with great ease and elegance both in Greek and Latin, and pleaded several causes with extraordinary applause (71). He gave a specimen of his taste for poetry in some Greek comedies, which, as he was thorough master of that language, he wrote and published. S. Jerom and Lactantius tell us, that he translated into Latin a treatise of astronomy written originally in Greek by Aratus, under the title of Phænomena : but Vossius and Rutgerfius ascribe this translation to the emperor Domitian, who assumed the title of Germanicus, as we shall observe hereafter. But what above all gained the affections both of the Romans and foreigners was, the extraordinary sweetness of his temper, his affability, complaisance, and obliging behaviour, even towards the meanest of the populace, a behaviour no ways affected, but to him quite natural, as arising from a sincere desire of doing every one the best offices he could. Augustus was so taken with these good qualities, that he was long in suspense if Suetonius is to be credited (72), whether he should declare him his successor himself, or leave him to be adopted by Tiberius. Soon after his death Tiberius abandoned himself to all manner of cruelties, which added new lustre to the memory of the deceased prince, and made him the more regretted, every one concluding from thence, that, had he lived, the emperor would never have dared to commit such excesses (73). His military exploits we have related above ; and therefore shall only observe here, that after his death the inhabitants of Antioch compared him to Alexander the Great, as to the gracefulness of his person, the nobility of his descent, his age, the circumstances of his death, &c. and concluded, that if his authority had been uncontrolled he would have equalled that great warrior in the glory of his conquests, as he far surpassed him in prudence, clemency, moderation, and other virtues (74). And indeed, if he had not been stopt in the midst of his career and snatched away from his victorious legions, he would, in all likelihood, have completed the final reduction of Germany, already broken by so many overthrows.

seized and sent to Rome one Martina, a woman infamous in that province for poisoning, and greatly cherished by Plancina. In the mean time, Piso being overtaken at the island of Cous by a messenger, acquainting him with the death of Germanicus, did not so much as pretend to disguise his joy, but caused victims to be publicly slain, and repaired with thanksgiving to the temples for so signal a favour. His wife Plancina declared her joy in a manner still more arrogant and insulting; for she no sooner heard that Germanicus was dead, than, throwing off her mourning, which she wore for the death of her sister, she appeared in a dress adapted to gaiety and mirth. The centurions of the army, which Piso had commanded in Syria, flocked to him, assuring him, that the legions were ready to receive him, and reinstate him in the government, which had been injuriously taken from him. Hereupon Piso summoned a council of his friends to consult what measures he had best pursue; whether he should go with all speed to Rome, or return to Syria. His son Marcus Piso was for the former, but Domitius Celer, an intimate friend of Piso, declared for the latter and prevailed. But as Piso was well apprised, that Sentius would oppose him, which would give rise to a civil war in Syria, in order to bias Tiberius in his favour, he transmitted a letter to him, filled with invectives against the conduct, luxury, and pride of Germanicus; he enlarged on the injustice the young prince had done him in driving him out of his government, and concluded with acquainting the emperor, that he was preparing to return to his province, and resume with his former loyalty the care of the army. In the mean time, putting Domitius Celer on board a galley, he sent him before him into Syria, while he himself, having formed into companies the deserters, who flocked to him from all parts, and the servants who attended the camp, sailed over to the continent, where he had the good luck to intercept a body of new-raised soldiers on their march into Syria. He also wrote to the petty kings of Cilicia, ordering them to join him with all their forces. By this means, having got together a considerable body of men, he put to sea again, and steering along the coasts of Lycia and Pamphylia, met the fleet, which carried Agrippina with the ashes of her husband to Rome. Both fleets prepared for battle; but, as they were afraid of each other, they proceeded no farther than to hard words. Vibius Marfus, who commanded Agrippina's galleys, summoned Piso as a criminal to his trial at Rome, which summons he answered with derision and contempt. After this both fleets continued their course, the one for Italy, the other for Cilicia, where Piso made a descent, and seized a strong castle on the frontiers of Syria; which Sentius no sooner understood, than he flew thither at the head of his legions, overthrew Piso's men at the first onset, obliged him to take shelter behind the walls of the castle, and soon reduced him to such straits, that he offered to surrender the place, upon condition that Sentius would suffer him to remain there till the emperor's pleasure was known. But this being rejected, and the place reduced to the utmost extremity, he was forced to submit upon what terms Sentius thought fit to impose upon him, which were, that he should forthwith embark and return to Rome.

Honours decreed at Rome
to Germanicus.

DURING these troubles in the east, the senate was wholly taken up at Rome with inventing and decreeing new honours to Germanicus, in order to eternalize the memory of a prince so much beloved, and so well deserving of the empire. It was decreed, that his name should be inserted in the Salian hymns (W); that curule chairs should be placed for him among the priests of Augustus (X), and oaken crowns hung over them, as an acknowledgment of his having saved many citizens; that his statue in ivory

(W) This honour was peculiar to the gods; for till this time, only their names were sung in the Salian hymns. Afterwards M. Antonius, the philosopher, ordered the same honour to be conferred on his son Verus, as Spartianus informs us (74).

(X) It was deemed a particular mark of distinction at Rome for any one to have a fixed place allotted him at the public shews. This honour was in process of time improved by flattery, and extended not only to such as were absent, but even to the dead. P. Valerius Poplicola, who was made dictator in the year of Rome 409, first enjoyed the honour of being distinguished, though absent, with a fixed place in the circus, which was allotted to him and his posterity (75). The same honour was afterwards bestowed upon Julius Cæsar, M. Marcellus, and others, with this improvement; that curule chairs with golden crowns should be placed for them in the circus and theatre, even after their death to preserve their memory (76). The emperor Severus caused three curule chairs to be placed in the theatre to honour thereby the memory of Pertinax (77). To Germanicus was probably decreed but one chair in each of the three theatres.

a ivory should be carried before the procession at the Circensian games; an honour peculiar to the gods and such men as were deified; that none but one of the Julian family should be appointed flamen or augur in his room, &c. To these honours triumphal arches were added, one at Rome, another on the banks of the Rhine, and a third upon mount Amanus in Syria, with inscriptions of his exploits, and a declaration that he died for the republic; a sepulchre at Antioch, where his body was burnt; and a tribunal at Epidaphne, where he ended his life (Y). Many statues were raised to him, and many places appointed for paying him divine honours. Some were for decreeing to him, as a great master of eloquence, a golden shield, remarkable for its bulk (Z); but this Tiberius would not allow, saying, that in eloquence no regard was to be had to the dignity of the person, and that therefore he himself would dedicate a shield equal in size to those of other orators, it being sufficient glory for him to be ranked amongst the ancient writers. The Roman knights in their turn, to honour the memory of the deceased prince, agreed to change the name of that body of horse, which, being composed of the young nobility, was styled The Squadron of the juniors, and call it thenceforth The Squadron of Germanicus, appointing at the same time, that the effigies of Germanicus should be carried before the said squadron, as their standard, at their public reviews, which were annually made on the ides of July. In the height of the public grief Livia, called also Livilla, sister to Germanicus and wife to Drusus, was delivered of male twins, which proved such matter of joy to Tiberius, that he could not help boasting to the senate, that to no Roman of the same rank had ever before been born two sons at a birth. But the increase of Drusus's family doubled the grief of the people, who saw with regret that of their beloved Germanicus removed farther and farther from the throne^d. This same year, severe laws were enacted by the senate to restrain the lewdness of women, and it was provided, that no woman should prostitute herself, whose father, grandfather, or husband were Roman knights. The fathers were prompted to make this prohibition by the monstrous impudence of one Vistilla, who, though a lady of great quality and born of a prætorian family, was not ashamed to appear before the ædiles, and publicly declare herself a prostitute, pursuant to an ancient law, which obliged all women, who became venal, to acknowledge their infamy before the above-mentioned magistrates. By this public declaration the ancient Romans had thought prostitutes sufficiently punished; but Vestilla making no account of such a chastisement, and the fathers fearing other women of distinction might follow her example, they published the above-mentioned prohibition, and at the same time banished the infamous Vistilla to the

(Y) Tacitus tells us, that he died at Epidaphne, a celebrated place in the neighbourhood of Antioch, of which we have spoken in our history of Syria; but all other writers agree, that he ended his days in the city of Antioch (78).

(Z) It was an ancient custom among the Romans to set up the images of illustrious men in the curia and in their temples. Thus the image of Scipio Africanus was set up in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and that of Cato the censor in the curia or senate-house, as we read in Valerius Maximus (79). Augustus caused the images of all those Romans, who before his time had eminently distinguished themselves, in the arts either of peace or war, to be set up in the curia, allotting to each profession its proper place. Thus Tacitus tells us, that the image of Hortensius was placed amongst the orators. The like honour the fathers were now for decreeing to Germanicus, as to one of the masters of eloquence. These images are called by the ancients shields (80), because engraved in gold, silver, or brass, in the form of a shield. This is the common opinion; though some writers think, that in Latin they ought not to be called clypei, which word signifies a shield; but clupea, that is, engraved work, from the ancient word cluere to engrave. This derivation Pliny despises as a fond conceit of the grammarians: Scutis qualibus ad Trojam pugnatum est, says he, continebantur imagines, unde & nomen habuere clypeorum, non, ut perversa Grammaticorum subtilitas voluit, a cluendo. However, Livy calls them clupea; clupea, says he, de columnis dempsit (81). Frequent mention is made of these shields in ancient inscriptions: Lipsius quotes the following: Huic. Decuriones. Funus. Publicum. Statuam. Equestrem. Clypeum. Argenteum. Locum. Sepulturae. Decreverunt. These shields were sometimes hung up to preserve the memory of the deceased without any effigies, and only with the names of the persons, by whom and to whose honour they were offered (82). Such shields were sometimes set up by private persons to honour the memory of their ancestors without any order or decree of the senate; for Pliny in speaking of Appius Claudius, who was consul in the year of Rome 259, says, that he was the first, who, though a private person, set up in public and consecrated the shields of his ancestors (83).

the island of Seriphos. Measures were also taken by the fathers for utterly extirpating the Jewish and Egyptian ceremonies; and by a decree of the senate four thousand young men, all descended from manumitted slaves, and infected, says Tacitus, with that superstition, were inrolled and transported to Sardinia to suppress the robbers who infested that island: if they perished through the badness of the air, the senate thought it would be no great loss (A). The rest were ordered to depart Rome, and all Italy, if within a stated time they did not renounce their national ceremonies. The same year, Tiberius gave several instances of generosity, which ought not to be omitted. Occia, who had presided over the vestals fifty-seven years with great reputation of sanctimony, being dead, he represented to the senate, that another virgin was to be chosen in her room; and Fonteius Agrippa and Asinius Pollio offering their daughters, he thanked them both for their regard to the commonwealth, but preferred Pollio's daughter, for no other reason, but because her mother had had but one husband: to comfort the other who was postponed, he gave her for her fortune a thousand great sesterces. Corn being very dear, he settled the price which the buyer was to pay; and that the seller might not lose the advantage naturally arising from the scarcity of grain, he took upon himself to pay two nummi, that is, fourteen pence of our money, a bushel over and above the fixed price. For these bounties the people offered him again the title of Father of his country, which he rejected, and at the same time sharply rebuked such as styled him lord, shewing thereby, says Tacitus, that though he dreaded liberty, yet he could not abide flattery. The same author tells us, upon the authority of the writers of those times, some of them senators, that letters were read in the senate from Adgandestrius, prince of the Catti, offering to dispatch Arminius, provided poison

(A) Josephus complains of this severity; for, according to him, the four thousand men sent into Sardinia were all Jews. Suetonius agrees with Josephus. Tiberius, says that writer, put a stop to foreign ceremonies, and likewise to the Egyptian and Jewish rites, obliging all those, who were inclined to such superstitions, to burn the furniture belonging to their religion. He listed the Jewish youth, and sent them into the most pestilent and unwholesome provinces under his command, obliging the remainder of that nation, and such as followed their footsteps, to depart the city upon pain of perpetual slavery. Thus far Suetonius (84). To the expulsion of the Jews an impostor of that nation gave occasion, who being obliged to fly his country for a breach of the laws, retired to Rome, where he set up for an expounder of the law of Moses, and, with the assistance of three others, all of the same stamp with himself, gained over to the Jewish religion one Fulvia, the wife of Saturninus, a woman of great distinction. The zealous proselyte was easily persuaded to make a rich present of purple and gold to the temple of Jerusalem, which she delivered to her directors; but they, instead of sending the offering to Jerusalem, converted it to their own use. This Fulvia disclosed to her husband, and he to the emperor, who thereupon ordered all the Jews to depart Rome, after having listed four thousand of their youth and sent them into Sardinia. Josephus tells us, that such as scrupled serving in the Roman army were severely punished (85). At the same time, the Egyptians were driven out of Rome, and their rites utterly suppressed: they had been formerly forbidden by Augustus (86), but at this time that prohibition was renewed and enforced, on occasion of a very scandalous story related at length by Josephus. Decius Mundus, a young Roman knight, falling in love with a married lady of the first quality in Rome, by name Paulina, and not being able to prevail upon her, as she was a mirror of chastity, even with the offer of two hundred thousand drachmas, to comply with his unlawful desires, had recourse to the priests of the god Isis. These pretending that the god Anubis, to whose worship Paulina was greatly addicted, was in love with her, persuaded her to pass a night in the temple of that deity; when Mundus, by paying down twenty-five thousand drachmas to the priests, and promising them the like sum, obtained what he had in vain applied for to Paulina herself with the tender of two hundred thousand drachmas. The next day the deluded lady bragging of the honour done her by the Egyptian deity, some believed her, while others ascribed the whole to the strength of her imagination. But three days after Mundus meeting her, I thank you, Paulina, said he, for saving me two hundred thousand drachmas, and granting me at the same time, not under the name of Mundus, but of Anubis, the favours which I would willingly have purchased at so dear a rate. At these words the virtuous Paulina was thunder-struck; she burst into tears, tore her garments, and hastening to her husband, she acquainted him how she had been abused and betrayed by the priests; and, drowned in tears, besought him to exert himself in the prosecution of the priests, by whom her simplicity and credulity had been thus enormously abused. Hereupon her husband complained to the emperor, relating to him every particular of so base an action; and he, upon a narrow enquiry into the fact, and a strict examination of the priests, finding them guilty, ordered them all to be crucified, the temple of Anubis to be pulled down, his statue to be thrown into the Tiber, the Egyptian rites to be utterly suppressed, and all who professed them to be banished Rome. Ida, the freedwoman of Mundus's father, who first advised him to apply to the priests, for which advice she received fifty thousand drachmas, was crucified with the priests; but Mundus himself was only banished, Tiberius exempting him, says Josephus, from a more severe punishment in regard of his passion, which was so violent, that, finding the chaste Paulina proof against all temptation, he had resolved to starve himself to death (87).

a were sent him for that purpose : to which Tiberius returned this answer ; that it was not the custom of the Roman people to take vengeance on their enemies by treachery, but openly and in the field ; wherein he gained equal glory, says our historian, with the ancient Roman commanders, who would not suffer king Pyrrhus to be poisoned, but disclosed to him the whole plot. Arminius, however, after the departure of the Romans, and expulsion of his rival in power Maroboduus, attempting to inflame his country, fell by the treachery of his kindred in the thirty-seventh year of his age. Tacitus calls him, not undeservedly, the deliverer of Germany ; for under his conduct the Germans shook off the Roman yoke, and long maintained their liberties, in spite of the utmost efforts of the generals sent from Rome to bring them again under subjection. He commanded the troops of his country twelve years, during which time he was often defeated, but always found means to repair his losses, and renew the war with fresh vigor. His name in Tacitus's time was still celebrated by his countrymen in their songs ^f. Pliny observes, that this year on the eighth of July a new island was formed near that of Delos in the archipelago ^g.

In the beginning of the next year, M. Valerius Messalinus and M. Aurelius Cotta being consuls, Agrippina arrived at Brundisium with the ashes of her deceased husband, and was received at her landing with tokens of the deepest sorrow, not only by the inhabitants of that, but of all the neighbouring cities, who had flocked to Brundisium to condole with her on so melancholy an occasion. She no sooner appeared on the shore, attended by her two children, Caius and Julia, with the funeral urn in her arms and her eyes fixed on the ground, than the whole multitude burst into tears ; nothing was heard but groans, outcries, and lamentations, friends, relations, strangers, being equally affected at the sight of so moving an object. Tiberius had dispatched two prætorian cohorts to attend the remains of the deceased prince from Brundisium to Rome, and ordered the magistrates of Calabria, Apulia, and Campania to pay their last offices to the memory of his son. The urn therefore was carried on the shoulders of the tribunes and centurions, and accompanied by the chief magistrates of the places through which it passed, the lictors of the deceased general marching before it with their fasces reversed (B). When the funeral procession arrived at any Roman colony, the nobility in their best apparel, and the people in mourning, flew victims, erected altars, and burnt perfumes, testifying with loud lamentations their common sorrow. The nearer they drew to Rome, the greater was the concourse. At Terracina they were met by Drusus, the son of Tiberius, by Claudius, Germanicus's younger brother, and by such of his children as had been left at Rome. At some distance from the city the conscript fathers, with the consuls at their head, and immense crowds of people, lined the road, through which the procession passed, all drowned in tears and testifying their grief with sighs, in which flattery had no share, every one being well apprised how real was the joy, how insincere was the grief of Tiberius. Neither he nor his mother Livia appeared abroad, either because they thought it below their grandeur to lament publicly, or through fear of betraying in their countenances some marks of joy amidst the public lamentations (C). (B) This custom of carrying the fasces reversed in token of grief is likewise mentioned by Pedo in his elegy to Livia ;

Not only the lictors carried their fasces reversed, but the soldiers their arms, as appears from the funeral procession, which Virgil describes on occasion of the death of Pallas :

It is well known, that Virgil introduces in his poem the customs that prevailed at Rome.

(C) Tacitus tells us, that neither in any historian, nor in the journals of the city, he could find, that Antonia, the mother of Germanicus, bore any part in the funeral, though Agrippina, Drusus, Claudius, and the other relations of the deceased, were there recorded by name. Perhaps she was prevented by sickness ; perhaps she was sensible, that she would have sunk under the weight of her sorrow ; or else she was detained by Tiberius, that he and Livia might seem to have followed her example, and the people not think it strange, that the grand-mother and uncle had absented themselves when the mother had not appeared ; but ascribe their absence to the same cause, viz. an equal affliction.

remains of the deceased were repositied in the tomb of Augustus, the whole city attending them to the field of Mars, where that stately monument was erected, and crying aloud in the height of their grief, that the republic was utterly ruined, that no farther hope remained, as if they had forgot by whom they were governed. But nothing offended Tiberius so much as the affection which the people shewed for Agrippina, calling her, The ornament of her country, the only blood of Augustus, a true pattern of ancient virtue, and at the same time imploring the blessings of the gods for her issue, that they might outlive the persecutions of the wicked. As the people set no bounds to their grief, he thought proper to check it by a public decree, exhorting them to resume their several vocations, and, as the Magnesian games were at hand, to indulge themselves in their usual diversions, now they had by their lamentations given sufficient vent to their grief. He urged the examples of the deified Julius and the deified Augustus, who upon the loss, the former of an only daughter, the latter of his beloved grandsons, had both got the better of their sorrow; he put them also in mind of the constancy with which the Roman people had formerly borne the slaughter of their armies, the death of their generals, and the utter destruction of many noble families, adding, that princes were mortal, but the commonwealth eternal. The emperor's decree was immediately complied with, as to the external appearance; the courts of justice were opened again, public affairs resumed, and an end put to the vacation. Drusus, who was come to Rome on purpose to attend the funeral, returned to the army in Illyricum; which he had scarce reached, when Piso appeared in the camp, hoping to find the young prince less incensed against him for the death of a brother, than favourable to him for the removal of a rival. Drusus at their first meeting told him, that if the crime laid to his charge was true, he would be the first to revenge it; but that he hoped the current report was groundless, and that the death of Germanicus would be pernicious to none. This declaration he made in public, and carefully avoided all private interviews with Piso. This artful answer and the cautious behaviour of a youth, otherwise frank and unwary, prompted most people to believe, that he had been instructed beforehand by his father how to behave in so nice and critical a conjuncture. Young Piso, whom the father had sent to Rome with instructions how to soften the emperor, was received very kindly by him, and honoured with such presents as were usually bestowed on the sons of governors, when they returned from the provinces. This he did to shew himself utterly unbiassed. In the meantime, news was brought, that Martina, famous for the art of poisoning, who, as we have related above, had been sent in custody towards Rome, was found dead at Brun-dusium with poison bound up in the knots of her hair, but without any marks of poison on her body. Whether her death was accidental, or procured by private orders from Tiberius or Piso, was never known. By her death the accusers were deprived of their chief evidence; for she had ever lived in close confidence with Plancina, and the senate hoped to extort from her, by force of torments, a sincere confession of the crime and a discovery of her accomplices. Not long after Piso arrived at Rome with his wife Plancina, and landed, as he had imbarqued, at Narnia upon the Nar, and thence sailed into the Tiber, near the tomb of Augustus, where the ashes of Germanicus had been lately repositied. This with their insolent behaviour heightened the indignation of the people; for they both appeared with gay countenances, and, attended with a numerous retinue, he of clients and domestics and she of women, proceeded to their stately palace, which overlooked the forum, and was on occasion of their return magnificently adorned and illuminated. The night they passed in rejoycings, having invited their friends and relations to a great banquet, with which they solemnized their safe arrival. But the very next day Piso was arraigned by Vitellius, Veranius, and others, who had attended Germanicus, before the emperor; who, after having heard in a private audience the charge of the accusers and the defence of the accused, referred the intire cause to the senate, being well apprised of the reflections that would be cast upon him, whether he condemned or absolved the accused. When the senate met for this great trial, Tiberius made a speech full of affected moderation; he told the conscript fathers, that Piso had been his father's lieutenant and friend, and lately appointed by himself, at the direction of the senate, to assist Germanicus in settling the affairs of the east: whether he had there by his haughtiness and opposition provoked the young prince, and rejoiced at his death, or wickedly procured it, they were then to judge with unbiassed minds. "If you find him guilty, said the emperor, of having only exceeded the bounds of his commission, a “ sion, and not submitted to the will of his general, or even of having betrayed joy at “ his death and my affliction, I shall ever hate him and banish him from my house ;

 “ but cannot for private injuries exert the prince, and condemn him as a criminal. But “ if you find him guilty of Germanicus’s death, it is incumbent upon you to revenge “ it, and afford his children, and us his father and grandmother, the satisfaction of “ seeing him punished for such an enormous attempt. Examine too with great care, “ whether he endeavoured to debauch the army, whether he countenanced licentious“ nefs in the soldiery, or attempted to recover the province by force of arms. I have “ just cause to be offended with the indiscreet zeal of his accusers : to what purpose “ strip the corps, and expose it naked to the eyes of the multitude ? Why was it prob “ claimed among foreign nations, that he was taken off by poison, if all this was “ still doubtful and remains to be examined ? I am grieved for the death of my son, “ and ever shall lament so great a loss ; but far be it from me any ways to hinder the “ accused from doing all he can to shew his innocence, or even from exposing and lay“ ing open the faults of Germanicus, if he had any faults. I beseech you to proceed “ with the same impartiality : let not your regard to me mislead you to take crimes for “ proved, because they are committed against me. As for the accused, if he has any “ friends or relations, let them exert their eloquence, and use their utmost endeavours
 “ to clear him from the crimes laid to his charge. Let his accusers take the same pains “ to convict him of the charge which is brought against him : by this means we shall c “ be able to judge impartially, to absolve the accused, if innocent ; to condemn him, “ if guilty.” Two days were then allowed to the accusers to make good their charge, and six days after three to the accused to make his defence. The articles of impeachment, brought against Piso by Servæus, Veranius, and Vitellius, were, that he had permitted a general licentiousness in the army, and corrupted the common soldiers to that degree, that he was styled by the most profligate father of the legions ; that he had abused in a most outrageous manner the friends of Germanicus ; and lastly, that by poison and witchcraft he had destroyed Germanicus himself, and borne arms against the commonwealth ; insomuch, that they had been obliged to engage and defeat him before they could bring him to his trial. He defended himself but weakly against d these accusations ; only the charge of poisoning Germanicus could not be sufficiently proved. However, the senate could not be persuaded, that Germanicus had died a natural death ; and at the same time the people were heard crying aloud at the door of the senate-house, that though the fathers absolved the accused, yet he should not escape the punishment due to his crimes ; nay, they had already overturned the statues of Piso, and would have dragged them to the scalæ Gemoniæ, the place where criminals were executed, had they not been rescued by Tiberius’s orders. These disturbances induced the senate to put off the final decision of the cause ; and Piso, that he might not be exposed to the outrages of the incensed multitude, was conveyed to his house in a litter, followed by a tribune of a prætorian cohort, whom some looked upon as a guard for his safety, others as the minister of his death.

e THE people were no less incensed against Plancina than Piso ; but she, having by the secret solicitations of Livia secured her own pardon, began by degrees to drop her husband, and to make a separate defence, though she had declared from the beginning, that she would employ all her interest and favour with Livia in behalf of both, and that by the same sentence they should both be either absolved or condemned.
 This so disheartened Piso, who had placed more confidence in the interest of his wife, than his own, that he was some time in suspense whether he should make any farther defence. But his son prevailed upon him to appear once more before the senate, and try whether he could move the fathers or Tiberius to compassion. But the senate proving f implacable, and the emperor carefully avoiding to shew even in his countenance the least mark of tenderness towards him in his distress, he returned home, as if he designed to prepare for his farther defence against the next day. But, instead of that, he wrote a letter to the emperor, which he sealed and delivered to his freedmen.
 He then bathed, according to the Roman custom, and supped as usual. His wife kept him company till the night was far spent, and then retired ; which she had no sooner done, than Piso ordered the door of the chamber to be shut, and was found at break of day with his throat cut, and his sword lying by him. Tacitus tells us, that while he was a youth, he heard from some old men, that a bundle of writings was frequently seen in Piso’s hands during his trial, which contained, as his friends constantly affirmed, the letters of Tiberius, ordering him to dispatch Germanicus.

Tiberius favours Plancina.

Who is absolved.

Tiberius favours the children and memory of Piso.

These letters, said they, he designed to lay before the senate and accuse the prince; but was diverted from it by Sejanus, who in the emperor's name promised him his pardon: they added, that Piso did not fall by his own hand, but by that of an executioner sent privately by Tiberius to dispatch him. Our historian tells us, that he dares affirm neither of these things, but yet thought himself obliged to acquaint his readers with such relations (D). Tiberius fearing the death of Piso might be imputed to him, as if he had procured it to prevent farther discoveries, examined his domestics in the senate about the circumstances of his death, and then read the letter which Piso had written to him, imploring his protection for his sons, whom he cleared from having any share in his late conduct, whatever it were. Of his wife Plancina he said nothing. One of his sons had remained at Rome, and therefore could be no ways necessary to his father's guilt; the other had indeed attended him into Syria, and served under him in the war he raised in the province; but Tiberius would not allow that to be imputed to him as a crime, alledging the orders of his father, which, he said, a son could not disobey. As for Plancina, who was supposed to have been more guilty than her husband, Tiberius openly declared, not without blushing and betraying great confusion in his speech and countenance, that at the earnest intreaties of his mother he could not help pleading for her and assisting her in her trial. However, Vitellius and Veranius did not drop the prosecution; but after they had in a trial, which lasted two days, made the charge appear pretty plain, and silenced those who pleaded for the accused, she escaped the punishment due to her crime by the indulgence of the servile senate. For the consul Aurelius Cotta being first asked his opinion by the emperor, who collected the voices himself, answered in the following terms: I am of opinion, that the name of Piso be razed out of the consular fasti or tables, part of his estate forfeited, and part granted to his son Cneius upon his changing that name; that his son Marcus be driven out of the senate, banished for ten years, and allowed out of his father's estate only fifty thousand great sesterces; as to Plancina, I think she should be pardoned at the request of Livia. This sentence seemed too rigorous to the emperor with respect to Piso's children and memory; he therefore would not allow his name to be struck out of the consular tables, saying, that the name of Marc Antony, who had made war upon his country, and that of his son Julius Antonius, who had by adultery dishonoured the house of Augustus, remained still there. He likewise delivered Marcus Piso from the infamy of being divested of his dignity, and left him his paternal inheritance intire. He also opposed the motion of Valerius Messalinus, who was for erecting a golden statue in the temple of Mars the avenger, and that of Cecina Severus, who proposed building an altar to Revenge. Such monuments, he said, were fit to be raised for victories over a foreign enemy; but domestic evils were either to be buried in oblivion, or remembered with grief (E). As the emperor had shewn great favour to Plancina and her children, to maintain the opinion of an impartial judge, a few days after the trial he moved in the senate, that Vitellius, Veranius, and Servæus, who had accused Piso, might be rewarded; and they were accordingly preferred to pontifical honours^h.

THE death of Germanicus being thus revenged, Drusus, who had returned from Illyricum to be present at the trial, was honoured with an ovation, which, though decreed him the year before for having settled peace in Germany, he had postponed till the trial was over. A few days after died his mother Vipsania, of all the children

(D) Suetonius writes, that he narrowly escaped being torn in pieces by the populace, and was condemned to death by the senate (90). Dion says, that he was brought into the senate by Tiberius himself, who desired, that he might have time to prepare for his defence, and that he laid violent hands on himself. But, according to Tacitus, the sentence was not awarded against him till after his death; neither does that writer say, that he laid violent hands on himself, but only that he was found with his throat cut, and his sword lying by him.

(E) Messalinus added to his motion, that public thanks should be rendered to Tiberius, Livia, Anto- nia, Agrippina, and Drusus, for having revenged the death of Germanicus, but omitted to mention Claudius the brother of the deceased prince. Whereupon Lucius Asprenas asked him, whether he had omitted him designedly; and then Messalinus subjoined the name of Claudius too. This shews how little regard was then paid to Claudius: and indeed he was despised and neglected by all, and thought incapable of any public employment. But for all this, fortune reserved the sovereignty to him, and we shall see him one day, notwithstanding the weakness both of his body and mind, master of the Roman empire.

 the rest, that a numerous body of the enemy was soon after put to flight by a detachment of no more than five hundred veterans, and their numerous army utterly routed by another detachment commanded by Apronius Cestianus, the proconsul's son.
 b This year, Æmilia Lepida, descended from one of the most illustrious families in Rome, and besides great grand-daughter to Sylla and Pompey, and once designed for the wife of Lucius Cæsar and for the daughter-in-law of Augustus, was charged with imposing The trial of crime. Her brother Manius Lepidus undertook her defence, Tiberius behaving on this occasion with such subtlety, that it was impossible to discover his real sentiments.

 At first he begged the senators not to meddle with the articles of treason, and soon after charged Marcus Servilius to produce those very proofs which he pretended to suppress: He would not suffer the slaves of Lepida to be examined by torture as to c the articles of treason, nor his son Drusus, though consul elect, to vote first, lest the rest should think themselves obliged to follow his example. However, the slaves of Lepida confessing upon the rack, that she had imposed upon her husband a supposititious child, and even attempted to poison him, she was condemned to perpetual banishment; but at the request of Scaurus, who had had a daughter by her, either before her marriage with Quirinius or after her divorce, her estate was not confiscated. After she was condemned, Tiberius told the senators, that he had learnt from the slaves too of her husband Quirinius, that she had attempted to poison him.
Suetonius tells us, that she had committed the crimes, for which she was at this time d condemned, twenty years before; but Tacitus only says, that she was prosecuted by her husband even after their divorce; which drew compassion upon her, however guilty and infamous. This year Tiberius softened the rigor of the law Papia Poppea, The severity of which, as we have related above, loaded those with heavy fines who did not marry the law Papia at a certain age. But great numbers of Romans chusing rather to pay the said fines, Poppea soft- than incur themselves with a family, so that the law served only to enrich the ened.
 exchequer, Tiberius with great disinterestedness appointed five persons, who had been formerly consuls, five who had been prætors, with ten other senators, to examine all the regulations made before his time against celibacy. These explained the intricacies of the laws enacted against a single life, which the pleaders, that is, the lawyers of those days, laid hold of to undo many noble families; and at the same e time they qualified the rigor of the ancient law by lessening the fines, which, according to the regulations of Augustus, every man was to pay, who did not marry at a certain age. This, as Tacitus observes, was some relief to the city, the number of laws proving as great an evil as the crimes, for the restraining of which they were enacted. Towards the end of this year, Nero, Germanicus's eldest son, being now of age, Tiberius recommended him to the senate, that he might stand for the quæstor-ship five years sooner than the laws directed, which, as we may well imagine, was readily granted, as also a place in the college of pontiffs. The first day he entered the forum in his manly robe, a donative of corn and money was distributed by Tiberius to the populace, overjoyed to see a son of Germanicus now of age. Their

(F) Agrippa had three wives, viz. Pomponia, the daughter of Atticus, Marcella the daughter of Octavia, and Julia. By Pomponia he had Vipsania the mother of Drusus, mentioned here by Tacitus; Marcella likewise brought him children, if Suetonius is to be credited; but as we find no farther mention made of them, we conclude, that they died very young: by Julia he had five children, Caius and Lucius Cæsars, Agrippa Posthumus, Agrippina, and Julia. Caius and Lucius were supposed to have been poisoned; Agrippina perished by hunger, and Posthumus Agrippa by the sword; but as to Julia, she died a natural death, according to the account which Tacitus himself gives of it (91); though he tells us in this place, that Vipsania was of all the children of Agrippa the only one who died a natural death.

Death of Drusus, nephew to Germanicus.

Tiberius goes into Campania

joy was doubled by his marriage with Julia the daughter of Drusus; but soon after the people saw with the utmost concern and indignation the daughter of Sejanus betrothed to young Drusus, the nephew of Germanicus and son of Claudius, who reigned after Caligula. By this match the Claudian family seemed in a manner degraded, and Sejanus, whose power and credit with the emperor was already too great, raised still higher. But a few days after Drusus died at Pompeii by a very strange accident, being choaked by a pear, which stuck in his throat, as in play he threw it up in the air, and caught it in his mouth ⁱ.

THE following year, Tiberius was consul the fourth time, and Drusus the second; but Tiberius, soon after he had resumed the fasces, under pretence of his health, retired to Campania, either with a design to accustom himself by degrees to live out of Rome, or to leave Drusus the honour of discharging that office alone. Not long after his departure he wrote to the senate, acquainting them, that Tacfarinas had raised new disturbances in Africa, and exhorting them to chuse a proconsul to be sent into that province equal to the war with which it was threatened. Upon the receipt of this letter the fathers met, but, instead of naming a governor themselves, decreed, that the appointment of a proper person for the government of Africa should be left to the emperor. On this occasion Cæcina Severus made a speech against any magistrate's carrying his wife with him into his province; but, being opposed by Valerius Messalinus and Drusus himself, his motion was over-ruled (G). The next time the senate met, a letter was presented to them from Tiberius, wherein, after complaining of them for casting upon him the care of all public affairs, he named M. Lepidus and Junius Blæsus, leaving it to them to chuse for the proconsulate of Africa which of the two they pleased. Hereupon Blæsus was chosen, Lepidus excusing himself with great earnestness, and pleading his infirmities, the tender age of his children, and a daughter who was marriageable. There was another reason too, says Tacitus, which, though not mentioned by Lepidus, was understood: Blæsus was uncle to Sejanus, and therefore

ⁱ TACIT. c. 29. SUET. in Claud. c. 27.

(G) Cæcina introduced this motion with a long preamble, that he lived in perfect concord with his wife, and had six children by her; but nevertheless had practised himself, though he had served forty years in different provinces, what he offered to the public. He said, that it had not without cause been provided of old, that women should not be carried into the countries of confederate or foreign nations, since they introduced luxury in peace, retarded war with their fears, and made the Roman armies on their march resemble those of the barbarians. Women, said he, are not only tender and unfit to bear fatigues; but, if not restrained, cruel, ambitious, and greedy of power. They even march among the soldiers, and are attended and obeyed by the centurions. A woman has lately acted the chief part at the exercise of the cohorts and the evolutions of the legions. Besides, you well know, conscript fathers, that as often as any of the magistrates are accused of plundering the provinces, their wives are always concerned in the guilt. To them the most profligate in the provinces immediately apply; by them all affairs are undertaken and transacted. They are no less respected than their husbands, have the same court paid them, are equally obeyed, nay more readily obeyed, their orders being generally more imperious. This authority in women was formerly restrained by the Oppian and other laws; but now they rule without controul, not only their families, but the forum, the courts of justice, and even the armies. To this speech, which was applauded by some, but disliked by the far greater part, Valerius Messalinus answered, that many of the institutions of their forefathers were changed for the better; that women were so far from burdening the provinces, that they were no burden to their own husbands; that in time of peace they proved no incumbrance to them, but a great relief after the fatigues of war,

to which it was not proper they should attend their husbands. As to the pride, cruelty, and ambition, to which some of them had given a loose, he answered, that if on that account none were to be allowed to accompany their husbands into the provinces, no governors ought, according to that method of reasoning, be sent thither, since some of them had proved cruel, haughty, rapacious, &c. The Oppian laws, he said, were once judged necessary, and their severity thought expedient for the state; but afterwards their rigor was softened, and that too was judged expedient for the public good. As to the wives being accessory to the guilt of their husbands, the latter, he said, ought to bear the blame; but he thought it very hard, that for the too great compliance of one or a few weak husbands, all the rest should be deprived of the comfort and relief which the fellowship of their wives, the natural partners of their good and bad fortune, afforded them. He added, that the sex, weak by nature, would be thus left defenceless, a prey to their own passions, and exposed to the temptations of thousands, who would make it their business to seduce them; whereof the natural consequence in an absence of many years was to every one obvious, since the marriage-bed was scarce preserved under the eye of the husband. He concluded his speech with exhorting the fathers so to redress the evils abroad, as not to neglect the disorders at home. Drusus approved of this speech; and having alledged the example of Augustus, who travelled mostly accompanied with Livia, added, that he himself had taken a progress to Illyricum, and was ready, if it were thought expedient, to visit other nations; but not without uneasiness, if he were to be torn from his dear wife, by whom he had so many children. For these reasons, if they deserve that name, the motion of Cæcina was defeated (92).

fore, as his interest prevailed, Lepidus declined standing in competition with him ^k. The moderation and mildness with which Drusus governed, during his father's absence, encouraged some senators to apply to him for redress to an evil, which was by degrees grown unsupportable.  disturber of the public peace, and confederate with the late king Rhescuporis, when having killed his nephew Cotys, whom Tacitus through mistake calls his brother, he designed to make war upon Rome. The charge of treason, says our historian, proved in those days the sum and bulwark of all accusations whatsoever, and was the most effectual means of making sure of the criminal. Vetus was therefore condemned And con-

 was obliged to venture a battle with his countryman Julius Indus, whom the Romans had sent forward with a chosen body of men, as one who was well acquainted with the roads, and a declared enemy to Florus. Indus put him to flight at the first onset, and by pursuing him from place to place, reduced him to such streights, that finding no other means to avoid falling into the hands of his implacable enemy, he put an end to his life with his own sword. By his death the insurrection of Treves was quelled. Julius Florus, about the command of the army, gave him time to prepare for a vigorous defence. At length Varro, who was old and infirm, yielding to Silius, who was vigorous and in the flower of his age, the troops began their march, and advancing towards Augustodunum, were met by Sacrovir twelve miles from that city. Whereupon an engagement ensuing, the Gauls were routed with great slaughter, and Sacrovir obliged to fly first to Augustodunum, and thence to a neighbouring town, where he slew himself, and those who attended him one another, after having set fire to the place, by which it was reduced to ashes. Our historian observes, that when news of this insurrection in Gaul was brought to Rome, the best men were grieved for the sake of their country, but many rejoiced in their own dangers, and in hatred to Tiberius wished success to the common enemy^a.

reasons for not going in person
into Gaul.

WHEN the insurrection was intirely suppressed, Tiberius wrote to the senate, acquainting them with the rise, progress, and conclusion of the war; he added, that it was brought to a happy issue by the fidelity and bravery of his lieutenants directed by his counsels. As some had complained of him for not going in person to suppress it, in the same letter he yielded reasons why neither he nor Drusus had, during these commotions, offered to stir out of Italy, telling them, that the Roman empire was an immense body, and that it was below the dignity of princes, upon the revolt of one or two cities, to abandon the capital, whence proper directions were sent to govern the whole; but nevertheless, that he would visit those nations and settle them, since they were again brought under subjection; which before would have been doing them too much honour, as if he had not been able to conquer them by his lieutenants. The senate decreed vows, supplications, and the other usual honours on such occasions; but Cornelius Dolabella, a notorious flatterer moved, that Tiberius, on his return from Campania, should be honoured with an ovation. This ridiculous motion occasioned a letter from the emperor, wherein he declared, that he was not so destitute of glory as to hunt after empty honours in his old age, for a short progress in the neighbourhood of Rome, after having in his youth vanquished most warlike nations, and either enjoyed or despised many triumphs. This year Publius Sulpicius Quirinius, whom St. Luke calls Cyrenius, dying at Rome, Tiberius wrote to the senate, desiring that he might be honoured with a public funeral. He was a native of Lanu-

vium, a municipal town; but, though of a mean descent, had raised himself by his valour to the highest posts in the army, and had been honoured by Augustus, first with the consulship, and afterwards with the ensigns of triumph, for driving the Homonadenses out of their strong-holds in Cilicia. Upon the disgrace of Marcus Lollius he was appointed governor to Caius Caesar, then employed in settling the affairs of Armenia, in which high station he made use of all his interest in behalf of Tiberius then at Rhodes, and by degrees reconciled the young prince to him. These kind offices Tiberius now remembered, and extolled them in his letter to the senate, inveighing at the same time against Lollius, as the author of the misunderstanding between him and Caius. When Archelaus, the son of Herod, was deposed by Augustus, Quirinius was appointed governor of Syria, and ordered to seize the country, which Archelaus had held, and reduce it to a Roman province; which he did accordingly, taxing the Jews according to the estimate of their estates, which had been made eleven years before by Sentius Saturninus. The senate readily complied with the request of Tiberius as to the funeral of Quirinius, though they had no great respect for his memory on account of his covetousness, his great credit with the emperor, and above all, for his prosecuting Æmia Lepida in the manner we have related above^c. At the end of the year, Drusus falling sick, Caius Lutorius Priscus, a Roman knight, thinking the distemper would prove mortal, composed a poem bewailing his death, and out of vanity read it in the house of P. Petronius in the presence of Vitellia, mother-in-law to Petronius, and of other women of great distinction. As Rome swarmed with informers, the poet was immediately accused of this before the senate; all the ladies, who had heard him, were summoned to appear against him, and frightened into a confession, except Vitellia, who maintained to the last with great firmness, that she had heard nothing. But more credit being given to those who deposed against him, Haterius Agrippa, who, as consul elect, voted first, declared, that in his opinion he ought to be punished with death; Lepidus was for condemning him to perpetual banishment and confiscating his estate. But of all the consulars, Rubellius Blandus alone alone voting with Lepidus, and the rest with Agrippa; Priscus was conveyed to prison, and immediately put to death. To what a deplorable state of slavery was Rome already reduced! But Lutorius's real crime was, it seems, his having composed a poem on the death of Germanicus, which had been so well received, that Tiberius could not help rewarding him for it.^p The emperor, who was still in Campania, behaved on this occasion with his usual ambiguity; for in a letter, which he wrote to the senate, he commended their zeal in thus punishing the slightest injuries done to the prince; but at the same time intreated them not to be so hasty in punishing words: he praised Lepidus, blamed not Agrippa. His seeming to disapprove of this sudden execution gave rise to a famous decree of the senate, viz. that their orders should not be carried to the treasury (H), nor the condemned person executed, in less than ten days. But no criminals reaped any benefit from this respite in Tiberius's reign, his cruel and revengeful temper being never softened by time, as Tacitus well observes.^q

His hasty execution gives rise to a famous decree.

THE following year, Caius Sulpitius Galba and Decimus Haterius Agrippa being consuls, Caius Bibulus, one of the ædiles moved, that some regulation might be made against luxury, which, in spite of the sumptuary laws, was grown to a monstrous excess in the expence of entertainments, in the number of domestics, in the quantity of gold and silver plate, of pictures, statues, precious stones, &c. The motion was seconded by the other ædiles, who made long descants on the mischievous consequences of the growing evil. The fathers heard them with patience, but referred the whole matter to Tiberius; which occasioned a letter from him to the conscript fathers, wherein, after commending the zeal of the ædiles, he owned, that the excesses they complained of required a regulation, that the prevailing evil ought to be checked by the severest laws; but nevertheless, if such laws were enacted, even those who now censure, at their entertainments and in their conversations, the profuse luxury of the times, would be the first to complain, that the state was utterly undone, that snares were laid for every noble and wealthy family, and that all men would become the prey of informers. In the end of his letter, he told them, that if any of the magistrates would undertake to put a stop to so great an evil, he should have both his praises and thanks for easing him of part of his burden; but that as to himself, he would not take upon him that odious task: Believe me, conscript fathers, said he, I am not fond of being the object of the public hatred; I have already enemies enow; let me not therefore, I intreat you, wantonly and vainly raise more by such regulations, as promise no advantage to you or to me. The senate, upon reading the emperor's letter, ordered the ædiles to proceed no farther in that matter. Tiberius, by thus rejecting the project of

(H) In the treasury were lodged the public registers and the decrees of the senate, which, till entered there, had neither the force nor name of decrees, but were called the orders or authority of the senate, as is evident from Cicero, Dion Cassius, and other ancient writers. This decree of the senate, by which it was provided, that no person condemned should be executed till the tenth day after sentence pronounced, was observed by Caligula, even with respect to those whom he himself sentenced to death (93), and probably by all the succeeding emperors to the time of Theodosius the Great, who granted twenty days more to those who were condemned (94) either by the prince, or the senate (95). This we find is the general opinion, an opinion, without all doubt, well grounded, since Tacitus, Dion Cassius, Suetonius, and Seneca affirm, in express terms, that Tiberius granted ten days respite to criminals after sentence, and the more modern writers unanimously ascribe to Theodosius the thirty days reprieve. But on the other hand, we read in Quintilian, who flourished about this time, the following words: The law forbidding a criminal to be executed till after thirty days was wisely established, seeing the accuser may be deceived (96); and in Calpurnius Flaccus, who wrote long before Theodosius's time, Let the punishment of a ravisher be deferred thirty days (97). As there is no reconciling testimonies so evidently opposite and contradictory, and on the other hand we have innumerable instances of transcribers mistaking numbers, we shall with the most judicious critics impute to them the present disagreement among authors. Perhaps in transcribing the declamations of Quintilian and Calpurnius in or after Theodosius's time, they adapted them to the law which that emperor had enacted. Baronius pretends, that the ten days reprieve extended to all criminals, by what judge soever condemned; and thence infers, that Pilate transgressed the law of his prince in causing our Saviour to be crucified as soon as he had pronounced sentence against him (98). But it is manifest from Gothofredus in his comments upon the Theodosian code, that neither the decree of Tiberius, nor the law of Theodosius, extended to the magistrates in the provinces till the time of Nicephorus Botoniates, who ordered all judges and magistrates to conform to the law of Theodosius (99).

of reforming luxury, which would have proved an inexhaustible fund of crimes, im-peachments, and confiscations, gained the fame of moderation among the nobility, with whose wealth the accusers would not have failed to enrich themselves, had the emperor either enforced the ancient, or enacted new, sumptuary laws^r. Soon after Drusus in-vested with the tribunitial power. Tiberius wrote another letter to the senate, desiring the tribunitial power for Drusus, which the fathers granted with the more refined flattery, as they had foreseen this request: statues were decreed both to Tiberius and Drusus, altars were erected to the gods, arches raised, &c. M. Silanus moved, that for the future not the names of the consuls, but of those who exercised the tribunitial power, should be prefixed to all public and private records; Haterius Agrippa, that the decrees of that day should be written in letters of gold and hung up in the senate. Thus the lords of the The debasement of the senate. Roman senate, who once headed mighty armies, raised and deposed great kings, bestowed or took away empires, were by degrees changed into mean slaves, and become by their infamous flattery an object of derision and contempt to all foreign nations, nay to that very prince, whose favour they strove to gain by disgracing themselves. Drusus, who was then in Campania, probably with his father, wrote to the senate, returning them thanks for the tribunitial power with which they had invested him; but did not condescend to come to Rome, as was expected, to receive it. Soon after, Servius Maluginensis, who, as priest of Jupiter, was not allowed to leave Italy, nay, to sleep one night out of Rome, demanding the government of Asia, and his suit being opposed by Lentulus the augur and others, the affair was referred to Tiberius, who in his answer to the senate postponing the pretensions of the priest of Jupiter, moderated the honours which had been decreed to Drusus with the tribunitial power, and particularly censured the motion of the golden letters, as contrary to the custom
 The number of sanctuaries lessened. of Rome. As the liberty of instituting sanctuaries and privileged places at pleasure had long since prevailed among the Greek cities, and filled their temples with fugitive slaves, debtors, and criminals, Tiberius this year referred to the senate the examining of the privileges which those cities enjoyed, and the grants on which they were founded.
 The senate and consuls, after having heard the Greek deputies, and carefully searched into the validity of their several pretensions, utterly suppressed some sanctuaries, and either limited the extent, or abridged the privileges and immunities, of others, ordering the decree they enacted on this occasion to be engraved on brass, and hung up in the temples of Greece^s. Suetonius tells us, that Tiberius absolutely suppressed all sanctuaries throughout the whole Roman empire^t. Not long after Livia being seized Livia's illness Tiberius re- turns to Rome with a dangerous distemper, Tiberius hastened back to Rome; since the mother and son either still lived in perfect amity, or cunningly disguised their mutual hatred: the latter was commonly believed at Rome; for Livia having not long before dedicated a statue to Augustus, and placed her own name before that of Tiberius, the emperor was thought to have grievously resented this, as an undervaluing the majesty of the prince, but to have smothered his resentment with a deep dissimulation. However that be, the senate upon her illness decreed supplications to the gods, with the celebration of the great Roman games for her recovery, and betrayed on this occasion such a mean spirit of servitude, that Tiberius himself was ashamed of their vile debasement, and scandalous submissions^u. The next time the senate met, Caius Silanus, proconsul of Asia, Cæsius Cordus, proconsul of Crete, and Lucius Ennius, a Roman knight, were for having used as the current coin a piece of silver, on which was engraved the effigies of Tiberius. To the charge of rapine and extortion against Silanus and Cordus, that none of their friends or relations might dare to plead for them in their trial, articles of treason were subjoined, a sure bar, says Tacitus, to all assistance, and a seal

Cneius Lentulus moving, that the estate of Silanus descending to him from his mother Cornelia, who was related to the Cæsars, might be restored to his son, Tiberius approved of, and assented to, the motion: nay, he even mitigated the rigor of the sentence which the senate had pronounced against him, alledging, that the island of Gyarus, to which they had confined him, was an unhospitable place and destitute of inhabitants, and begging, that, in favour of the Junian family and in regard of his sister Torquata, a vestal of an unblemished character, they would allow him for the

a place of his exile the island of Cythera. This the senators readily granted at the request of the prince, who by this affected shew of clemency pretended to cover the artifice and violence which he had employed to destroy the unhappy proconsul (I). To what place Cordus was confined, we are not told. As for L. Ennius, the emperor judged the charge brought against him frivolous, and therefore would not allow him to be tried as a criminal. Whereupon Ateius Capito, with an affected spirit of liberty, cried out, that the emperor intrenched upon the privileges of the senate; that all injuries done to the prince were public injuries, injuries done to the commonwealth, which it was the province of the senate charged with the care of the republic to revenge and restrain, in spite of any one's private clemency and compassion. Tiberius had reason to cry aloud, as we are told he used to do, as often as he went out of the senate, Ob men prepared for bondage! He was, says Tacitus, irreconcilable to public liberty; but abhorred flattery, as suiting only with the spirit of slaves. The infamy of Capito was the more signal, as he debased it by not only the dignity of the senator, but his his own personal accomplishments (K). The condemnation of Silanus and Cordus was followed by a religious debate, in what temple the offering should be placed, which the Roman knights had vowed to Fortune Equestrian for the recovery of Livia. As there was no temple in Rome dedicated to Fortune under that title, but one at Antium, it was decreed, that the gift of the knights should be presented there. And now that matters of religion were on foot, Tiberius, as pontifex maximus, returned the answer which he had lately deferred, touching the pretensions of Servius Maluginensis, and produced a statute of the pontiffs made under Augustus, declating, that when the priest of Jupiter was taken ill, he might with the consent of the pontifex maximus be absent from the city two nights, except on days of public sacrifice, and never more than twice a year. This regulation shewed that the administration of a province, which required a year's absence, was incompatible with the office of the flamen dialis, or priest of Jupiter. So that the government of Asia, which Maluginensis had demanded, was conferred on the consular, who was next in seniority to him. When this affair was over, Æmilius Lepidus asked and obtained leave of the senate to repair and beautify at his own expence the basilic (L) of Paulus Æmilius. On the other hand, the emperor undertook to

(I) Silanus was very hardly used in his trial, as Tacitus observes. The best pleaders of all Asia were chosen on purpose to accuse him. They charged him with cruelty and extortion in his government. To this charge was added that of treason by Marcus Scaurus once consul, Junius Otho prætor, and Brutidius Niger ædile. The number of his accusers was increased by Gellius Poplicola and Marcus Paccius, the former quæstor to Silanus, the other his lieutenant. As he was accused of treason, no one dared to appear in his favour, he himself was no pleader or orator, and besides, Tiberius, with an awful voice and countenance, was continually interrupting and confounding him with questions, which he was not allowed time to refute, nay, he was often forced to confess, lest the emperor should have asked in vain. His slaves too were first by the emperor's orders sold to the public, and then examined upon the rack. He was no doubt guilty of cruelty and extortion; but the hatred and spite, which Tiberius shewed him, and his eagerness to get him condemned, were justly censured.

(K) Ateius Capito was a man of extraordinary accomplishments, and one of the most learned civilians of his age. All we know of his pedigree is, that his grandfather was only a centurion under Sylla, and that his father arrived at the prætorship. Gellius, Macrobius, and Festus, quote several books wrote by him, viz. a comment upon the laws of the twelve tables, a hundred and twenty books de jure, ten books de jure pontificum, ten de jure sacerdotum, a treatise of the duty of a senator, and a volume of collections. But he debased, says Tacitus, his rare accomplishments by the most infamous flattery and a mean obsequiousness to power. Augustus honoured him early with the consulship to raise him above Antistius Labeo, another civilian of equal knowledge and abilities, but of an unblemished character and a probity which was proof against all temptations. However, Labeo obtained the prætorship; but his virtue checked his rise to greater preferments, whence he was no less beloved and adored by the people, than his rival abhorred and detested. We do not find the name of Capito in the consular tables; whence, as both Tacitus in this place and Pomponius in his book de origine juris (100) assure us, that he was raised to the consulship, we conclude, that he was one of the consuls who were called suffecti, because substituted in the room of those who died or resigned. Pighius produces an ancient marble discovered at Rome with this inscription; C. Ateio. Capitone. C. Vibio. Postumo. cos. Vibius was, according to Pighius, consul in the year of Rome 759.

(L) Basilics were originally spacious halls in which kings, from whom these buildings borrowed their name, administered justice to their subjects. The Romans appropriated that name to great halls, having two ranges of pillars and two wings with galleries over them. Cicero speaks of the basilic mentioned here (1), which, according to him, was begun by Æmilius Paulus, then ædile, and afterwards consuls with C. Marcellus. It was afterwards finished under Augustus by Paulus Æmilius, who was consul in the year of Rome 730, and afterwards censor (2); but being consumed by accidental fire, it was rebuilt twenty years after by another Æmilius (3). As it was at this time out of repair, Lepidus asked leave to strengthen and embellish it at his own expence.

to rebuild the theatre of Pompey, which had been consumed by accidental fire, none of that family being equal to so great a charge, and promised that it should still be called by the name of its illustrious founder. On this occasion he enlarged on the praises of his favourite Sejanus, to whose care and vigilance, he said, it was owing, that the fire had done no greater damage. Hereupon the servile senate, applauding the prince's speech, decreed a statue to Sejanus to be placed in the theatre of Pompey^x. We are told by Seneca^y, that upon the passing of this decree, Cremutius Cordus, of whom we shall speak anon, cried out, Now is Pompey's theatre utterly destroyed.

Tacfarinas's arrogant embassy to Tiberius.

He is distressed by Blæsus.

Who is honoured with the title of emperor.

Deaths of several illustrious persons.

The original character and pursuits of Sejanus.

THIS year Tacfarinas, quitting anew the deserts, to which he had been so often driven, appeared unexpectedly in the fruitful plains of Africa at the head of a numerous army; and having committed every-where dreadful devastations, he arrived to such a height of boldness, as to send ambassadors to Tiberius, demanding a settlement for himself and his army, and threatening the emperor, in case he did not grant him his request, with an eternal war. Our historian tells us, that Tiberius never betrayed so much indignation and resentment as on this occasion, not being able to bear, that a deserter, a free-booter, should have the arrogance to offer terms of peace, as if he were an equal enemy. He therefore ordered Junius Blæsus, whom he continued another year in the government of Africa, to exert his utmost efforts against so bold and contemptible an enemy. Blæsus drove him every-where before him, and pursued him even into the deserts, where he took his brother prisoner; but Tacfarinas himself had the good luck to make his escape, though the passes were beset on all sides by the enemy. However, as most of his forces were cut in pieces and his brother taken, Tiberius looked upon the war as concluded, and confirmed to Blæsus the title of imperator, which his troops had conferred upon him. He was the last private person who enjoyed that title, thenceforth peculiar to the reigning family (M). He was likewise honoured with the ensigns of triumph, Tiberius declaring that he thus distinguished him in regard of Sejanus, who was his nephew, though in Tacitus's opinion his actions intitled him to all the honours that were conferred upon him^z. This year died three persons of great distinction, viz. Ateius Capito, the most learned civilian in Rome, but one who debased his extraordinary parts with the meanest and most servile flattery, as we have observed above; Asinius Saloninus, grandson to M. Agrippa; and Asinius Pollio, half brother to Drusus, and betrothed to one of Tiberius's grand-daughters (N); and the celebrated Junia, niece to Cato of Utica, sister to Brutus (O), and wife to Cassius, three most zealous champions for the public liberty. She died sixty-four years after the battle of Philippi, in which her husband lost his life. As she was immensely rich, her will made a great noise; for she left legacies to almost all the great men of Rome, but nothing to Tiberius, who did not seem to resent in the least this omission, but allowed her panegyric to be pronounced in public, and her obsequies to be performed with all the pomp suitable to her rank. Before the corps were carried, according to the Roman custom, the images of twenty of the most noble families in Rome, to which the illustrious deceased was related; but as those of Brutus and Cassius were not seen among the rest, the people took thence occasion to extol the zeal with which those two heroes had formerly signalized themselves in the cause of liberty^a.

C. Asinius Gallus and C. Antistius Vetus were the following consuls. During their administration, the famous Sejanus took the first steps towards the execution of the black designs he had been long fostering in his heart. As this powerful and ambitious minister henceforth to his downfall is to act a principal part in the present history, we

(M) Lipsius observes here, that the title of imperator, when given to the prince, was placed before his name, thus; Imp. Cæsar Augustus, but put after the names of generals, to whom it was only a transient title of honour, thus; Junius Blæsus imp. M. Tullius Cicero imp.

(N) Asinius Pollio, the famous orator and poet, one of Augustus's chief favourites, and Virgil's patrons, had a son by name Asinius Gallus, who, according to Lipsius (4), was surnamed Saloninus from the city of Salona in Dalmatia, which was taken either by him, or during his consulship. Salonius, or, as Tacitus and Dion Cassius constantly call him,

Asinius Gallus, married Vipsania, the daughter of Agrippa, after Tiberius had divorced her to marry Julia. Tiberius had by her Drusus; and Asinius Gallus many children, viz. Asinius Saloninus, or Asinius Gallus, mentioned by Tacitus in this place, Asinius Gallus, Asinius Pollio, who was consul in the year of Rome 756, Asinius Agrippa, and Asinius Celer, whom Pliny calls a consular man.

(O) Junius Silanus, who was consul with L. Licinius Murena, married Servilia the sister of Cato, and had by her Tertia or Tertulla, and this Junia, who was sister to Brutus by the mother; for M. Junius Brutus was the famous Brutus's father.

a we shall premise a succinct account of his original, manners, and characters, copied from the most creditable writers of antiquity. L. Ælius Sejanus was born at Vulturni in Hetruria (P), son to Sejus Strabo, who, though commander of the prætorian guards under Augustus, and in the beginning of Tiberius's reign, was but a private Roman knight^b. His mother was descended of an illustrious family; viz. the Junian; for Junius Blæsus who at the death of Augustus commanded the legions in Pannonia, and afterwards signalized himself against Tacfarinas in Africa, was his maternal uncle. He had other relations in great employments, and even brothers, who had been consuls^c; but these were perhaps of the Ælian family, into which Sejanus, as we conjecture from his name, was probably adopted. In the very beginning of Tiberius's reign, he was joined with his father in the command of the prætorian guards, and even then in high favour with the prince; whence no colleague was assigned him in that important employment, when his father was sent into Egypt, the government of which kingdom was by the regulation of Augustus committed only to private knights. In his early youth he was suspected of having for hire abandoned himself to the lewd desires of the famous Apicius (Q). As to his character, Tacitus draws it in the following lines: With various insinuations and artifices he got the ascendant over Tiberius so far, that he made him reserved to others, but to himself careless and open. He did not accomplish this so much through policy, for by that others overpowered him, as from the wrath of the gods against the Roman state, to which his rise and his downfall proved alike destructive. He had a strong body and a bold mind. He disguised his own faults, and impeached others: alike fawning and imperious. By his outward appearance one would have thought him modest, but in his heart he had the most unsatiable thirst after power, to which he made sometimes luxury and bribery subservient, and sometimes industry and application, qualities no less pernicious, when they are assumed for the vile purposes of power. Thus far Tacitus. The ambitious favourite, seeing himself by the indulgence of his kind master, lifted up above his condition and raised to the highest posts of the empire, began to entertain thoughts of soaring still higher. He was in power and authority the second man in the Roman state; but this to his ambition seemed little; he aimed at nothing less than the sovereign power, towards the attaining of which, his first step was to gain the affections of the prætorian guards, who were all under his command. Till his time they had been quartered all over the city, and dispersed about the neighbouring towns and villages. But Sejanus, pretending, that while they were thus scattered, they lived loose and debauched, and could not be easily gathered into one body on any sudden emergency, obtained leave of the emperor to assemble them into one camp, where, he said, the military discipline would be observed with more exactness and severity. As soon as the camp was finished, he made it his chief study to gain the favour of the common soldiers by his affability and obliging behaviour; as for the tribunes and

(P) The poet Juvenal alludes to Vulturni the birth-place of Sejanus in the following lines:

— idem populus, si Nurscia Thusco
Favisset, si oppressa foret secura senectus
Principis, hac ipsa Sejanum diceret hora Augustum, &c.

For Nurscia, or as some will have it, Nortia, was the tutelar god of Vulturni, as appears from Livy (5).

(Q) The ancients mention three Apiciuses, all famous epicures. The first lived in the times of the republic, and is spoken of by Athenæus (6). The second, who is mentioned by our historian in this place, lived under Augustus and Tiberius; and the third, as appears from Suidas, under Trajan. The second was the most famous of all for gluttony; for after he had by voluptuous eating and drinking reduced his immense wealth to ten millions of small sesterces, he chose rather to put an end to his life, than retrench the usual expences of his table, for which the remaining sum was no ways sufficient. Tongues of peacocks and nightingales, and the most exquisite meats, that the forests, seas, or rivers, produced, were, says Appian the grammarian, his daily food (7). He is styled by Pliny nepotum omnium altissimus gurgis. Seneca, who was his contemporary, tells us, that he published a book of cookery with which he infected the age he lived in (8), a treatise de re culinaria, that is, of cookery, was discovered by Albanus Torinus in the island of Maguelonne near Montpelier in 1529, and printed at Basle twelve years after another copy of the same treatise had been discovered a hundred years before, by Enochus of Ascoli, under the pontificate of Nicolas V. To both these manuscripts was prefixed the name of M. Cælius Apicius; but Vossius is of opinion, that this Apicius lived long after the famous epicure of that name, whose books, de irritamentis gulæ and de jussellis, are mentioned by Seneca (9), Isidore of Seville (10), and the old scholiast of Juvenal.

and centurions, they were all chosen by him, and he took care to employ none but his own creatures and dependents. Having thus attached to his interest this formidable corps, the flower of the Roman forces, his next care was to gain a strong party in the senate, which it was no difficult task for a favourite to effect, at whose disposal were both the public money and the public employments; for no senator, however distinguished by his birth or personal accomplishments, was employed, unless recommended by Sejanus^d. He is said to have gained over to his interest even the wives of all the men of quality in Rome, by a private promise of marriage to each of them, when he attained the sovereignty. This encouraged them to contribute all that lay in their power to his grandeur, which they looked upon as their own, and at the same time to acquaint him with the most secret counsels of their husbands^e. He did not even neglect the emperor's freedmen, but carefully cultivated their friendship too^f. In the mean time, Tiberius, though a man of great penetration, instead of curtailing the overgrown power of his favourite, was ever extolling him, in his speeches both to the senate and people, as the sharer of his burdens, and even suffered his effigies to be adored in all public places, nay, among the eagles of the legions^g; for they all carried the image of Sejanus in their colours, except those that were then quartered in Syria, which refused to follow the example of the rest^h.

BUT Sejanus's design of raising himself to the sovereign power met with many obstructions. The imperial family had a numerous issue; the emperor's son was a grown man, and his grandsons, the children of Germanicus, who was his son by adoption, were now of age. This, however, did not deter Sejanus from his wicked pursuits; he resolved to cut off the reigning family root and branch, that none of the blood of the Cæsars might traverse his ambitious design. But as it was dangerous to cut them off all at once, he resolved to destroy the whole race by degrees, and to begin with Drusus, who was continually complaining of his overgrown power (R), and had lately upon some contest shaken his fist at him; and, as he offered to resist, given him a blow in the face. Upon this affront, Sejanus, after having examined with himself various expedients to rid himself of such a rival, resolved at length to apply to his wife Livia, the sister of Germanicus; which he did accordingly; and having first, by pretending a violent passion for her, induced her to comply with his criminal desires, prevailed upon her afterwards, without much difficulty, to concur with him in destroying her husband. Thus the niece of Augustus, the daughter-in-law of Tiberius, the mother of several children by Drusus, disgraced herself, her ancestors, and her posterity, with a mean adulterer, and all to exchange her present condition, both honourable and certain, for the hopes of one equally infamous and uncertain; for Sejanus had promised to marry her upon the death of her husband, and make her his partner in the empire. Eudemus was made privy to the wicked design, because he, as physician to Livia, under colour of his profession, was frequently with her in private, and consequently could advise and direct her without giving any umbrage. Sejanus, to convince Livia of the sincerity of his intention, as to the promised marriage, and thereby encourage her to dispatch her husband, divorced his wife Apicata, though he had three children by her. But still the blackness of the crime frightened Livia, and her ambition could not smother or get the better of her remorse. Sejanus himself, abandoned as he was, could not, without horror, think of imbruing his hands in the blood of the emperor's son; and hence caution, delays, and great confusion in their counselsⁱ.

IN the mean time, Germanicus's second son, by name Drusus, putting on the toga virilis, or the manly robe, had the same honours decreed him by the senate, which had been conferred on his elder brother Nero. On this occasion Tiberius made a speech in commendation of the youth, and likewise of his son Drusus, on account of the

(R) Drusus complained, and indeed with a great deal of reason, that while he, the emperor's son, was in the flower of his age, another was called, as coadjutor to the government, nay, was in a manner declared colleague in the empire. Sejanus, said he, has already formed a camp for the guards, that thus united, they may all at once receive his orders;

the soldiery depend entirely upon him; his statue is set up in the theatre of Pompey; in his grandchildren the blood of the Drusi will be mixed with that of Sejanus; what now remains but to see him invested with the sovereign power, while the emperor's son is excluded from any share in the administration?

a the kindness he shewed to his brother's children (S). This raised new jealousy in Sejanus, who judging it time to hasten the execution of his wicked design, ordered Eudemus to prepare a slow working poison, that the death of the young prince might be ascribed to a casual distemper. The fatal potion was administered to Drusus by Lygdus the eunuch, one of his freedmen, as was learnt eight years after, that is, the year in which Sejanus was disgraced and punished according to his deserts, this whole scene of iniquity being then brought to light by his wife Apicata, and the particulars of the murder owned by Eudemus and Lygdus on the rack. Drusus fell into a lingering distemper, pined away, and died. Tiberius, during the whole time of the illness of his son, appeared altogether unconcerned, perhaps to make a shew, says Tacitus, of the firmness and constancy of his mind; nay, after his death, when his corps lay yet unburied, he went to the senate, and finding the consuls had left their curule chairs, and placed themselves, as a token of their grief, on a common seat, he put them in mind of their dignity and station; and the senate bursting into tears, he smothered his own sorrow to comfort them, which he did in a speech uttered without the least hesitation: he told the fathers, that he was well apprised he might be censured for appearing among them while his grief was yet fresh, when few in the first transports of their sorrow could endure even the comforting speeches of their relations, or behold the day. Though those who thus indulged their grief were not, he said, to be condemned of weakness, yet for his part, he had sought for more powerful comforts, such as arose from pursuing the welfare of the republic. He then lamented the present condition of the imperial family, the extreme age of his mother, the tender years of his grandsons, and his own life in its decline, and begged, that the sons of Germanicus, who alone could lessen the present misfortunes, might be introduced. Hereupon the consuls went for them, and bringing in the two youths, Nero and Drusus, presented them to the emperor, who, taking them by the hand, addressed the senate thus: "Conscript fathers, these fatherless children I commended to their uncle, and besought him, though he had issue of his own, to bring them up, and cherish them no otherwise than if they were immediately descended from him. Drusus being snatched from us, I address my prayers to you, and, in the presence of the gods and our country, conjure you to receive into your protection, and take under your tuition, the great grandchildren of Augustus, descended from most illustrious ancestors; fulfil your own duty towards them, fulfil mine." Then turning to the youths, "To you, Nero, said he, to you, Drusus, these are in the stead of a father: your condition is such, that whatever good or evil befalls you, must befall the commonwealth." This discourse was heard with great satisfaction, and drew tears from the eyes of all who were present. Had Tiberius stopt here, he had left the hearts of

(S) Tacitus tells us, that Tiberius, in the end of his speech, told the conscript fathers, as he had often done before, that he designed to take a progress into the provinces, alledging the multitude of veterans discharged, and thence the necessity of recruiting the armies. On this occasion he enumerated all the legions then in pay, and named the countries, where they were quartered. As from this detail we may learn what forces the Romans had then on foot, what kings were their confederates, and how far the boundaries of the empire extended, it would be an unpardonable omission not to acquaint our readers with it. In the first place, Italy was guarded by two fleets, one at Misenum in the Mediterranean, the other at Ravenna in the Adriatic sea and the coast adjoining to Gaul, by the galleys taken by Augustus at the battle of Actium, and sent well manned and equipped to Forojulium. As to the legions, there were eight upon the Rhine to keep in awe both the Germans and Gauls, and three in Spain. In Mauritania reigned king Juba, of whom we spoke above, a friend and ally of Rome; the rest of Africa was kept in subjection by two legions, and Egypt by the like number. Syria, quite to the banks of the Euphrates, was maintained by four legions. Thrace was possessed by Rhemetalses and the sons of Cotys, who were in alliance with Rome; on the banks of the Danube lay four legions;

two were quartered in Pannonia, two in Mæsia, and two in Dalmatia. The latter two, by the situation of the country, were at hand to support the former, and might be soon in Italy upon any sudden emergency; though Rome had her peculiar guards, nine prætorian and three city cohorts. Besides, the legions, fleets, and cohorts, which we have enumerated in the several provinces, were stationed, according to their situation and necessity, the fleets of the several allies, with bodies both of horse and foot, no ways inferior either in number or strength to the Roman legions. From this vast number of forces kept in constant pay, we may judge of the strength and wealth of the empire at this time. As to the emperor's intended progress, Suetonius tells us, that he often declared in the senate his intention of visiting the provinces and armies abroad, and made almost every year the necessary preparations for his journey, ordering carriages to be bought, and provisions to be laid in at a great charge in all the municipal towns and in the colonies; nay, he went so far as to let the people make their solemn vows for his happy journey, and safe return, but in the mean time never stirred out of Rome, or went only to the neighbouring towns; whence he was generally nicknamed Callipedes, one who, according to the Greek proverb, was always running, yet never advancing (10).

of the senators full of compassion and admiration. But as he repeated anew what he had often said, and what had been as often ridiculed, viz. that he designed to restore the republic, the senators began to suspect the sincerity of his other assertions^k. Before the senate broke up, they decreed the same honours to the memory of Drusus, which they had before decreed to that of Germanicus, adding many others to them, agreeable to the genius of flattery. The obsequies were performed with the utmost pomp, and the funeral procession distinguished with a long train of images, representing Aeneas, the supposed father of the Julian family, all the kings of Alba, Romulus founder of Rome, all the heroes of the Claudian race, with Attus Claudius, the first of that family who came to Rome, at the head of them. Tiberius himself pronounced the panegyric of his son, the people and senate assuming the outward appearance of mourners, but rejoicing in their hearts to see the house of Germanicus nearer the throne. Besides, Drusus was generally hated, being cruel (T), passionate, given to drinking, and all manner of debauchery (U). However, he lived in a friendly manner with Germanicus, and after his death shewed himself kind, at least not ill disposed, towards his children. He left behind him two sons born at a birth, one of whom did not long survive him, the other named Tiberius Nero Gemellus, lived to the reign of Caius, by whom he was put to death. Tiberius, if we may give credit to Suetonius^l, despised them both, as doubting whether they were really the sons of Drusus. As soon as the funeral ceremonies were over, Tiberius resumed his usual employments, prohibited any farther vacation, and to the ambassadors of the Ilienses or Trojans, who came somewhat too late with their compliments of condolence, answered by way of raillery, as if the memory of his loss had been quite effaced, that he in his turn condoled with them for having lost so brave and eminent a citizen as Hector^m.

Sejanus, when he saw the death of Drusus pass unrevenge, encouraged with the success of his first attempt, began to meditate how he might destroy the sons of Germanicus, whose succession to the empire was now unquestionable. But as he could not compass his wicked ends by poison, on account of the great vigilance of their mother Agrippina, and the distinguished fidelity of their governors, he chose to attack them another way, which was to rouse the old hatred Livia bore to Agrippina, and by her means raise jealousies and suspicions against her and her children in the mind of the emperor. His wicked counsels had the desired effect; for having by a thousand calumnies and false insinuations rendered Livia, who was naturally greedy of power, irreconcilable to the widow of her grandson, he compassed by her means the ruin of that unhappy family, as we shall soon have occasion to relate.

(T) Tacitus and Dion Cassius give us several instances of Drusus's cruelty. The former writer tells us, that when he first presided at a shew of gladiators exhibited in the name of Germanicus and his own, he betrayed such delight in blood, that his father was said to have reprov'd him for it. Dion Cassius says, that he often upbraided him with his cruelty both in public and in private, and adds, that from him sharp swords were styled gladii Drusiani. The person who exhibited the shew of gladiators used, as Lipsius observes, to examine the weapons of the combatants before they entered the lists; on which occasion Drusus approved of such only as were exceeding sharp; and thence sharp swords were called Drusian swords. This was, no doubt, a great instance of his cruelty, as it was of humanity and good nature in M. Antoninus, to approve on the like occasion of such swords only as were blunt, and incapable of occasioning deep wounds. Besides Drusus, as Dion informs us, was very passionate, and upon the least provocation ready to strike persons of the first quality; whence he was nicknamed Castor, whom the ancients suppose to have been a famous boxer.

(U) Tacitus tells us, that in relating the death of Drusus, he followed the greatest part of the Latin historians, and the most credible; but adds, that a strong report prevailed in those times, and was still current in his, as if Tiberius himself had,

at the instigation of Lygdus, presented the poisonous potion to his son. The eunuch, according to this report, charged Drusus with a design of poisoning his father; and privately warning the emperor of this, advised him to beware of the first draught offered him in the next entertainment at his son's house. Upon this, Tiberius, fully persuaded of Drusus's wicked design, after he had sat down to table, delivered to him the first cup that was presented to him, which the young prince, not in the least suspecting any plot, gayly drank off. This heightened the jealousy of Tiberius, who upon the death of his son, which happened soon after, the potion having beforehand been poisoned by Lygdus, concluded, that Drusus through fear and shame had swallowed that death which he had prepared for his father. This report our historian refutes as void of all appearance of truth. For who can believe, says he, that a man of common prudence, much less Tiberius, so long practised in great affairs, would to his own son, without so much as hearing him, present with his own hands the mortal potion? He would, no doubt, have tortured the informer, inquired into the plot, endeavoured to discover the authors of it, and used that caution and slowness towards his only son, hitherto never suspected of any such crime, which was natural to him even in his proceedings against strangers.

In the mean time, Tiberius, resuming the care of public affairs, attended the administration of justice at Rome, and dispatched the petitions from the provinces. At his motion the cities of Cityra in Asia and Ægyra in Achaia, both overthrown by an earthquake, were by a decree of the senate eased of tribute for three years. Vibius Sere- Vibius Sere-

Amorgos. But Carfius Sacerdos and Caius Gracchus (W), being charged with supplying Tacfarinas with corn, were both acquitted^a. This year at length, after many complaints from the prætors, which had proved ineffectual, Tiberius, who had before laid the players under various restraints and curtailed their wages, represented to the senate, that they had on many occasions raised tumults, and disturbed the public tranquillity, that they promoted debauchery in private families, that the obscenities of the Oscan farce, the same with the Atellana, of which we have spoken in the foregoing volume^b, were grown to such excess, that it required the authority of the senate to check them, &c. Upon these complaints from the emperor, the players were all Stage-players driven out of Rome and Italy^c, and forbidden, if we believe Dion Cassius^d, to act in Italy.
 any place whatsoever of the Roman dominions. The same year, died one of Drusus's twins, for whose death the emperor was greatly concerned, and no less afflicted for that of Lucius Longus, his ancient and constant friend, and the only senator who had attended him in his retreat to Rhodes, and shared with him both his good and bad fortune; for which reason, though he was but a new man, the senate decreed him a public funeral, and a statue to be placed in the forum built by Augustus. At the same time, Lucilius Capito, the emperor's procurator in Asia, being accused before Lucilius Ca-

 but over his slaves, that he had only empowered him to collect his domestic rents, and ed.
 therefore, if he had usurped the authority of a prætor, or employed military force, he had therein transgressed his orders. Hereupon the senate, after hearing the allegations of the province, found him guilty and condemned him. The cities of Asia were so taken with the moderation Tiberius shewed on this occasion, and the severity with which he had proceeded the year before against Caius Silanus, accused of cruelty and extortion, that they decreed a temple to him, to his mother, and to the senate, A temple and obtained leave to build it. For this concession Nero returned thanks to the erected to
 heard and saw Germanicus himself^e. This temple was built at Smyrna, and finished three years after, as Dion Cassius informs us^f. Towards the end of this year Servius Maluginensis dying, his son was appointed flamen Dialis, or priest of Jupiter, in his room, and Cornelia chosen superior of the vestals in the place of Scantia likewise deceased. To Cornelia a present of two thousand great sesterces was decreed, and a privilege granted to Livia of sitting amongst the vestals in the theatre^g, whose place was, as Suetonius informs us, over-against the prætor's tribunal^h, no other women, however distinguished, having a peculiar place, but all sitting promiscuously together, apart from the men, pursuant to the regulations of Augustus.

(W) Caius Gracchus was son to Sempronius Gracchus, who, on account of his amours with Julia, had been banished by Augustus into the island of Cercina, and afterwards assassinated there by Tiberius's orders. When he first left Italy, he took his son Caius, then very young, along with him, as a companion in his exile. Caius grew up there among fugitives and men destitute of liberal education, and afterwards supported himself by traffic between Africa and Sicily. But, notwithstanding the low condition to which he was reduced, the splendor of his illustrious family would have occasioned his ruin, had not Ælius Lamia and Lucius Apronius, successively proconsuls of Africa, cleared him from the crime laid to his charge.

timely and too early honours. Sejanus, ever intent on improving all opportunities of inflaming Tiberius against Agrippina, laid hold of this to insinuate, that Rome was rent into factions, that already some had the boldness to declare themselves openly the partizans of Agrippina, and that there was no other remedy against the prevailing spirit of faction, but the cutting off, under other pretences, one or two of the most forward and powerful. Hereupon it was by the deluded emperor thought expedient, that the supposed rising faction should be immediately suppressed, by the utter ruin of all the friends of the house of Germanicus. The chief among these were Caius Silius and Titius Sabinus, and with them it was agreed to begin this general massacre. Other considerations, besides the friendship of Germanicus, concurred to ruin Silius. He had commanded for seven years a powerful army, and had been distinguished, as we have related above, with the ensigns of triumph for his exploits in Germany; he had routed Sacrovir, and suppressed the revolt in Gaul; but by boasting his services, and publicly vaunting that he had secured the sovereign authority to Tiberius, by keeping his soldiers in their obedience, when the other legions in Germany revolted, he had incurred the displeasure of the emperor, who, thinking himself incapable of rewarding, as he ought, such important services, was glad of any favourable opportunity to get rid of the person who had rendered them. So that his chief offence was over-much service done to Tiberius; thence that refined observation of Tacitus, that benefits are so far acceptable, as it seems possible to requite them; but when once they have exceeded all retaliation, hatred is returned for gratitude. His wife too, by name Sofia Galla, contributed to his ruin by her friendship and intimacy with Agrippina. Both Tiberius and Sejanus thought it adviseable to have Silius and his wife arraigned first, and postpone for some time the trial of Sabinus. Accordingly, the senate was summoned, and Silius accused by Varro (X) the consul of keeping up a correspondence with the authors of the revolt in Gaul, and of dishonouring his victory with cruel extortions: the behaviour of his wife, and her avarice were likewise objected to him. Silius made no defence, being well apprised it would be to no purpose: he only dropped some words to shew by whose malice he was oppressed. They were both declared guilty of treason, for under that article the whole charge was brought against them. Silius prevented his condemnation by a voluntary death; yet his estate was confiscated, contrary to the constant custom of Augustus, who bestowed on the children of the condemned the estates of such as died before sentence, whether their death was natural or voluntary. His wife Sofia was banished at the motion of Asinius Gallus, who proposed, that one half of her effects should be forfeited; and the other left to her children. Marcus Lepidus voted the fourth part to the accusers, as the law required, and all the rest to the children. Which of these two opinions prevailed, our historian does not inform us. On this occasion Cotta Messalinus moved, that by a decree of the senate, governors of provinces, however innocent in themselves, should be equally punished for the crimes of their wives as for their own. As this decree is mentioned by Ulpian, we may suppose that it passed this year, though that writer speaks of it as made four years before. Calpurnius Piso was tried next, and charged by Quintus Granius with treasonable words privately uttered against the emperor: to this charge the accuser added, that Piso kept poison in his house, and came into the senate armed with a dagger. The latter article seemed incredible, and therefore was dropped; but for other crimes, of which he was no less falsely accused, he was put upon his trial, but his condemnation was prevented by a natural death (Y). Then complaints were made of Cassius Severus (Z), who, though formerly confined to the island

(X) Tacitus tells us, that Silius, seeing the consul engaged against him as an accuser, begged the emperor to postpone the trial till the time of his consulship was expired; but that his request was rejected by Tiberius, who, cloaking his acts of tyranny under venerable old names, answered, that as other magistrates were allowed to bring particulars upon their trial, the prerogative of a consul in the like case ought not to be infringed, since it was chiefly incumbent upon him to take care, that no damage accrued to the republic.

(Y) L. Calpurnius Piso was one of the boldest men at that time in Rome, and had threatened, as we have related above, to quit Rome, and to retire into some distant corner of the earth, where he might be free from the merciless pursuits of the informers. Tiberius bore this calmly, nay, he even descended to soften him with kind words. Afterwards, the undaunted Piso, in defiance of the power of Livia, prosecuted her favourite Urgulania, and could not be prevailed upon to drop the prosecution, though she had taken sanctuary in the emperor's palace. This also Tiberius dissembled; but though he often suppressed his resentment, yet deep impressions remained in his unforgiving soul. Piso is now charged with treason, and but for a natural death, which very seasonably intervened, must have been punished as a traitor.

(Z) Augustus was the first, as we have observed above, who brought libels under the penalties of the law of majesty or treason. To this he was chiefly induced island of Crete for his petulant and satirical writings, yet continued even in his exile his former practices, defaming the most illustrious persons in Rome. He was therefore stripped of his estate, and banished into the hospitable island of Seriphos, which we have described elsewhere^u. About this time Plautius Silvanus prætor killed his wife Apronia, by throwing her headlong out of one of the windows of his apartment. Whereupon, being carried by Apronius his father-in-law before the emperor, he pretended, that while he was asleep, his wife had been the occasion of her own death. Upon this answer, Tiberius, unmindful of his dignity, hastened to Silvanus's chamber, and finding there evident marks of his violence and his wife's struggling, he made his report to the senate, who immediately appointed judges to try the prætor. In the mean time, his grandmother Urgulania, who, as we have observed above, was one of Livia's chief favourites, finding she could not with all her interest save the life of her grandson, sent him, by the advice of Tiberius, as was supposed, a dagger, which was tacitly advising him to prevent his impending condemnation by a voluntary death. The criminal had not courage enough to make use of the dagger; but causing his veins to be opened, bled to death. After his death, his former wife Numantia, whom he had divorced to marry Apronia, was accused of having by charms and potions disordered the understanding of her husband, but was acquitted^w.

THIS year at length put an end to the war with Tacfarinas the Numidian, who was utterly routed and killed by P. Dolabella, proconsul of Africa, with the assistance of Ptolemy, who had succeeded his father Juba in the kingdom of Mauritania. The proconsul desired the ensigns of triumph for his victory, which had been granted to three others; but Tiberius refused him that mark of distinction in compliment to Sejanus, that the fame of his uncle Blesus might not be thence eclipsed. Dolabella on his return to Rome brought with him many distinguished captives, among whom was the son of Tacfarinas; and was attended by ambassadors from the Garamantes, a people of the Inner Libya, who, being frightened with the death of Tacfarinas, whom they had assisted, thought it adviseable to appease, by an embassy, the resentment of the Roman people. To Ptolemy, king of Mauritania, who had bore great share in this war, was dispatched a senator with an ivory staff and an embroidered robe, presents which the Roman people used to send in ancient times to kings, who were their friends and confederates^x. The same year, one Titus Curtius, formerly a soldier of the prætorian guards, sowed the seeds of a servile war, inviting by declarations publicly hung up all slaves to resume their liberty. But this tumult was suppressed just as it was breaking out, the leader himself and the most resolute men of his party being surprised and dragged to Rome, which was already in great consternation on account of the immense number of domestic slaves^y.

A servile war suppressed in its rise.

DURING the same consulate, Rome saw an example of horror and unnatural cruelty, which alone is sufficient to render the reign and memory of Tiberius execrable to the latest posterity. Vibius Serenus, proconsul of the Farther Spain, was condemned, as we have related above, for arbitrary administration, and banished to the island of Amorgos. But now that unhappy father is dragged from the place of his exile to a fresh trial, being accused by his son of treasonable practices against the majesty of the emperor. The father appeared before the senate, bound in chains, with a dejected countenance, and in the dismal habit of a criminal, while the son, in the gayest attire, as if he intended to insult nature itself, alledged a plot framed by his father against the emperor, accusing him at the same time of having sent conspirators into Gaul, to stir up the people there to rebellion. He likewise charged Cæcilius Cornutus, formerly prætor, with having supplied the conspirators with money. Cornutus, though innocent, no sooner heard himself accused, than, looking upon his accusation only as induced by the insolence of Cassius Severus, who had in his writings wantonly defamed the most illustrious men and women in Rome. He was of a mean descent, but an excellent speaker, and had a particular turn for satire. He wrote also a history, which we find quoted by Suetonius (11) and Tertullian (12). Seneca makes honourable mention of him in his controversy (13). Tacitus tells us in this place, that he grew old among the rocks of Seriphos; which is agreeable to what we read in Eusebius, viz. that Cassius Severus, a famous orator, died of want in the twenty-fifth year of his exile, being reduced to such poverty, that he had not wherewithal to cover his nakedness (14). S. Jerom supposes him to have died for want of necessaries in the eighth year of his banishment (15).

as a signal of destruction, he laid violent hands on himself. But Serenus, turning full upon his son and shaking his chains, begged of the gods with tears in his eyes, that they would restore him to the place of his exile, where he might pass his days far from such objects of horror, and that they would one day take just vengeance of such a cruel and unnatural son. He then urged, that Cornutus was innocent, and only frightened with a false accusation; and challenged his son to produce other witnesses and name other confederates, since it was not probable, that with one accomplice only he should have thought of murdering the prince and introducing a change in the government. The accuser then named Cneius Lentulus and Seius Tubero, both men of the first rank in Rome and Tiberius's intimate friends. Besides, Lentulus was extremely old, and Tubero broken with infirmities; insomuch, that Tiberius himself could not help blushing in hearing them named. Dion Cassius tells us, that Lentulus, finding himself, aged as he was, charged with meditating the murder of the prince and a change of state, broke into a loud laugh; and that the emperor instantly acquitted him, saying, I do not deserve to live, if I am hated even by Lentulus. Tubero was likewise discharged, but the slaves of the pretended criminal were examined upon the rack, and their testimony proved favourable to their master. Hereupon the populace, provoked at such monstrous and unheard-of proceedings, began to threaten the unnatural son with the punishments inflicted by the laws on parricides; which so terrified him, that he fled privately out of Rome and withdrew to Ravenna. But Tiberius, still remembering some expressions, a little too free, which Serenus had used in a letter written to him eight years before (A), and no wise disguising his old hatred, obliged the son to return and pursue the action begun against his father. Nothing could be proved against him; nevertheless the votes being taken, he was sentenced to death as a traitor. And then Tiberius, to mitigate the odium accruing to him from such a crying piece of injustice, granted him his life. Hereupon Asinius Gallus was for confining him to the island of Gyarus, or to that of Donusa; this motion was disliked by the emperor, because both these islands were destitute of water, and to whom life is granted, said he, the necessaries of life ought likewise to be granted. Serenus was therefore remanded to Amorgos^a. The death of Cornutus, who had laid violent hands on himself, gave occasion to the following motion in the senate; viz. that when a person charged with treason should put an end to his own life before he was condemned, the accusers should lose their rewards, which were the fourth part of the condemned person's estate. This motion seemed reasonable, and would have been generally approved of, had not Tiberius, throwing off his usual disguise and reserve, openly declared himself an advocate for the accusers, saying with great sternness, that by this means the laws would be defeated and the republic overturned; and that they had better disannul the laws themselves, than remove their guardians. Thus these bloody and destructive instruments, says Tacitus, never sufficiently curbed by any terrors or punishments, were now allured and encouraged by ample rewards^b. The same year, were accused and convicted Caius Cominius, a Roman knight, Publius Suilius, formerly quæstor to Germanicus, and Catus Firmius, a senator. Cominius had written a scurrilous poem against the emperor, who nevertheless pardoned him at the intreaties of his brother, who was a senator. Suilius, being convicted of taking a bribe in an affair which he was to decide as a judge, was by the senate only condemned to be driven out of Italy; but this sentence appearing too mild to the emperor, he caused him to be banished into an island, after having declared upon oath, that he consulted therein the welfare of the republic. This severity, which was then sharply censured, turned afterwards to the emperor's praise: for Suilius, returning to Rome in the reign of Claudius, proved an abandoned mercenary and one of the most mischievous ministers of that weak prince; a proof this, of Tiberius's deep penetration and thorough knowledge of mankind, a knowledge in which he has been equalled by few, and excelled by none. Catus Firmius was likewise by the sentence of the senate to be expelled Italy for forging crimes of treason against his sister. But as he had been instrumental in procuring the destruction of Libo Drusus, by first maliciously seducing seducing him, and afterwards informing against him, as we have related above. Tiberius, mindful of this service, but pretending other motives, saved him from banishment, but did not oppose his being expelled the senate.

(A) Tacitus tells us, that after the condemnation of Libo Drusus, Serenus had by letters upbraided the emperor for not rewarding the singular zeal with which he had signalized himself in that trial, using expressions more free than the tender ears of a prince, naturally proud and jealous of his prerogative, could bear. Our historian, in his account of that famous trial, which he seems to have described pretty minutely, does not mention Serenus among the informers, though he acted, as appears from this passage, a chief part on that occasion.

Tacitus begins the following year, when Cossius Cornelius Lentulus and M. Asinius Cremutius Agrippa were consuls, with an account of the arraignment and noble defence of Cremutius Cordus, a celebrated historian, who was accused of having praised Brutus in the annals he had published, and styled Cassius the last of the Romans, which was the elogium bestowed upon him by Brutus himself. His accusers were Satrius Secundus and Pinarius Natta, both creatures of Sejanus; which he looking upon as a signal of his destruction; and besides observing great sternness and indignation in the countenance of Tiberius, he cast away all hopes of life, spoke in his own defence with the spirit and in the style of a true Roman (B), and then, withdrawing from the senate, starved himself to death. The fathers condemned his books to be burnt by the ædiles; but they were still privately dispersed and read, both in Tiberius's time and many ages after: whence our historian takes occasion to deride the stupidity of those, who imagine they can by their present power conceal the transactions of their times from future ages; whereas it happens quite otherwise; for the punishment of writers gains credit to their writings, and kings reap no other fruit from it, than infamy to themselves and glory to those whom they thus persecute. But time has done what the emperor could not effect with all his authority; only some few fragments of Cremutius Cordus's history have been transmitted to us by Seneca, the rest having been long since lost. For this whole year accusations were pursued with such warmth, that even during the festival of the Feria Latina, while Drusus, probably

(B) "As to facts, conscript fathers, said he, I am so free from guilt, that words only are produced against me. But neither were my words uttered against the prince or his father, who are the only persons comprised under the law of treason. I am charged with having praised Brutus and Cassius, men whose exploits many have displayed, and all in honourable terms. Titus Livius, one of our most famous writers both for eloquence and veracity, bestowed such high encomiums upon Pompey that Augustus styled him a Pompeian; nor did this in the least prejudice their friendship. He no-where calls Scipio Africanus, nor even this Cassius, this Brutus, thieves and parricides, as they are now-a-days commonly termed, but often mentions them as worthy and famous men. The writings of Asinius Pollio have conveyed down to us the memory of the same men under honourable characters. Messala Corvinus was proud of having had Cassius for his general; and for all this both these writers flourished both in wealth and honours under Augustus. M. Cicero extolled Cato to the skies; and nevertheless Cæsar the dictator contented himself with answering it in the same style, as if he had been before his judges. The letters of Marc Antony, the speeches of Brutus, are full of reproaches against Augustus, false indeed and groundless, but urged with great bitterness. The poems of Bibaculus and Catullus, though stuffed with satirical and virulent reflections upon the Cæsars, are still read. The deified Julius, the deified Augustus, bore these injuries, and winked at them, whether with greater moderation or wisdom, I cannot easily say. For things of that nature, if neglected, are but short-lived; whereas they argue, when resented, a guilty conscience. I forbear mentioning the Greeks, among whom, not only the freedom, but even the licentiousness, of speech is unpunished; or if any correction is returned, it is only by revenging words with words. It has been ever allowed, and at no time thought matter of reproach, to pass our judgment upon those whom death hath exempted from hatred and favour. Do I with seditious harangues inflame the people to civil wars, or exhort them to join Cassius and Brutus, now in arms and masters of the fields of Philippi? Brutus and Cassius, now above seventy years slain, are still known in their statues, which even the conqueror did not destroy: why then may not an historian preserve their memories in his writings? Impartial posterity does every one justice; and if my death is determined, there will not be wanting some, who will not only maintain the memory of Brutus and Cassius, but mine too." Notwithstanding this noble defence, the historian, not doubting, but he would have been condemned by the servile senate, returned home and ended his life by abstinence. What Cordus says here of the statues of Cassius and Brutus is confirmed by other writers, namely by Plutarch who tells us, that Augustus took care, that all the honours which had been paid to the two heads of the republican party in their life-time, should be preserved inviolable to them after their death, and relates to this purpose the following story: As Augustus was passing thro' the city of Mediolanum in Cisalpine Gaul, he observed a statue of Brutus, which was of excellent workmanship, and strongly resembled the original. Upon this he halted, and, in the presence of many who attended him, called the magistrates before him, and told them, that their town had broken the league and honoured one of his enemies. At first the magistrates denied the fact, and, not knowing what he drove at, dared upon one another, as men under an inexpressible surprise. Then Augustus, pointing to the statue, asked them with a frown, Is not that my enemy, whom you have received into the very heart of your city? At these words the magistrates, still more astonished, were struck dumb. Whereupon Augustus smiling commended them for their constancy to their friends, though in adversity; and left orders, that the statue should remain standing as he found it (16).

bably the son of Germanicus, who had been appointed governor of Rome, was ascending the tribunal to take possession of his new employment, Calpurnius Salvianus accosted him with a charge against Sextus Marius, which Tiberius highly resented, publicly rebuking the informer, who was thereupon immediately banished by the senate.
The inhabitants of Cyzicum were this year accused of neglecting the worship of the deified Augustus, which they had established in their city, and of committing violences upon some Roman citizens (B). They were therefore deprived of their liberty, which had been formerly granted them by the Roman people, in consideration of their gallant behaviour during the Mithridatic war^f, as we have related elsewhere. Fon- teius Capito, formerly proconsul of Asia, was accused at the same time, but acquitted, it plainly appearing, that the crimes, laid to his charge by Vibius Serenus, were forged.
And yet Serenus escaped unpunished; nay the public hatred he had incurred, by falsely arraigning persons of the greatest distinction, rendered him the more secure: for, as our historian observes, the more mischievous an accuser was, the safer he was, those only of the tribe being surrendered to punishment, who were incapable of doing great mischiefs.

Tiberius's
wise reasoning against admitting divine honours.

ABOUT this time, ambassadors arrived in Rome from the Farther Spain, to beg leave of the senate to erect a temple, after the example of Asia, to Tiberius and his mother.
When they were introduced to the senate, the emperor laid hold of that occasion to confute those who had taxed him with ambition, for having allowed the Asiatics to pay him divine honours, and spoke in the following manner: "I know, conscript fathers, that I am generally blamed, and taxed with inconstancy, for not opposing the cities of Asia, when they petitioned for this very thing. I shall therefore now acquaint you with the motives of my former silence, and at the same time with the rules I propose to follow for the future. As the deified Augustus did not oppose the founding of a temple at Pergamus to himself and the city of Rome (C), I, with whom all his actions and sayings have the force of laws, followed a precedent already approved the more willingly, because to the worship bestowed upon me was annexed that of the senate. But as the accepting of that honour in one instance deserves pardon, so to be adored in every province, under the sacred representations of the deities, favours of pride and ambition: besides, the rendering common, and in a manner prostituting, this honour would be detracting from the glory of Augustus. For myself, conscript

(B) The Cyzicans had begun to build a temple in honour of Augustus, but neglected to finish it, and besides had committed violences upon some Roman citizens (17). Of the latter fault they had been guilty also in the reign of Augustus, who thereupon deprived them of their liberties, which, however, he restored to them soon after (18). In the Mithridatic war they sustained a siege, as we have related in our history of Pontus, with incredible bravery, and repulsed the king. But now, without any regard to their former services, they are stript of those privileges, which they had purchased by a most gallant behaviour and at the expence of their blood (19). We do not find, that their liberties were ever after restored to them; whence we conclude, that Strabo was either dead, or had put the last hand to his work before this year, the eleventh of Tiberius's reign, since he writes, that in his time the city of Cyzicum was free (20).

(C) Though in Augustus's time temples were built even in honour of the proconsuls and governors of provinces, yet that prince, as Suetonius informs us, would suffer no temples to be erected to him alone, but jointly to him and the city of Rome. Thus the temple mentioned here by Tiberius was built at Pergamus by the communities of Asia, and consecrated to Rome and Augustus. The representation of this temple is to be seen on several coins which have reached our times, with this legend;

Com. Asiae. Rom. et. Aug. that is, The communities of Asia to Rome and Augustus (21). The Smyrneans first erected a temple to Rome in the year of the city 558 (22): their example was followed about twenty four years after by the inhabitants of Alabanda, a city of Caria (23). In process of time, a temple was erected in the city itself to Rome and Venus. Of this temple Prudentius speaks in the following lines:

colitur nam sanguine & ipsa
More deæ, nomenque loci ceu numen habetur:
Æque urbis Venerisque pari se culmine tollunt Templa, simul geminis adolentur thura deabus.

The same poet addresses elsewhere Rome as a goddess, thus:

Exaudi, regina tui pulcherrima mundi,
Inter sydereos Roma recepta polos.

Claudian places this temple on mount Palatine:

Monte Palatino, &c.

Says that poet, speaking of the temple consecrated to Rome (24), “ conscript fathers, I acknowledge to you, and would have posterity to know, that “ I am a mortal man, and subject, like others, to the common functions of nature.

 “ It is enough for me to hold the chief place among you, and posterity will suffi“ ciently honour my memory, if they believe me to have been worthy of my an“ cestors, careful of your affairs, unmoved in dangers, fearless of private hatred for “ the public welfare. These are the temples which I would raise in your breasts, “ these the best and most lasting images. As for temples and statues of stone, if “ those who are worshipped in them come to be condemned by the judgment of “ posterity, they are despised as their sepulchres. I therefore here implore our allies “ and citizens, all the gods and goddesses, beseeching the latter to grant me, to the “ end of my life, a mind undisturbed and a thorough knowledge of the laws human “ and divine, and the former to celebrate my actions, whenever my dissolution comes,
 “ with a kind remembrance.” Thus spoke Tiberius; but his reasoning, however judicious and wise, was variously construed, some ascribing his thus rejecting divine honours to modesty, others to diffidence, and many to a meanness of spirit unbecoming a prince. But whatever was his motive, he thenceforth continued to slight upon all occasions, and even in private conversation, divine honours ⁸.

AND now Sejanus, intoxicated with his excessive power, and besides egged on by Sejanus asks the importunity of Livia, the widow of Drusus, who was continually reminding him young Livia in of his promise, presented a memorial to the emperor, begging, that if a husband marriage.
 were sought for Livia, he would remember his friend, to whom he had already given innumerable instances of his affection and benevolence. He added, that Augustus, in the disposal of his daughter, had not been without thoughts of some Roman knight; that he had nothing in view but the glory of such an affinity and the safety of his children, since their alliance with the imperial family would sufficiently screen them against the wrath and malice of Agrippina; for himself, he said, he cared to live no longer, than he could be serviceable to so gracious and benevolent a prince. Tiberius Tiberius's for a present answer commended the fidelity of Sejanus, cursorily recapitulated his own answer to favours towards him, and demanded time to examine his request with more maturity. him.
 At length he returned this answer: “ That princes were not, like other men, guided “ in their pursuits by the notions of conveniency, but were in their actions chiefly to “ consider the applause and approbation of the public; and therefore, that he “ would not put Sejanus off with this obvious and plausible answer, that Livia could “ herself determine whether she would marry again or no, or that she had a mother “ and grandmother, with whom, as nearer relations, she might advise; but would “ deal more candidly with him: And in the first place, as to the enmity of Agrip- “ pina, it would become more outrageous, if by the marriage of Livia the house “ of the Cæsars were rent, as it were, into two opposite parties; that even as things “ stood, great emulation reigned among the women, which occasioned a mutual “ misunderstanding in his grandsons. What would be the consequence, if by such “ a marriage the contest and disagreement were heightened? For you are deceived, “ Sejanus, said he, if you think to continue then in the same rank you are now in.
 “ Can you imagine, that Livia, who was first married to Caius Cæsar, and after“ wards to Drusus, will be satisfied to grow old with a person only of the equestrian “ rank? If I should suffer you after your marriage to remain in the same station, “ do you think, that those would suffer it, who have seen her brother, her father, and “ her ancestors, shining in the first dignities? You propose continuing in your “ present rank; but those very magistrates and great men, who in all affairs affect “ to consult you, openly complain, that you are already lifted up above the rank “ of a knight, that you surpass in power all my father's friends, and therefore out “ of hatred to you censure me. Augustus, you say, had some thoughts of giving “ his daughter in marriage to a Roman knight. What wonder, if distracted with “ innumerable cares, and well apprised to what a great height he raised the person “ whom he distinguished with that match, he talked of Proculeius (D) and some “ others

 “ I have out of friendship suggested to you; however, I will not oppose your incli-

Sejanus urges

in this.

Sejanus was alarmed at this answer, as being well acquainted with the emperor's obscure and distrustful temper: laying therefore aside all thoughts of marrying Livia, he earnestly intreated him not to give ear to the slanderous reports of his enemies, nor hearken to the malicious insinuations of such as hated him, only on account of his unshaken fidelity. The more he reflected on Tiberius's answer, the more apprehensive he grew of giving him any umbrage. He was chiefly at a loss how to comport himself with respect to the crouds of persons of all ranks, who daily frequented his house to court his favour. To refuse them admittance would be impairing his power, and the encouraging of them might, as he justly apprehended, furnish a handle for criminal accusations. In this perplexity he came at length to the following resolution, viz. to urge the emperor to leave Rome, and retire to some pleasant place remote from the noise and hurry of the city. From this counsel he promised himself great advantages; there could be no access to the prince, but by him; all letters and expresses, as they were conveyed, according to the custom which then obtained, by soldiers, who were at his devotion, would pass through his hands; the emperor, declining in age, and growing slothful and effeminate through the solitude of the place, would more easily transfer upon him the whole charge of the empire; finally, he himself should be removed from the crouds of such as to make their court attended him at Rome, which would stop one source of envy. He therefore began by little and little to rail at the hurry of business at Rome, cunningly insinuating to Tiberius the great and enormous inconveniencies of the city, the constant trouble of attending the senate, the discontented and seditious temper of the people, highly extolling at the same time a quiet and solitary retirement, a life without anguish of mind, free from envy and ill-will, and therefore more fit to dispatch important and weighty matters. A trial, which happened about this time, gave no small weight to the cunning insinuations of Sejanus. One Votienus Montanus (E), a man of great wit, was charged with contumelious speeches against the emperor. Æmilius the witness, a rough and unthinking soldier, to make good his evidence, repeated word for word what he had heard. The fathers endeavoured with their clamours to stop his mouth; but to no purpose, Æmilius obstinately persisting in the odious detail, and rehearsing with a loud voice all the reproaches he had ever heard uttered against the prince, who was so affected with them, that he could not forbear crying out, that he would instantly clear himself, either in their presence, or before an assembly of the people: Votienus was condemned, and, according to Eusebius h, confined to the Baleares islands.
 At the same time, was condemned to banishment Aquila, a woman of distinction, for adultery, and Apidius Merula expelled the senate for not having sworn upon the acts of Augustus i. Next were heard ambassadors from the Lacedæmonians and Messenians about the right each people claimed to a temple of Diana, which the senate, after hearing the parties, adjudged to the latter k. The citizens likewise of Segestum in Sicily sent deputies to Rome, begging, that the temple of Venus Erycina, fallen through age, might be rebuilt. This charge Tiberius readily took upon himself, because the Segestani were supposed to be likewise descended from the Trojans. Then a petition was heard from the inhabitants of Marseilles, claiming the estate of one *Vol-

^a catius Moschus, who, being banished from Rome and by them admitted a citizen, had left to their republic, as to his country, his whole fortune. Their claim was approved, and the estate of Moschus surrendered to them. This year died three ^{The deaths of some illustrious} Romans of great distinction, viz. Cneius Lentulus, Lucius Domitius, and Lucius Antonius. Lentulus had been consul, and rewarded for his victories over the Getuli with the ensigns of triumph: he had long borne private poverty with great patience, and afterwards with equal modesty enjoyed great wealth virtuously acquired. Domitius was the son of Lucius Domitius, who, being condemned by the Pedian law as privy to the murder of Julius Cæsar, though he was no ways accessory to it, betook himself to Brutus and Cassius, who were his kinsmen, and continued with them till their death; ^b after which he retained the command of the fleet, which they had given him long before, and considerably augmented it in spite of all his disasters. At length, when the republican party was irrecoverably ruined, he surrendered the fleet under his command to Marc Antony, and was the only person, condemned by the Pedian law, who was allowed to return to his native country, where he was advanced to the highest honours. Upon the breaking out of the civil war between Antony and Octavianus, the former appointed him his lieutenant; but he not approving of Antony's conduct, and some offering to confer the supreme command upon him, he retired to Augustus, and died a few days after ¹. His son, mentioned here by Tacitus, led a Roman army, beyond the Elb, and advanced farther into Germany than any had done before him; whence he was honoured with the ensigns of triumph. He married Antonia the younger, or, as Suetonius has it, the elder ^m, and had by her Cneius Domitius, the father of the emperor Nero. Lucius Antonius, who likewise died at this time, was the son of Julius Antonius, whom Augustus put to death on account of his criminal conversation with Julia. Upon the death of the father the emperor removed the son, then a child, to Marseilles, where, under pretence of pursuing his studies, he was long kept in an honourable exile. However, as he was the grandson of Octavia, Augustus's sister by his mother Marcella, he was honoured with a public funeral, and his bones were, by a decree of the senate, repositied in the tomb of the Octavian family ⁿ. During the administration of the same consuls, Lucius Piso, governor of the Hither ^{Lucius Piso governor of} Spain, as he travelled through the province unguarded, was attacked unawares by a ^{Hither Spain} peasant, and dispatched with one blow. The assassin, by the fleetness of his horse, ^{killed by a peasant.} escaped to a neighbouring forest, and there quitted him. But the horse being taken, the owner was soon discovered, seized, and put to the rack, which he bore with incredible constancy and resolution, declaring in the language of his country, that his accomplices might safely stand by; for no torture or pain, however exquisite, should extort from him a discovery. The next day, as they were dragging him again to the rack, he broke from his keepers, and dashed his head with such violence against a stone, that he immediately expired ^o.

THE following year, Lentulus Getulicus, the son of Cneius Lentulus mentioned above, and Caius Calvisius Sabinus being consuls, Poppæus Sabinus was honoured with the ensigns of triumph for his successful exploits against the wild Thracians, who had taken arms, and endeavoured to drive the Romans out of their country, on account of their raising recruits amongst them and conveying their stoutest youth out of the country. They were, after a most vigorous resistance, utterly defeated by Sabinus, and forced to submit. This year, discord began to reign in the imperial family, which we shall see end at last in the destruction of Agrippina. Claudia Pulchra, her cousin, being accused by Domitius Afer of adultery with one Furnius, and likewise of employing magical charms and preparing poison for the emperor, she flew to Tiberius; and finding him by chance sacrificing to Augustus, as she was, notwithstanding her great virtue, of a violent temper, she took occasion from the sacrifice he was offering to upbraid him, and tell him, that it ill became the same man to offer victims to the deified Augustus, and prosecute his posterity; that his divine spirit was not transfused into dumb statues and images; that the genuine images of Augustus were his descendants, of whom she herself was one, in great distress and in the state of a suppliant. She added, that other crimes were in vain alledged against Pulchra, when the only cause of her intended ruin was, that she had unadvisedly loved Agrippina, even to adoration, not remembering the fate of Sofia, whose condemnation and misfortunes were owing to the same crime, the like unseasonable affection. These bitter words highly highly provoked Tiberius; but nevertheless, as he had a perfect command of his temper, he only rebuked her, by telling her in a Greek verse, which he quoted out of an ancient tragedy, If you do not reign, you think yourself injured; and then dismissed her, without vouchsafing her any further answer. Pulchra and Furnius, notwithstanding the solicitations and remonstrances of Agrippina, were both condemned. Some time after, Agrippina falling sick, the emperor went to pay her a visit, when she, after many tears and long silence, at length intreated him to give her a husband, in whom she and the children of Germanicus might find a faithful protector against the malicious designs of their enemies. But Tiberius, well apprised to what a height of power in the state the person would be raised, who married the grand-daughter of Augustus, and, on the other hand, not caring openly to withstand so reasonable a request, lest it should betray jealousy or fear in him, instantly left her, though very pressing with him, without returning her any answer. This behaviour was highly resented by Agrippina, and Sejanus, to inflame her still more, and by that means hasten her ruin, employed his secret agents to warn her, under colour of friendship, that poison was prepared for her, and that she ought to avoid eating at her father-in-law's table. As Agrippina was a stranger to all dissimulation, she followed their advice; and though she sat near the emperor, touched no part of the meat; which Tiberius observing, to be the better convinced of her suspicions, after having praised the apples that stood before him, presented some of them to her with his own hand. This only increased the suspicion of Agrippina, who, without so much as offering to taste them, delivered them to the waiters. However, Tiberius, always dark and reserved, spoke not a word openly; but turning to his mother, No wonder, said he, that I should use severity with her, since she charges me with a design of poisoning her. Hence a rumour was immediately spread abroad, that her ruin was resolved upon; but that the emperor, not daring to attempt it openly, had chose to dispatch her by some secret means. Tiberius, to suppress that report, by diverting the public talk upon other topics, attended the senate with great assiduity, and gave audience to several ambassadors from Asia, contending in what city the temple lately decreed to Tiberius, should be built. For this honour eleven cities strove; but when the votes of the senators were collected, the pretensions of Smyrna were preferred (F). It was also moved by Vibius Marsus, that Lentulus, to whom had fallen the province of Asia, should have a legate extraordinary appointed to supervise the building of the temple. The motion was approved, and Lentulus impowered to chuse whom he pleased; but he through

(F) For this honour eleven cities strove with equal ambition, urging their antiquity and distinguished zeal for the Roman people, during their several wars with Perses, Aristonicus, and other kings. But the Hypæpenians, Trallians, Laodiceans, and Magnesian, were dismissed at once as not sufficient for the charge. The Ilienses or Trojans represented, that Troy was the mother of Rome; but had no advantage above the rest, besides the glory of antiquity. The Halicanassians urged, that for twelve hundred years their city had not been shaken by earthquakes, and promised to lay the foundations of the temple on a solid rock. The same plea was brought by the inhabitants of Pergamus; but as a temple was already erected in their city to Augustus, that distinction was judged sufficient for them. The cities of Ephesus and Miletus were thought already sufficiently taken up with the ceremonies of their peculiar deities, the former with those of Diana, the latter with those of Apollo. Thus the dispute was confined to Sardes and Smyrna. The former urged their antiquity, power and opulence; they recited a decree of the Hetrurians, acknowledging them for kinsmen. For they pretended to derive their original from Atys, the son of Hercules by Omphale, who, as we have related in the history of Lydia, is supposed to have had two sons, Lydus, and Tyrrhenus; the former remained in his native country, which from him was called Lydia, and the latter settled in Hetruria, where his followers were from him named Tyrrhenian. They likewise enlarged on the opulence of the ancient Lydians; on the colonies sent under Pelops into Greece, which from him took the name of Peloponnesus; their league with Rome during the war with Macedon, &c. The account they give here of their original does not intirely agree with what we read of it in Dionysius of Halicanassus and Velleius Paterculus (27). The Smyrneans likewise displayed the glory of their antiquity and founders, of whom we have spoken at length in our history of Asia; but insisted chiefly on their early friendship with Rome, and kindly offices to the Roman people, whom they assisted, not only in their foreign wars, but in those which were waged in the very bowels of Italy. They desired the fathers to remember, that they had, before any other people whatsoever, erected a temple to Rome, when the power of the Roman people was indeed great, but not yet raised to its greatest height, since Carthage was still standing, and Asia governed by mighty kings: they laid great stress on their generosity to Sylla, the miserable condition of whose army, ready to perish in a severe winter for want of cloaths, was no sooner related to the citizens of Smyrna, at that time by chance assembled, than they all stript themselves of their own garments, and sent them to the naked legions. This signal instance of their great fidelity and sincere attachment to the Roman people made so deep an impression upon the whole assembly, that the honour, for which so many cities contended, was by a great majority conferred upon them (28).

through modesty declining to name one, Valerius Nafō was drawn by lot from among those who had been prætors ^P.

THIS year at length, the twelfth of his reign, Tiberius put in execution the design, Tiberius a- which he had long meditated and from time to time deferred, of leaving Rome. At ^{bandons} Rome. his departure he gave out, that he was going into Campania only to dedicate a temple ^{Year after the} to Jupiter at Capua, and one at Nola to Augustus; but in truth determined never to ^{flood 3025.} return to Rome. Most historians, who wrote before Tacitus, ascribe this his resolu- ^{Of Christ 26.} tion to the artful insinuations of Sejanus; but, as he continued in his retirement six ^{Of Rome 774} years after the disgrace and execution of Sejanus, that writer thinks he was influenced by some other more powerful motive, namely, that of concealing in the darkness of a retired and solitary place his natural inclination to cruelty, lewdness, and debauchery (G). Some believed, that in his old age he was ashamed of the figure of his person; for he was very thin, tall, and stooped; his head was bald, his face full of ulcers, and for the most part besmeared with ointments (H). During his retirement at Rhodes, he used to avoid, as much as he could, appearing in public, and to conceal his debaucheries in the recess of a solitary life; whence many concluded, that he had been prevailed upon, not so much by the plausible persuasions of Sejanus, as by his own natural inclinations, to retire from the city. Some gave out, that he was driven from Rome by the restless and insupportable ambition of his mother, whom on one hand he scorned to admit as a partner in the sovereignty, but on the other could not intirely exclude, since the sovereignty itself was her gift (I). Whatever ^{What prompt-} was his motive, though he removed to several places, he never returned once to the ^{ed him to re-} city ^{tire.}

(G) As to his debauchery, Suetonius tells us, that in his youth he was much given to drinking, that instead of Tiberius Claudius Nero, he was nicknamed Biberius Caldius Mero. Afterwards being raised to the sovereign power, continues the same writer, at the very time he was reforming the manners of the people, he spent one night and two days in carousing with Pomponius Flaccus and L. Piso, to one of whom he gave immediately the province of Syria, and to the other the government of Rome, styling them in his letters, jucundissimos & omnium horarum amicos. Being invited to supper by Sextius Gallus, an old debauchee, who had been noted with infamy by Augustus and severely reprimanded by himself in the senate, he accepted the invitation, upon condition, that he altered nothing of his old way, and that they were served at table by naked virgins. He preferred a man of a mean extraction, who stood for the quæstorship, to several competitors of great distinction, for no other reason, but because he had drank with him an incredible quantity of wine at one meal. He presented Asellius Sabinus with two hundred thousand sesterces for a dialogue he wrote between the mushroom, the beccafico, or fig-pecker, the oyster, and the thrush, which were all his favourite dishes (29). As to his lewdness, excesses so detestably infamous are related of him by the same writer, that they seem almost incredible. We shall not defile our history with the infamous detail he gives us of them, but only relate one instance out of the many which that author produces. He tells us, that a very scandalous picture, done by the famous Parrhasius, and representing Atalanta and Meleager, being left to the emperor as a legacy, upon condition, that if he liked not that piece, he should have a million of sesterces paid him immediately in its stead, he not only preferred it to the said sum, but caused it to be hung up in his room (30).

(H) Suetonius describes his person thus: he was, says he, of a strong well-set body, somewhat exceeding the common size; broad in the breast and shoulders, in the rest of his limbs from head to foot well proportioned. He used for the most part his left hand, in the joints of which he had such strength, that he could run his fingers through a green apple, however sound, and stun a man with a fillip. His complexion was fair; his hair long behind, so as to cover his neck, which was peculiar to the Claudian family. His countenance was graceful, though covered with small pimples: he had large eyes, and could see in the dark, but only for a short time, and when he first awaked. He stooped, especially when he walked, and shewed always a great deal of severity in his stern looks. He was slow of speech, and in private conversation was continually moving his fingers, in a manner which no ways became him. All these imperfections, says the same writer, and indications of arrogance Augustus observed in him, and frequently endeavoured to excuse to the senate and people, representing to them, that they were defects in nature, but no imperfections in his mind. He was very healthy, and scarce ever out of order the whole time he was emperor, though from the thirtieth year of his age he lived as he pleased, without hearkening to his physicians (31).

(I) Livia having pressed him very earnestly, as we read in Suetonius, to advance a person, whom he had admitted citizen of Rome, into the number of the decuries, he absolutely refused to do it, unless she would allow it to be inserted in the register; That it was extorted from him by his mother. This Livia took greatly amiss, and immediately produced certain letters which Augustus had formerly written to her, complaining of his stubborn temper and the intolerable perverseness of his manners, and caused them to be publicly read. This inspired him with such an aversion to the empress, who had so long preserved, and so maliciously produced, these letters, that being no longer able to bear the sight of her, he was thought by some to have withdrawn from Rome, that he might have no farther intercourse or communication with her (32). Tacitus makes no mention of these letters, but only says, that Livia, who knew he was indebted to her alone for the empire, since she had prevailed upon Augustus to adopt, contrary to his inclination, Tiberius, and exclude Germanicus, imperiously reclaimed the power which she had procured him.

city during the remaining part of his reign. He departed with a small attendance, having with him but one senator, Cocceius Nerva, formerly consul, and well versed in the knowledge of the laws, one Roman knight, besides Sejanus, by name Curtius Atticus (K), and some men of letters, chiefly Greeks, with whose conversation he was pleased and amused. Suetonius tells us, he left orders, that during his absence no one should come near him, and that on his journey he declined all communication. Upon his departure the astrologers gave out, that he left Rome under such a conjunction of the planets, that he would never return thither, and that his end was at hand. That he was never to return to Rome proved true; but the conjectures, published by the astrologers concerning his death, ought to have convinced the world of the fallshood of that art, since it proved fatal to its professors, of whom many were for their predictions either put to death, or involved in endless calamities, which with all their knowledge of the stars they had not foreseen; whereas Tiberius lived eleven years after his retreat. However, their conjectures touching his death were very near being fulfilled soon after his departure; for as he was supping in a cave of one of his villas, called thence Spelunca (B), its mouth fell suddenly in, and buried under it some of his attendants; which so frightened the rest, that, abandoning the emperor, they all fled, except Sejanus, who covering the emperor's body with his own, and, stooping upon his knees and hands, received all the stones that fell from the roof; so that Tiberius escaped quite unhurt. From this time the emperor, looking upon him as one quite regardless of his own safety and only solicitous about his, reposed an intire confidence in him, blindly following all his counsels, however bloody and destructive. This confidence the wicked minister abused to the destruction of the family of Germanicus, which alone could thwart his ambitious designs. He attacked first Nero, Germanicus's eldest son, and consequently next in succession, suborning persons to misrepresent all his actions to Tiberius. Nero was a young prince no ways ambitious, but unmindful of that circumspection which his present situation required. He was also misled and ill-advised by his freed-men and followers, who, desirous of having the power in their own hands, were continually animating him to exert the courage and resolution becoming a person in his station; that both the people and soldiery longed to see him share the government with his grandfather; and that as to Sejanus, he would not dare to oppose him, though he now equally insulted the tameness of an old man and the sloth of a youth. As the young prince gave ear to such suggestions, some unguarded expressions escaped, which were immediately caught up by the spies placed upon him, and with aggravations carried to the emperor, who would not so much as allow him the privilege of clearing himself. He was even betrayed by his wife Julia, the daughter of Drusus and Livia, who acquainted her mother and

(K) Curtius Atticus was in high favour with Tiberius, which was the cause of his ruin, Sejanus, who was jealous of his power, having by false insinuations brought him into disgrace. To him Ovid inscribed two elegies, viz. the fourth and seventh of his second book de Ponto.

(B) Seneca tells us, that the Romans, generally speaking, chose to build their country seats near some cave, to which they frequently resorted, especially in the summer. He gives us a very particular description of two grottos or caves adjoining to the country seat of Vatia. The cave spoken of here lay, according to our historian, between the Amyclean sea and the mountains of Fundi, or, as it is now called, Fondi, that is, between Caieta and Tarracina; for between these two places stood Amyclæ, which gave its name to the neighbouring sea. Pliny (33) and Solinus (34) tell us, that the territory of Amyclæ was so infested with serpents and vipers, that the inhabitants were obliged to abandon their dwellings and settle elsewhere. Amyclæ is mentioned by Virgil:

says that poet (35). He gives the epithet of tacitus, silent, to Amyclæ, either because it was built by the Lacedæmonians, who, as they followed the doctrine of Pythagoras, always inculcating silence, were thence called taciti, or because of a law which obtained in this place, forbidding under severe penalties any one to mention the approach of an enemy. These are the conjectures of Servius in his comments upon this place. He adds, that before this law was made the city was daily alarmed by false reports, as if the enemy had been already at the gates, from which terrors and uneasiness the above-mentioned law indeed delivered them; but in the end it proved their ruin; for no one venturing to transgress it, even when the enemy appeared unexpectedly under the walls, the city was taken and destroyed. To this Silius alluded in the following words.

-----quasque evertere silentia, Amyclæ (36):

and Lucilius, as quoted by Servius, I must speak, for by silence the city of Amyclæ was destroyed. Amyclæ was built by a colony from another city of the same name in Laconia (37).

a by her means Sejanus, not only with the words, but even with the sighs and dreams, of her husband. His brother Drusus was likewise drawn into the combination, with the hopes of immediately succeeding Tiberius, if his elder brother, already in disgrace, were effectually set aside (C). The emperor, thus prejudiced against him, even by his nearest relations and those who were thought to be his best friends, always received him with a stern countenance; if the youth spoke, there were crimes in his words; and crimes in his silence, if he spoke nothing. Sejanus, having by these base arts set Tiberius against Nero, began to consult with his creatures how he might inflame him at the same time against Drusus and Agrippina, that the whole family of Germanicus might be involved in the same ruins. We shall soon see what steps he took towards the compassing of that design. In the end of this year, died Asinius Agrippa, descended of a family renowned rather than ancient (D), himself not unworthy of his ancestors; and Quintus Haterius of a senatorial family, and famous for eloquence while he lived, though the orations he left behind him were not much esteemed, the harmony of his voice, as our historian observes, which charmed the ears of his hearers, dying with him (E). This year Pontius Pilate was appointed by Tiberius governor of Judæa in the room of Valerius Gratus. How he behaved during his ten years administration, appears from Philo, and from what we have said in our history of the Jews^x.

Consults how to destroy the whole family of Germanicus.

THE following year, M. Licinius Crassus and Lucius Calpurnius Piso being consuls, Atilius, one of the race of freedmen, having built an amphitheatre at Fidenæ, in order to exhibit in it a shew of gladiators, vast crouds flocked thither from Rome, eager for such shews, as during the reign of Tiberius they were debarred from diversions at home. But, as the spectators were intent upon the gladiators, the amphitheatre, which was but slightly built and overcharged with the multitude, fell down, and with its fall destroyed or maimed fifty thousand persons. Suetonius says, that twenty thousand souls perished by this sad stroke. On this occasion the great men of Rome threw open their doors to receive such as had been hurt, supplied them with medicines, and took all possible care of them till they recovered. Thus, to the great satisfaction of the city, was revived at this juncture the public spirit of the ancient Romans, who after great battles constantly relieved the wounded, sustained them by their bounties, and restored them with care. Suetonius tells us, that Tiberius, upon the news of this dreadful calamity, immediately left Capreæ, passed over to the continent, and allowed persons of all ranks to come to him; but according to Tacitus he had not yet withdrawn to that island, but was either at Capua or Nola. Atilius, who had built the amphitheatre only for gain, and therefore employed bad materials and unskilful workmen, was banished; and it was provided for the future, by a decree of the senate, that no man, who was not worth four hundred thousand sesterces, should exhibit the shew of gladiators^a. The public affliction from this terrible blow was yet fresh, when another supervened. A fire breaking out on mount Cælius burnt with such rage and violence, that it utterly consumed all the houses in that quarter of the city. On this occasion Tiberius gave proofs of a generosity truly worthy of a great prince. For at his own expence he made good the loss of every sufferer, seeking out, of his own accord, the unknown, and, without any ambitious views, without the application of friends, relieving them by his bounty. For this the senate returned him thanks, and decreed, that mount Cælius should for the future be styled Mount Augustus, since the statue of Tiberius, which stood there in the house of

(C) Drusus was prompted to combine against his brother, not only by a passion for power, and by the usual and too common competition among brothers, but also by the partiality of Agrippina, who was fond of Nero, and shewed no great affection for him (38).

(D) Asinius Agrippa was the son of Asinius Gallus, of whom we have spoke above, and grandson of the famous Asinius Pollio, one of Augustus's chief favourites, by whom he was raised to great honours, though the Asinian family had made no figure till his time; and hence Tacitus says, that Asinius Agrippa was of ancestors more illustrious than ancient.

(E) Quintus Haterius is mentioned also by Seneca, who names him among the orators more applauded for their delivery than their compositions. Eusebius calls him a ready and popular orator, and adds, that he lived in great honours, and died in the ninetieth year of his age (39).

Junius the senator was spared by the flames, though every thing round it was consumed (F).

As the universal zeal of the great men in Rome and the generous bounty of the prince administered great relief in the present misfortunes, so the fury and rage of the informers, which grew daily more dreadful, involved without alleviation the most illustrious citizens in endless calamities. Quintilius Varus, a man of great wealth and related to the emperor (G), was accused by Domitius Afer, the same who had arraigned his mother Claudia Pulchra. The informer had, it seems, squandered away what he had earned by procuring the condemnation of Claudia; and therefore in hopes of a more ample reward had marked out and doomed to destruction Varus, one of the most wealthy men in Rome. The city was surprised to see Publius Dolabella, a man of an illustrious family and nearly related to Varus, join a person of such an infamous character as Afer, against his kinsman. The senate was so shocked with it, that they refused to hear the charge, and voted, that the trial should be postponed till the return of the emperor^b.

Tiberius retires to Caprea.

In the mean time, Tiberius, having dedicated the temples in Campania, though he had by an edict warned the public not to disturb him, and posted soldiers on all the roads to prevent the concourse of people to the towns where he resided, nevertheless hating all towns and every place on the continent, retired at length to Caprea, an island separated from the cape of Surrentum by a channel of three miles. The air is mild there in the winter, the cold winds being intercepted by a mountain, and refreshed in the summer by gales from the west. The sea, open all round it, makes a delightful view: from thence was seen then one of the most beautiful coasts in the world; but which was afterwards greatly damaged by the eruptions of mount Vesuvius. The island was surrounded on all sides with inaccessible rocks, and a profound and almost bottomless sea, which was void of havens, and had but few stations for the smaller vessels, and those very difficult of access; so that none could put in unperceived by the guards (H); and this, as is commonly believed, was what chiefly took Tiberius, who confined himself to twelve stately villas on the island, some of which were probably built by Augustus, who, liking the solitude and mild air of the place, purchased it, according to Dion Cassius^c, of the Neapolitans. There Tiberius spent the last ten years of his life, giving himself intirely up to the most infamous lewdness and debaucheries, which for us shall be buried in oblivion, who think the detail Suetonius has published of them equally scandalous and unworthy of an historian. In that dark recess he threw off all concern for the commonwealth, though he had been to that time very assiduous in the administration of justice, and wholly intent upon public cares. But nevertheless he retained his old inclination to suspicions, and gave more credit than ever to informers, Sejanus inflaming his jealousies and fomenting his distrusts for the private views of his ambition. Secret spies and informers were employed in all parts of the city, which caused daily disturbances and the ruin of many worthy citizens. If a person of merit testified any zeal for the glory of the empire, Tiberius immediately suspected it was from a secret design of gaining it. If another had an innocent remembrance of liberty, he was looked upon as a dangerous person, and one who aimed at re-establishing the commonwealth. To praise any of the ancient Romans was a capital crime; to bewail Augustus was complaining of Tiberius, &c. Every action became liable to forced interpretations; the most innocent discourses expressed

(F) Suetonius disagreeing, as he often does, with Tacitus, tells us, that Tiberius exerted on this occasion his generosity, and made good to the sufferers all the losses they had sustained; but that he did it with so much affectation of his own liberality, that he caused mount Cælius to be called thenceforth mount Augustus, with a view of perpetuating the memory of his liberality. Tiberius was, as evidently appears from innumerable instances, an utter enemy to all flattery, pomp, and ostentation, which inclines us to prefer the authority of Tacitus to that of Suetonius.

(G) Quintilius Varus was probably son to the commander of that name, who was with the Roman legions cut off in Germany in the manner we have related above. He married one of Germanicus's daughters, as we read in Seneca (40). Besides, he was the son of Claudia Pulchra, whom Tacitus calls Agrippina's cousin, and by that means too related to the reigning family.

(H) Suetonius tells us, that a few days after his arrival in the island of Caprea, a fisherman brought him a mullet of an extraordinary size; but that the emperor, instead of rewarding him, caused him to be used most barbarously, being frightened with the consideration, that he had made his way to him through places which he thought unfrequented and inaccessible. (41).

a expressed evil designs ; a discreet silence concealed mischievous intentions ; joy betrayed hopes of the prince's death, melancholly envy of his prosperity, and fear the just apprehensions of a guilty conscience. So that to speak, to be silent, to be glad, to be grieved, to be fearful, or assured, were all crimes, and frequently punished with death. But Sejanus's pernicious practices and wicked devices were chiefly levelled against Agrippina and her son Nero. As there was now no access to Tiberius, but by him, he made no longer his attempts upon them a secret, but openly placed guards about them to observe the messages they sent, the visits and company they received, their behaviour in public, their private conversation, &c. Besides, he suborned some of their friends, to advise them, as they were thus distressed, either to fly to the armies b in Germany, or, embracing the statue of Augustus in the forum, to implore the aid and protection of the senate and Roman people. These counsels, though rejected by them, were laid to their charge, as if they had intended to put them in execution d.

THE following year, when Appius Junius Silanus and P. Silius Nerva were consuls, began tragically. Titius Sabinus, an illustrious Roman knight, was hurried to prison, Titius Sabinus how circumvented. for no other crime but his steady and faithful adherence to the family of Germanicus, being circumvented by the blackest treachery. One Latinius Latiaris, having insinuated himself into his friendship with a design to betray him, first bewailed the case of Agrippina and her son Nero ; and then, as Sabinus burst into tears, inveighed bitterly against Sejanus's pride and cruelty, not sparing the emperor himself. Sabinus, c not aware of the snare, approved all he said ; and being softened with compassion for the misfortunes of the unhappy family of his friend Germanicus, he added many, but severe, reflections of his own upon the cruelty of Tiberius, and imperious conduct of his favourite minister. And now the traitor, wanting only witnesses to compass the ruin of one who reposed in him an intire confidence, placed three senators, who had combined with him against Sabinus, between the roof of his room and the cieling, a place no less unbecoming men of their rank, than the treachery, which made them thus degrade themselves, was execrable. The senators, Porcius Cato, Petilius Rufus, and Marcus Opius, who, having been all prætors, aspired at the consulship, to which d there was no access but by Sejanus, and his favour was to be purchased only by iniquity, having thrust themselves into the above-mentioned lurking-place, Latiaris went abroad to find out Sabinus, whom he easily drew home and into his chamber, under pretence of relating to him some late discoveries. Then he began his former complaints, speaking mighty things of Germanicus, and exclaiming against the cruelties of Tiberius and Sejanus. Sabinus, not suspecting the least treachery, readily joined him, and, resuming his former detail of the calamities they had already undergone, and were likely to undergo, inveighed with great bitterness against the authors of them, Sejanus and Tiberius. This was enough ; the three senators, who had been listening the whole time with their ears close to holes and chinks, dispatched forthwith a memorial to the emperor, acquainting him with what had passed, though they e could not well do it, without discovering to him at the same time their own detestable infamy. Tiberius immediately wrote to the senate, and after having charged in his letter Sabinus with treason, required the conscript fathers in plain terms to take vengeance of a traitor, who had aimed at his life. Hereupon the supposed criminal was immediately sentenced to death, and the same day, the first of the new year, which was a great festival among the Romans, executed, without being allowed time to make his defence (I). The city was never seized with greater dread ; one relation He is condemned and feared executed.

d Idem, c. 67.

(I) Sabinus, says Tacitus, was dragged away to immediate death, with his head muffled in his robe and a rope about his neck : but nevertheless, exerting his voice as far as he could, he cried out, With these solemnities the year begins ; these are the victims which Sejanus offers ; for on the first day of the new year victims were slain in all the temples. Such a dismal sight occasioned universal terror, flight, and solitude. where-ever the unhappy victim appeared, the people, to avoid betraying any marks of grief or compassion, fled, and withdrew in the utmost consternation ; so that all along, as he passed, the streets were empty, and the public places deserted. Some, however, who had fled, returned, and shewed themselves again, dreading, that their having discovered dread might prove fatal to them. The law, which had been enacted a few years before, granting to every condemned person ten days respite, was, it seems, neglected on this occasion ; for Tacitus tells us, that the unfortunate Sabinus was immediately after condemnation hurried away and executed without being imprisoned. The fidelity of Sabinus's dog made his death be more spoken of ; for he constantly kept close to him, followed his body while it was dragged through the streets, and threw himself after it into the Tiber, where he perished (42). Pliny relates this story at length, and assures us, that it was preserved in the public registers of the city (43).

feared another ; a general distrust reigned among men of all ranks ; strangers and acquaintance were equally avoided ; nay, even dumb and inanimate things, roofs and walls, occasioned dread and circumspection. The emperor no sooner heard of the execution of Sabinus, than he wrote to the senate, thanking them for having punished an enemy to the commonwealth. He added in his letter, that he led a life full of fear and anxiety, and that he was under continual apprehensions of the snares of his enemies : though he named none, yet it was no ways doubted but he meant Agrippina and Nero, against whom he was constantly incensed by Sejanus and his creatures. Just vengeance soon overtook the authors and contrivers of such a black piece of treachery ; for some of them perished miserably under the emperor Caius, and some under Tiberius himself, who, though he would not suffer the ministers of his tyranny to be crushed by others, yet, surfeited with their infamy, he often sacrificed them himself to the public vengeance, to make room for new ones, who were daily offering the same vile services ^e.

revolt and de-
pronius.

WHEN Tiberius's letter was read in the senate, Asinius Gallus moved, that the prince should be desired to explain his fears, and suffer the senate to remove the cause of them. This the emperor highly resented, thinking that Asinius was apprised of his dissimulation ; but, however, smothered his wrath for the present, Sejanus striving to appease him, not out of any kindness to Gallus, but because he knew the more his anger was restrained, the more tragical it would prove at last. This year the Frisians, no longer able to bear with the tyranny of the Romans sent to govern them, shook off the yoke, and defeated L. Apronius, who was dispatched against them with a considerable force (K). But Tiberius chose rather to dissemble the loss the empire had sustained, than trust any able general with the command of the army. The senate indeed met on this occasion ; but, instead of deliberating about an affair of such importance, they only decreed statues to Tiberius and Sejanus, being no ways affected with the losses sustained on the extremities of the empire, but wholly intent on securing themselves, by the most shameful flattery, against the evils that threatened them at home. They importuned both the prince and his favourite with repeated solicitations, that they would be pleased only to shew themselves in Rome. But to no purpose ; they could not by any intreaties be prevailed upon to approach the city, thinking it sufficient condescension to

in order of battle, ordered his auxiliaries, supported by some legionary horse, to charge them. The Frisians not only stood their ground, but repulsed first the auxiliaries, and afterwards five cohorts, sent successively to their relief. Hereupon Apronius ordered the whole cavalry of the legions to advance ; but that body being put into disorder by those who fled, before they could charge the enemy, Cethegus Labeo, legate of the fifth legion, was ordered to fall upon the Frisians at the head of the rest of the auxiliaries. He was attended with no better success ; for his men, being soon put into disorder, would have given ground, had not the whole army, and first of all the fifth legion, hastened to their relief. Then the Frisians retired in good order, the Roman general not thinking it adviseable to pursue them : nay, he did not deem it safe to remain on the field of battle, till he had buried the dead, tho' many officers of distinction were slain. Besides those who fell on the side of the Romans in the engagement, a body of nine hundred men, who had separated from the rest, were all cut off, after having defended themselves the whole night in a grove called Badubenna. Another band of four hundred men, having possessed themselves of a country-seat of a petty prince, named Cruptorix, once a tributary to Rome, and fearing they should be delivered up to the enemy, chose rather to fall by the hands of one another. This disgrace Tiberius dissembled, not daring to trust any experienced commander with the conduct of the war. So that the Frisians enjoyed their ancient liberties unmolested till the succeeding reign (44).

a quit their island for a few days, and suffer themselves to be seen on the coast of Campania. Thither crowded senators, knights, and great part of the people, all eager to be seen by Sejanus, who was more difficult of access than the emperor himself, and admitted such only as were either his creatures, or by his creatures recommended to him. His thus seeing the greatest men of the empire crouching, with the meanness of slaves, before him, heightened his arrogance; nay, persons of the first rank were not ashamed to cringe to his slaves, to court the favour of his porters, and bear their insults with incredible patience. Many, after having continued several days and nights in the open fields, in hopes of being admitted at last to his presence, were in the end ordered to depart without the satisfaction of seeing him. These returned trembling, and seized with dread and terror; whereas such as he had daigned to receive were filled with joy, not knowing how fatal his friendship would soon prove to them. As for Tiberius, having here betrothed Agrippina, his grand-daughter by Germanicus, to Cneius Domitius (L), and ordered the nuptials to be celebrated at Rome, he quitted the continent and returned to his island^f. This year died Julia, grand-daughter to Augustus, by whom, after her marriage with Æmilius Paulus, she had been on account of her loose and scandalous behaviour banished to the island of Trimetus, where she died after twenty years of exile.

THE following year, L. Rubellius Geminus and Caius Fusius Geminus (M) being consuls, died Livia, the mother of Tiberius, commonly styled in the ancient inscriptions Julia Augusta, because adopted by Augustus in his last will into the Julian family. We have already spoken of her descent and marriage with Augustus, by whom she had no issue; but by the marriage of Germanicus and Agrippina, her blood came to be mixed with that of Augustus in their great grandchildren. She had an absolute sway over Augustus, which she acquired and maintained, says Dion Cassius, by a ready acquiescence to his will, without ever betraying the least desire to know what he concealed from her, or any jealousy or dissatisfaction on account of his intrigues with other women. In her were united the wisdom of her husband and the dissimulation of her son. She was so passionate for the grandeur of her children, that she was not without good grounds suspected of having purchased it with the destruction of her husband's family. For she was charged with the death of Marcellus, of Caius and Lucius Cæsars, of Agrippa Posthumus, nay, and of Augustus himself, which she was supposed by some to have hastened. She was an irreconcilable enemy to Julia the daughter of Augustus, and never ceased persecuting her whole offspring. She challenged an equal share with her son in the power which she had procured him. This Tiberius was not of a temper to bear; and hence the misunderstanding between them, which gave occasion to the satirical verses, we have related above. He frequently warned her not to meddle with state affairs, which he said were above the sphere of a woman. He avoided her conversation, especially in private, as much as he decently could, lest he should seem to be governed by her counsels. Being informed, that on occasion of a fire she had run immediately among the people, encouraging both them and the soldiers to stop the rage of the flames, as she used to do in the time of Augustus, he reprimanded

(L) Cn. Domitius was descended of a very ancient family, and besides was nearly related to the Cæsars: for he was the son of L. Domitius, of whom we have spoken above, and Antonia Major, the daughter of Octavia and Marc Antony; so that Augustus was his great uncle. By Agrippina he had the emperor Nero, and was, as Suetonius observe, worthy to be the father of such a prince, being in every part of his life detestable. In his youth he attended Caius Cæsar into the Levant, and there slew one of his freedmen, for no other reason, but because he refused to drink as much as he commanded him. On his return to Rome he drove his chariot over a boy on purpose, and trod him to death: in the midst of the forum he pulled out the eve of a Roman knight, for reprehending him with more than ordinary liberty. While he was prætor, he defrauded the victors in the chariot races of their prizes. About the latter end of Tiberius's reign he was accused of treason, of adultery, and incest with his sister Lepida; but Tiberius dying, he escaped the punishment due to his crimes. He died under the emperor Caius of a dropsy, leaving behind him Nero by Agrippina. We are told, that being congratulated by his friends upon the birth of his son Nero, he answered, that nothing could proceed from Agrippina and him, but what was detestable, and would prove pernicious to the commonwealth (45).

(M) The consulate of the two Gemini is famous in the ecclesiastical history, many of the ancient christian writers having held, that our Saviour was crucified during their administration, which opinion is now followed by very few. Aulus Plautius, famous for his wars in Britain under Claudius, and L. Nonius Asprenas were substituted to the two Gemini the fifteenth day of July, as we gather from Gruter's inscriptions (46), and cardinal Noris's epistola consularis, printed at Bologna in 1682 (47).

manded her with some acrimony^b. We are told, that by degrees he arrived at such a height of iniquity, as to hate and detest herⁱ. At least it is certain, that during the three years she lived after his retirement, he never saw her but once, and then for a very short time. In her last malady, he never came near her, though he constantly gave out that he designed to pay his last offices to her; insomuch, that her body was kept in continual expectation of his arrival, till it began to putrify, and could be no longer borne. Afterwards he excused himself by a letter to the senate, pleading the multitude of public affairs. He would not suffer any divine honours to be paid to her memory, pretending her express command to the contrary. Nay, in his letter to the senate, he reflected on those who courted the friendship of women, alluding to the consul Fufius, who was a great favourite of the sex, in high esteem with Livia, but hated by Tiberius, whom, as he was a man of wit, he used to play upon with biting sarcasms^k. We are told, that he prosecuted all her friends, above all, those to whom she had committed the care of her funeral; that of the many honours decreed her, he admitted but very few, and that he suppressed her last will, which was not executed till after his death under his successor Caius, who caused divine worship to be appointed her^l. She died, according to Pliny^m, in the eighty-second, according to Dion Cassius, in the eighty-sixth, year of her age.

He becomes more cruel after her death.

THOUGH Tiberius allowed his mother no great power, nevertheless, as he was indebted to her for the empire, he avoided openly opposing her; so that by her means many innocent persons were saved from ruin, Sejanus not daring to arrogate an authority superior to that of a parent. But after her death, both the prince and his favourite, being let loose from all restraint, set no bounds to their unbridled fury. Letters were immediately dispatched to the senate against Agrippina and Nero, which were thought to have been written before, and suppressed by Livia. They were couched in terms remarkably bitter, and yet they charged Nero with no crimes against the state, but only with unnatural lust and other impure pleasures. Agrippina's known virtue screened her from any imputations of this nature; her haughty looks therefore, and her violent, imperious, and ungovernable temper, were alledged against her. These letters, when read in the senate, struck the whole assembly with terror. The fathers continued long silent, looking with surprise at one another, till at length, some, desirous of currying favour with Sejanus and Tiberius, demanded that they should proceed upon the emperor's letters. The magistrates and leading men were at a loss how to behave on so nice and critical a subject; for though the expressions in the letter were very bitter, yet all the rest was left ambiguous. At length they concurred with Junius Rusticus, whom they thought well acquainted with the emperor's intentions, since by him he had been appointed to keep a journal of their proceedings. Rusticus had never before shewn the least instance of generosity, but nevertheless either by some secret impulse, or because unmindful of present dangers, he dreaded less Tiberius than the children of Agrippina, he opposed Cotta Messalinus's cruel motion, and exhorted the consuls to suspend their deliberations, and allow the old man time to change his wrath into repentance, since one moment might give a new turn to affairs. At the same time, the people, carrying with them the images of Agrippina and Nero, surrounded the senate-house, and, wishing happiness and prosperity to Tiberius, cried out incessantly, that the letters were counterfeit, and that the ruin of the prince's family was pursued against his will, and without his privity. Nothing was therefore concluded that day. In the mean time, several speeches were dispersed about the city, said to have been uttered in the senate against Sejanus by the consuls; but all feigned, and filled with most bitter and satirical reflections, as the authors of them were not known. This fired Sejanus, who immediately wrote to the senate, upbraiding them in the sharpest terms with despising the resentments of the prince, with listening to popular and disaffected harangues, with passing new and unprecedented acts, &c. He concluded, that nothing wanted to complete their rebellion, but to take arms, and place at their head those, whose images they had already chosen for their ensigns. Tiberius likewise wrote a second letter to the senate, repeating his reproaches against his grandson and daughter-in-law, and complaining of Rusticus, the senate, and the people, for insulting his authority, and making no account of his resentment; but at the same time he reserved to himself the final decision of the whole affair. The senate hesitated no longer, but instantly declared, that they were ready to inflict the deserved punishments on such as had by their crimes provoked his displeasure, provided he would allow them on so just an occasion to exert their authority^a. We are sorry we cannot give such an account as the reader may expect of the further proceedings of the emperor and the senate against the unhappy Agrippina and her children, being destitute in this place of our faithful guide Tacitus, in whose excellent history begins here a chasm for almost three years, by which we have lost the detail of the most material transactions of Tiberius's reign, namely of the condemnation and banishment of Agrippina and her two children, Nero and Drusus, of the disgrace and execution of Sejanus, of the further wickedness and death of Livilla, the widow of Drusus and daughter-in-law to Tiberius, &c. In short, time has robbed us of the flower, we may say, of Tacitus's incomparable annals; so that we must, for the transactions of this year and the two following, recur to other writers, and be satisfied with their accounts, however imperfect. As for Agrippina, she was condemned and banished to the island of Pandataria, now known by the name of Santa Maria, over-against Tarracina and Gaeta. We are told, that, as she could not forbear reproaching Tiberius with cruelty, and bitterly inveighing against him, the centurion, to whose custody she was committed, gave her so many blows on the face, that he struck out one of her eyes^p. Nero her eldest son, was likewise condemned and banished to the island of Pontia, now Ponza, near that of Pandataria; and Drusus, her second son, by the same vile arts of Sejanus, declared an enemy to the state, and kept under close confinement in the lower part of the palace. Nero died soon after in the place of his exile, some say for want of necessaries, while others tell us, that the young prince, frightened at the sight of the executioner, who entered his room with the instruments of death in his hand, as if he had been sent by the senate, chose to put an end to his life by voluntary abstinence^q. Agrippina and Drusus lived four years in exile, that is, to the year of Christ 33, when we shall have occasion to speak of their tragical end. Cn. Lentulus Getulicus was this year appointed commander of the legions in Upper Germany, in which employment he was continued for the space of ten years^r.

THE next consuls were L. Cassius Longinus and M. Vinicius (N). This year the senate decreed many extraordinary honours to Sejanus; among the rest, it was ordained, that his birth day should be yearly celebrated; that his statues, which were set up in every quarter of the city, should be adored; that vows and sacrifices should be offered for his safety, &c. In short, he became, after the disgrace and condemnation of Agrippina and her children, so powerful and formidable, that he was more respected and dreaded than Tiberius himself. As there was no access to honours but through his favour, the soldiers, the senators, and all the great men of the empire, were intirely at his devotion; so that by their means he was immediately informed of all the actions of the prince, while no one dared to discover to the emperor the ambitious designs and views of his minister, though they were all well apprised of them^s. However, he began to suspect him at last. Josephus tells us, that Antonia, the widow of his brother Drusus, having received private intelligence of the deep designs and secret practices of Sejanus, wrote a detail of them to the emperor, sending the letter to Capreae by Pallas, one of her most trusty domestics, the same who afterwards became so famous under the emperor Claudius^t. The emperor, thus warned of his danger, and recovering from his fatal blindness, began to consider with himself how he might thwart the ambitious views of his over-powerful minister, and deliver himself from the impending ruin. The prætorian cohorts were more addicted to the minister than to the sovereign, being filled with his creatures; the senate was intirely at his devotion; even those whom the emperor had about him were so many spies in the pay of Sejanus; so that Tiberius was kept in a kind of captivity, from which it was no easy matter to disengage himself. But he surmounted all difficulties with incredible incredible address, which he thought it more adviseable to employ than open force, ^a left Sejanus, finding himself discovered, and thence driven to despair, should make a bold push and attempt the empire. The first step he took was to remove him from Capreæ, and in order to this, he declared his intention of taking upon him the consulate the next year, and named Sejanus for his colleague. This the haughty minister, ^b not suspecting any snare, looked upon as the greatest mark of distinction the emperor could confer upon him. It is not to be doubted, but he created him at the same time senator; for Sejanus five years before, when the emperor removed from Rome, was but a knight, and we have not in the whole Roman history an instance of a knight being raised to the consular dignity. In the end of the year, Tiberius dispatched Sejanus to Rome to take possession of his new dignity there on the calends ^c of January, which he did accordingly; but the emperor did not remove from his island, where he entered upon his fifth consulship, and held it to the fifteenth of May, when he resigned the fasces to Faustus Cornelius Sylla ^d (O). As Tiberius continued to shew the same affection to Sejanus, the senate was for the greatest part of the year wholly taken up in decreeing him new honours. His name was added to that of Tiberius in all inscriptions; new statues were erected to him, and victims slain before them: a decree passed confirming the consulate to him and Tiberius for the term of five years; his house was crouded from morning to night with persons of all ranks; nay, the greatest men in Rome were not ashamed to court, with the meanest submissions, the favour of his slaves and freedmen. In short, one would have taken Tiberius, ^e as Dion Cassius observes, for the prince of his small island, and Sejanus for the sovereign of Rome. However, several prodigies are said to have happened at this time, which seemed to forbode the downfall of the favourite minister; but if any deity, says our historian, had revealed what happened soon after, no one would have believed him ^f. In the mean time, Tiberius, to sound the disposition of the senate and people, and discover the partizans of Sejanus, wrote frequent letters, acquainting the fathers at one time, that he was greatly indisposed; at another, that he was perfectly recovered, and designed in a short time to return to Rome: in some of his letters he blamed, in others he commended Sejanus. This conduct surprised the minister and his friends, who insensibly began to abandon him, seeing his authority ^g with the prince somewhat diminished. The senate, however, conferred on him the proconsular power on his resigning the consulship; which he did, according to some, on the eighth, according to others, on the fifteenth, of May, to Sextidius Catullinus. At the same time Tiberius honoured both him and his son with a place amongst the pontiffs; but could not by any intreaties be prevailed upon to give him permission to return to Capreæ. The pretence Sejanus alledged for such a permission was, says Dion Cassius, to visit his future spouse, probably Livilla the widow of Drusus, who was indisposed; but his real design was, to secure the person of the prince, whose guards were all at his devotion. Tiberius, to keep both him and the senate in suspense, returned no other answer to his earnest and repeated intreaties, than that he ^h designed to come himself very soon to Rome.

 In the mean time, he began to heap honours on Caius, surnamed Caligula, the only surviving son of Germanicus and Agrippina. He had accompanied his grandfather to Capreæ, and artfully concealed under a deceitful appearance of modesty his savage and inhuman temper. He had so well learnt to hide his heart, that when his mother and both his brothers were condemned, not a word, not a groan, escaped him, though all arts were used to draw words and resentment from him. Young as he was, he smothered with the deepest dissimulation all symptoms of tenderness and sorrow. He was so observant of Tiberius, that he made it his whole business to study the bent of his temper, and to second it in all things. He imitated his looks, affected his words and manner of expression, and conformed even to the change and fashion ⁱ of Both he and Sejanus resigned the fasces, before the consular year expired, the one to Faustus Cornelius Sylla, the other to Sextidius Catullinus (51). L. Fulcinus Trio and *L. a of his drefs. Hence the obfervation of the orator Passienus, that never lived a better slave, nor a worfe mafter. Tiberius made him this year augur, in the room of his brother Drufus, and raifed him, before he had entered upon that office, to the dignity of pontiff of Augustus, beftowing upon him the higheft encomiums, as if he defigned to appoint him his heir and fucceffor. This awaked the rage and jealousy of Sejanus, who now could not forgive himfelf his paffed indolence. In the tranfports of his paffion he condemned himfelf for not having taken arms, and openly revolted, when he was vefted with the confular authority: he reflected with the utmoft anguifh on the many favourable opportunities he had neglected, to fecure the perfon of the prince, and feize the empire; but the great joy the people testified at the preferments of Caius, deterred him at prefent from any attempts of that nature. At the fame time, he

 b had the mortification to fee fome of his friends turned out of their employments, and his enemies placed in their room. But nothing mortified him fo much as a letter from Tiberius to the fenate concerning the death of Nero; wherein he named Sejanus, without the ufual encomiums and commendations which he beftowed on him in all his letters. Neither did he doubt, but the emperor had him chiefly in view, when he wrote to the fenate, defiring them to renew and put in execution the decree, forbidding divine worfhip to be paid to any mortal man; for vows were every-where made, and victims flain, before the ftatues of Sejanus; nay, he was arrived at fuch a height of arrogance, that he joined his adorers, and, with an impudence hardly to c be matched, offered facrifices to himfelf. After fo many tokens of coolnefs in the emperor towards his favourite minifter, many, who had profefled an inviolable friendship for him, began to withdraw through fear of being involved in the calamities, which they apprehended would foon overtake them, if they did not, by abandoning him, in time confult their own fafety. The crouds, which daily frequented his houfe, infenfibly diminished: few perfons, and thofe not of the firft quality, attended him abroad; no farther mention was made of him in the fenate &c. This encouraged Tiberius, who had hitherto doubted of the difpofition of the fenate and d people, to come to a final refolution; which was to fecure himfelf, without further delay, againft the dangers that threatened him, by the utter deftruction of Sejanus and his friends. However, to proceed in fo nice an affair with all poffible caution, and to prevent Sejanus from putting himfelf upon his defence, or taking any desperate

 e meafures, he gave out, that he defigned to inveft him with the tribunitial power. But, in the mean time, he privately gave the command of the prætorian guards to Nervius Sertorius Macro, one in whom he knew he could confide; and difpatched him to Rome with a letter to the fenate, after having communicated to him the contents of it, and carefully inftituted him how to behave, with refpect both to Sejanus and the fenate.

Macro entered Rome late in the night, and immediately imparted his orders to the f confal P. Memmius Regulus, who had been fubftituted to L. Pomponius Secundus; for the other confal, L. Fulcinius Trio, was a friend to Sejanus. Regulus early next morning fummoned the fenate to afsemble in the palace, whither Sejanus conveyed himfelf, attended, according to his cuftom, by a detachment of the prætorian guards. As he was entering the palace, he was greatly furprized to fee Macro, the more, becaufe he had brought no letters for him from the emperor; but Macro accofting him, whifpered him in the ear, that he had brought letters to the fenate, wherein the emperor befought them to confer upon him the tribunitial power. Sejanus, overjoyed at this news, entered the palace, and there took his place in the temple of Apollo, where moft of the fathers were already met. In the mean time, Macro, having firft fhewn to the foldiers of the prætorian guard his commiffion from the emperor, appointing him to command them in the room of Sejanus, and affured them, that Tiberius had ordered a very confiderable fum to be diftributed among them, took poffeffion of his new office, by remanding them to their camp without the walls of the city. In their ftead Gracinus Laco, who was privy to the fecret and commanded the vigiles, that is, the troops appointed to watch all night and prevent difturbances, placed a ftrong detachment of his men at the gates of the temple. And now the fathers being afsembled, Macro appeared before them with the emperor's letter in his hand; which he had no fooner prefented to the confals, than he withdrew, haftening to the camp in order to prevent any difturbance that might happen there. In the mean time, Regulus read aloud the emperor's letter, which was very long, and wrote with great craft and address. For, after a long preamble upon other matters, came some complaints against Sejanus, which were immediately interrupted by quite different affairs : then followed other complaints, but without any bitterness of expression ; so that Sejanus hitherto betrayed no great concern. But when at length the emperor's orders were read touching the execution of two of his most intimate friends, who were privy to his ambitious and treacherous designs, he was struck with such terror, that he could not utter a single word in their favour. Before he recovered from the consternation, into which those fatal orders had thrown him, he heard to his great surprise another article relating to himself, wherein the emperor, in an angry style, enjoined the fathers to secure his person. Hereupon the tribunes and prætors, quitting their seats, placed themselves by him, to prevent him from making his escape and raising disturbances^z. Suetonius tells us, that in this letter Tiberius betrayed a meaness of spirit altogether unworthy of a prince, begging, amongst other things, of the senate, that they would send one of the consuls with a convoy of soldiers to conduct to Rome a poor old man forsaken by all. The same author adds, that he was under such apprehensions, that he had given private orders to Macro to set Drusus, in case of any disturbance, at liberty, to present him to the senate and people, and even to declare him emperor. He had several ships ready to put to sea, and convey him to some of his legions, if his affairs at Rome should not take a good turn. He kept himself the whole time upon the top of a high rock, to know by certain signals agreed on what passed in the capital, fearing the messengers might betray him, or not bring him the news with the necessary expedition^a. Seneca tells us, that while the consul was reading the emperor's letter, a huge globe of fire appeared in the air, and soon after vanished^b ; a true symbol of what passed in the senate. For the senators at first, not doubting but the emperor demanded in his letter the tribunitial power for Sejanus, crowded round him, each striving to be the foremost in congratulating him with flattering speeches upon his new dignity. But they no sooner learnt the real contents of the fatal letter, than they all to a man forsook him, not one person in so numerous an assembly daring to utter one word in his favour. Even those who happened to sit by him, abandoning their places, seated themselves elsewhere, fearing they might be looked upon as his friends, if they continued near him. The last article was no sooner read, than the whole temple resounded with curses and most bitter invectives, against the very person, on whom they had a few minutes before bestowed the highest commendations. Some inveighed against him out of the hatred they bore him, and others through fear of being reckoned amongst his friends. Though all the senators declared against him, nevertheless, as he had many friends and relations amongst them, the consul Regulus thought it adviseable not to propose condemning him to death, nor even to gather the suffrages of the whole assembly. He therefore only asked the opinions of some, whom he looked upon as the most impartial and unprejudiced ; and finding they were for committing him to prison, he conducted him thither himself, attended by Gracinus Laco and all the magistrates. A memorable instance of this of the vicissitude of fortune, and the instability of all human grandeur ! How different was Sejanus ruling the universe with an absolute sway, raising to the highest honours, or dooming to death whom he pleased, from himself loaded with chains, and dragged like a common malefactor to the public prison ! Had he succeeded in his attempts, and entailed the Roman empire upon his race, there would not have been wanting flattering poets and historians, who would have echoed his praises, his liberality, his politics, with all the other topics which are urged in commendation of Julius Cæsar and Augustus. But Sejanus failed, and is owned to have been a traitor ; Cæsar's iniquity and that of Augustus were triumphant, and so were their names. Iniquity unprosperous or punished no man praises ; but successful iniquity never wants flatterers. But to return to Sejanus ; he was followed from the palace to the prison by immense crowds, the populace all the way loading him with curses, upbraiding him with the many murders he had committed, and insulting him with bitter sarcasms upon his tribunitial power. His confusion was so great, that, not able to bear it, he threw his robe over his head, in order to cover his face ; but the guards, who attended him, obliged him to shew himself to the multitude, eager to see him humbled, and to insult one who had so long rid upon their necks. At the same time, the populace in a sudden transport overturned and broke in pieces all his statues, those very statues which ^a which a few hours before they had adored. The same day, the senate assembled the second time in the temple of Concord, near the prison, when the fathers, finding all quiet in the city, by the care and vigilance of Macro, Gracinus, and the consul Regulus, pronounced, without hesitation, no one daring to speak in favour of the criminal, sentence of death against Ælius Sejanus, accused and found guilty of high treason. ^{Condemned and executed.} The sentence was put in execution the same day, that is, the seventeenth of October, notwithstanding the late law, indulging ten days respite to every criminal after condemnation. His body was exposed, like those of other malefactors, on the scalæ Gemoniæ, and afterwards abandoned to the rage of the populace, who dragged it for three days together through the streets of Rome, and mangled it to such a degree ^b that the executioner could scarce find a limb intire to throw, according to custom, into the Tiber^d. (P).

THE death of Sejanus was followed by a general slaughter of all his friends and relations. Tiberius, after having for a course of years destroyed every man who was ^{The general slaughter of Sejanus's friends.} obnoxious to this execrable favourite of his, destroyed every man who had been well with his favourite. He spared none who were accused of any intelligence with Sejanus, and any thing upon earth, the most fortuitous, the most slight or foolish, served for proof of such intelligence. All the streets of Rome were covered with single carcases, or filled with carcases in piles; persons of all ranks, without distinction of sex or age, were promiscuously butchered, and their bodies cast into the public streets; neither ^c their acquaintance nor kindred were allowed to approach them, or bewail them, nor even at last to behold them: spies were placed every-where to watch countenances and the signs of sorrow; and when they putrified, and became noisome, and were thrown into the Tiber, whether they floated in the stream, or were cast upon the banks, no one ventured to touch them, no one dared to bury or burn them. Among the many who perished on this occasion, Junius Blæsus, uncle to Sejanus, of whom we have often ^{Junius Blæsus put to death.} spoken above, seems not to have escaped the common slaughter, being loaded with many odious imputations^e. Publius Vitellius being charged with offering the public ^{Publius Vitellius arraigned;} treasure, which was committed to his care, towards compassing a revolution, was nevertheless only delivered into the hands of his brother Lucius, father to Aulus Vitellius, who was afterwards emperor. Publius being soon weary of his confinement, and ^d finding his trial put off from day to day, called for a penknife under pretence of writing, and pricked his veins with it, but timorously and without effect. However, he died, before his trial, of grief, and by his death saved both his estate and the reputation of his family^f. He left, it seems, some writings behind him; for we find him quoted by Tertullian^g. Pomponius Secundus, who had a little before resigned the fasces to P. Memmius Regulus, was likewise accused of treason, because Ælius Gallus, ^{And Pomponius Secundus} who was a friend to Sejanus, had, after the execution of that traitor, fled to the gardens of Pomponius, as to a place of safety. However, he was not committed to the public prison, but consigned to the custody of his brother Quintus Pomponius, who generously became his surety. As Pomponius was a man of a gay temper, he bore his ^e disgrace with great constancy and resolution; so that he outlived Tiberius, and was set at liberty by his successor Caius. This is the same Pomponius, according to Vossius^h, whose victories over the Catti we shall see in the following reign honoured with a triumph. If Pomponius was kept confined so long as Tiberius lived after the death of Sejanus, that is, seven years, only for some signs, not shewn by him neither, of friendship between him and a friend of Sejanus, we may judge from thence with how much severity his relations were treated, and his avowed partizans, who had been privy to his ambitious designs^h.

AND now the chief friends and favourites of Sejanus, who could give any umbrage, being all to a man massacred, the senate ordered the two remaining children of the wicked minister to be executed, in order to cut off the whole family root and branch. ^{The execution of Sejanus's children.} Sejanus had three children, of whom the eldest son was already put to death, as Tacitus seems to insinuate; but we are quite in the dark as to the circumstances of his execution, tion, by reason of the lamentable chasm in Tacitus's annals, which has robbed us of the detail of many remarkable incidents. There still remained of that unhappy and generally abhorred family a son and a daughter, who were by a decree of the senate both sentenced to death, notwithstanding the tenderness of their age, and carried to prison; the boy, sensible of his impending death; but the girl so ignorant of it, that she often asked whither they dragged her, and for what fault? adding, that if she had done any thing amiss, they might take the rod and whip her, and that she would do so no more. But the senate had no regard either to her age or innocence; she was by the common executioner strangled in prison with her brother, and the tender bodies of both first exposed on the scalæ Gemoniæ, and thence dragged with an iron hook through the city, and thrown into the Tiber. We are told by some writers of that time, that as it was a thing unheard-of to punish a virgin with death, the executioner deflowered her just before he tied the rope (Q)ⁱ.

Tiberius more

death.

EVERY one hoped, that, after the execution of Sejanus and his accomplices, the reign of Tiberius would prove more mild, since to that powerful and cruel favourite they chiefly imputed the many executions, which had occasioned such a dreadful havock of their best citizens. But, when they expected some alleviation of their evils, they found themselves involved in greater calamities than ever, the emperor waxing daily more cruel, and from this time commencing, as it were, an open enemy to his people, and delivering himself up to cruelty without restraint, and to every abomination, even to rapaciousness and plunder, a vice to which he hitherto seemed to have no bias. No person, however virtuous and cautious, could be safe; for it was not enough for them to be upon their guard against the snares of the accusers, and the false reports of informers; but they were liable to be sacrificed to the jealousy and conjectures of the emperor, when they thought themselves secure by the innocence, not only of their actions, but even of their thoughts. He was under perpetual apprehensions of the great lords of the senate, and making daily victims of them: their wealth and race, nay, their poverty, names, and quality, gave him umbrage: he was almost equally jealous of friends and enemies. Those who advised him in council, those who diverted him at his leisure hours, fell all at length victims to his furious and distrustful temper. He was so afraid of considerable men, and so unwilling to give them employments that made them so, that some, who were appointed governors of provinces, were never allowed to go thither; insomuch, that great provinces for a course of years were left destitute of their governors, and abandoned to the mercy of barbarous nations, Tiberius chusing rather to suffer the insults and invasion of the enemy, than trust any one with the power of avenging the state and repulsing the public foe. This year Apicata, whom Sejanus had divorced, as we have related above, in hopes of marrying Livia or Livilla the widow of Drusus, seeing the bodies of her children publicly exposed among those of the other criminals, wrote a letter to Tiberius, acquainting him with the manner of his son Drusus's death, with no other view but to torment him, and then laid violent hands on herself. Tiberius, who had ascribed his son's death to his own intemperance and irregular life, was so transported with rage, when he understood he had been poisoned by a conspiracy of Livilla and Sejanus, that he resolved to exterminate all those who had ever shewn the least token of friendship to either^k, Suetonius tells us, that he applied himself to the examination of that affair so seriously, that word being brought him, while he was receiving the depositions of some witnesses, that an inhabitant of Rhodes was arrived, at whose house he had lodged, and whom he had invited by many kind letters, he immediately ordered him to be put to the rack, having at that time nothing in his thoughts, but blood, torments, and revenge. The same writer adds, that afterwards, when he came to himself, and was sensible of his mistake, he commanded the innocent Rhodian to be privately

(Q) The word virgo, in the law forbidding a virgin to be put to death, signified a girl, or a young woman under such an age, whether she was a virgin or no; but the grave senators with a chicane worthy only of such mean, crouching slaves, took it in a sense quite different from that of the law, which they pretended to observe, by causing the innocent girl to be deflowered by the executioner before she was put to death. With a like cavil the triumvirs, as we read in Dion Cassius, that they might not seem to transgress the law forbidding children to be put to death, caused one, whom they had condemned, to put on the manly robe before he was executed (53).

privately murdered, lest he should divulge the injury he had received¹. Such as he condemned in the island of Capreae were from a rock thrown headlong into the sea, where numbers of seamen were disposed beforehand with their oars and long poles to dispatch them. He suffered none to be executed, till they had undergone the most exquisite torments cruelty itself could invent : for he looked upon death as so slight a punishment, that when he heard one of his prisoners, named Carnulius, had laid violent hands on himself, he cried out, Carnulius has escaped me. One of his prisoners begging him to hasten his execution, No, answered Tiberius, You and I are not yet so good friends^m. But notwithstanding the severity with which he punished others, Dion Cassius tells us, that he was inclined to pardon Livilla his daughter-in-law, in regard of her mother Antonia ; but that Antonia herself opposed such an unseasonable instance of mercy ; so that Livilla was this year by Tiberius's orders starved to deathⁿ.

Livilla put to death.

THE following year, Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus and Furius Camillus Scribonianus being consuls (R), furious orders were passed against the statues and memory of Livilla, and likewise a decree of the senate, commanding the effects of Sejanus to be taken out of the public treasury, and placed in that of the emperor. This was the motion of Scipio, Silanus, and Cassius, the principal men in the senate, who all urged it almost in the same words, and with great zeal and eagerness. Tagonius Gallus moved, that Tiberius should chuse twenty senators to wait upon him under arms, and defend his person as often as he entered the senate. The emperor, who was too wise to allow the senators arms, returned them thanks for such an instance of affection ; but rejected, and even turned into ridicule, the motion, as well as the author of it, adding in his letter, that he did not think his life of such importance to have it thus protracted. Junius Gallio moved, that the prætorian soldiers, after their term of service, should have the privilege of sitting in the theatre among the Roman knights. This proposal was highly resented by Tiberius, who in his letter to the senate fell upon Gallio with great warmth, demanding, as if he had been present, what business had Gallio with the soldiers, whose duty it was to observe only the orders of the emperor, and from the emperor alone to receive their rewards ? Gallio indeed meant to flatter, but Tiberius highly resenting that motion, which he said tended to corrupt the military discipline and debauch the minds of the soldiers, he was instantly expelled the senate, and banished Italy. He chose the island of Lesbos for the place of his banishment ; but the senate, thinking his exile would be too easy there, recalled him, and put him under close confinement in the house of a magistrate. Such was the reward of his studied flattery. In the same letter the emperor demanded the death of Sextus Paconianus, who had conspired with Sejanus to compass the ruin of Caligula ; but he escaped for the present by making an ample discovery of the plot, and naming all who were concerned in it. Among these was Latinius Latiaris, of whose detestable character we have spoken above. He was one of the most mischievous informers in Rome, and had procured the destruction of many illustrious citizens ; but now met his just doom, being to the great joy of the whole city condemned and executed. The next accused was Cotta Messalinus, the most forward man in the senate to gratify on all occasions the cruelty of Tiberius, and therefore universally hated. He was charged with having spoken contemptuously of Caligula, Livia Augusta, and of Tiberius himself (S) ; and the charge was

(R) Domitius, the same who married Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus, continued in the consulship the whole year ; Aulus Vitellius, uncle to the emperor of the same name, was his colleague from the first of July to his death ; for Vitellius died in his consulate (54). We find the name of Cneius Domitius Ahenobarbus in an ancient inscription quoted by Gruter, (55), where he is said to have been consul the year after the fifth consulship of Tiberius ; but the name of his colleague is razed both out of this, and out of another made this year at Terni, which inclines us to believe that he was the same Furius Camillus, who afterwards rebelled against the emperor Claudius, as we read in Suetonius (56).

(S) He had traduced Caligula as guilty of the most scandalous debaucheries, as a pathic, as one destitute of all shame and modesty ; in celebrating among the priests the birth-day of Livia, the emperor's mother, he had spoken of her with disrespect without sparing Tiberius himself : in complaining of the great sway which Manius Lepidus and Lucius Arruntius, with whom he had a suit about money, bore in the senate, he had said, They indeed will be supported by the senate, but I by my little Tiberius. These were the crimes alledged against him ; and to any other the charge would have proved fatal ; but as he studied in every thing to gratify the cruel temper of Tiberius, and was the author, as our historian tells us, of every most bloody counsel, the emperor took him under his protection, and shewed that mercy to him, which he would have denied the most worthy man in the senate.

Cotta Messalinus accused and by the favour of Tiberius discharged.

Other persons of distinction arraigned.

The noble defence of Marcus Terentius

was proved by men of the first rank in Rome. But Cotta appealing to Tiberius, a letter was soon after brought from him in behalf of the criminal, wherein, after relating the beginning of his friendship with Cotta, and his many good services to himself, he besought the fathers not to wrest into crimes words perversely construed, and humorous tales told at an entertainment (T). Hereupon the fathers not only discharged Cotta, but inflicted on Cæcilianus the senator, who was the chief evidence against him, the same punishment which had been formerly decreed against the accusers of Lucius Arruntius, one of the most virtuous men in Rome; but what this punishment was, we find no-where recorded. Afterwards, Quintus Servæus and Minutius Thermus were arraigned, Tiberius charging them as principals in the treason of Sejanus, and ordering Gaius Cestius, a senator, to report to the senate what he had written to him. Thus Sestius undertook the accusation; for in those calamitous times the most illustrious chiefs of the senate were not ashamed, as Tacitus observes, to degrade themselves to the mean office of informers, some openly, some secretly, but both without regard to the ties of blood or friendship; no distinction of kinsmen from strangers; for words spoken in the forum, or in private conversation, upon what subject soever spoken, those who uttered them were accused, every one striving to get the start of another, some for their own safety, others as it were infected with the common contagion of informing. Mutius and Servæus were condemned, but saved themselves by becoming evidence against others, namely Julius Africanus and Seius Quadratus. While all men else were affecting to renounce the character of friends to Sejanus, a Roman knight, by name Marcus Terentius, being accused on this very account, owned the charge before the senate in the following speech, which well deserves to be recorded: “It would perhaps be more wise in me, conscript fathers, to deny than to acknowledge the crime with which I am charged. But whatever be the result, I cannot, I will not, deny it. I therefore own, and publicly declare, that I was one of Sejanus’s friends, that I courted and sought his friendship, that I gloried in it, after I had gained it. And what wonder that I did so? I saw Sejanus joined with his father in the command of the prætorian guards, and next governing the state and the soldiery, both as a minister and a general: his kinsmen and friends were raised to the first employments; as every man was in credit with Sejanus, he was favoured by Tiberius; such on the contrary as incurred his displeasure, were persecuted without mercy. Of this I need give no instances. Sejanus therefore the Vulfinian was not the man we courted; but Sejanus ingrafted by alliance into the Claudian and Julian families; Sejanus, your son-in-law, O Cæsar, your colleague in the consulship, your favourite, and under you charged with the administration of the empire. It does not belong to us to judge who he is, whom you think fit to raise above the rest, nor on what considerations you have raised him. To you the gods have left the supreme disposal of all things, and to us the glory of obedience. We only behold the outward appearance of things; we perceive upon whom you bestow wealth and honours, to whom you trust the greatest power of relieving or oppressing us, which no man can deny Sejanus to have had. But to pry into the secret thoughts of the prince, and the designs which he industriously conceals, is both unlawful and dangerous. Let us not, conscript fathers, fix our thoughts on the last day of Sejanus; but remember him for the space of sixteen years, during which time we adored such of his retainers as Satrius and Pomponius, and reckoned it a great honour to be acquainted with his porters and freedmen. I speak here of those only who were guilty of his last designs. Let those be punished who conspired with him against the state, who were privy to his wicked attempts upon the life of the prince; nothing can

(T) The beginning of his letter was very remarkable; for he introduced it with the following words: What to write to you, conscript fathers, or in what manner to write to you at this time, if I know, may all the gods doom me to greater agonies, than those under which I feel myself daily perishing. Such were the horrors that haunted him even among the rocks of Caprea; though hardly accessible to men, yet they could not keep off the avenging furies that pursued him, nor insure his tranquillity. This great prince, this sovereign of Rome, with his numerous armies, with his prætorian bands, and his unlimited power, was in hourly fear of secret assassins, incessantly racked by his own apprehensions; and consequently with all the eclat of empire, the most miserable being in his dominions. His power indeed was unlimited; but so was his misery: the more he made others suffer, the faster he multiplied his own torments. All the pleasures and debaucheries in which he wallowed without controul, had not sufficient charms to allay or mitigate his dreadful apprehensions, and the anguish under which he felt himself daily perishing. Private persons, however obnoxious and threatened, had but some things and some persons to fear; whereas Tiberius dreaded all men, and every thing but to do evil, which yet was the sole cause of his fears. Such was his situation and life, and such are the natural consequences of the abuse of power.

a "can be more just. But as for us, who are charged only with offices of friendship "and instances of benevolence towards Sejanus, you cannot condemn us, O Cæsar, "without condemning at the same time yourself." The liberty of this speech, and the joy that one was at last found, who had courage enough to speak aloud what they all thought in their hearts, had such a powerful effect upon the minds of the fathers, that Terentius was absolved, and his accusers for this and other crimes condemned, some Who is ab-

 the senate on this occasion, probably not daring to oppose a truth spoken with such liberty, and so generally applauded. But what induced him to dissemble an affront offered him at this time by L. Sejanus the prætor, probably one of the disgraced b minister's kinsmen, 'tis no easy matter to guess. For the prætor in the shews, which he exhibited in virtue of his office, employed such only as were bald, and disposed five thousand boys all shaved with torches in their hands to light the spectators home.
 No-body doubted, but this was done to deride Tiberius, who was bald; but nevertheless, he took no more notice of it, than if he had never known it^p.

NEXT came letters from Tiberius against Sextus Vestilius, formerly prætor, one whom Tiberius had long since admitted into the number of his friends in regard of his brother Drusus, to whom Vestilius was exceeding dear. He was accused of having composed a satyr against Caligula, reproaching him with the lewdness of his life. Tiberius forbad him his table, which so grieved him, that he resolved to lay violent Tiberius sa- hands on himself. Accordingly, having, with a trembling and feeble hand, as he crifies his
 c was very old, opened his veins, he bound them up, and wrote a letter to the prince, imploring his mercy; but Tiberius returning him an angry answer, he opened them again, and died. Not even women escaped the fury of accusers: as they could not be charged with designs of usurping the sovereign power, their tears were made treasonable; and Vitia, the mother of C. Fusius Geminus consul three years before, was condemned and executed in her old age, for bewailing the death of her son condemned by the senate. Neither did Tiberius spare his own friends; for by him were this year doomed to die Vesularius Flaccus and Julius Marinus, two of his oldest friends, who had followed him to Rhodes, and not forsaken him at Capreæ. The former d had acted a chief part in the trial and condemnation of Libo Drusus, and the latter had been employed by Sejanus to procure the ruin of Curtius Atticus, of whom we have spoken above. This year died Lucius Piso, who being substituted to Taurus Lucius Piso Statilius in the government of Rome, discharged that important office with such cre- dies.
 dit, that by a decree of the senate he was distinguished with a public funeral. He had obtained for his warlike exploits in Thrace a triumph, was universally esteemed and beloved, and nevertheless died in the eightieth year of his age by the course of nature, a rare thing, as our historian observes, in a man of great parts and of such an illustrious descent (U)^q. A motion was afterwards made in the senate by Quintilianus, e tribune of the people, concerning a book of the sibyl, which Caninius Gallus, one of the college of fifteen, had begged might be received by a decree amongst the rest of that prophetess. The decree passed without opposition; but Tiberius in a letter to the senate desired, that the book might first be examined by the quincevirs (W).

(U) We read in Tacitus, that Piso governed Rome twenty years: if so, he must have been raised to that dignity by Augustus; for he died in the eighteenth year of Tiberius's reign. But, on the other hand, both Pliny (57) and Suetonius (58) tell us in express terms, that he was created governor of Rome by Tiberius, for having continued drinking with him a night and two days, or two days and two nights, as Pliny will have it, after he was emperor. We therefore conclude with Lipsius, that some mistake has crept into the text of Tacitus. That writer thinks, that we ought to read ten instead of twenty, because Pomponius Flaccus, who was with Piso at that famous debauch, was on that score raised to the government of Syria, which at the time of Piso's death he had held ten years (59).

(W) In his letter he gently chid Quintilianus as young, and therefore not well acquainted with the ancient customs; but fell upon Gallus with some bitterness, for proposing to a thin senate the receiving of a book, whereof the author was unknown, among the prophetic books of the sibyl: he told him, that he, who was so well skilled in the science of sacred ceremonies, ought not to have taken such a step without hearing the opinion of his own college, and without the usual reading and deliberation with the other priests. He also put the senators in mind of the conduct of Augustus, who, to suppress the many fictitious predictions, every-where published under the name of the sibyl, had ordered, that within a fixed day they should be carried to the prætor, and declared it unlawful for any private person to keep them. Upon the receipt of this letter, the senate, notwithstanding their decree, ordered the book

THIS year the dearth of corn occasioned some disturbances in the city, the people urging their wants in the theatre with great freedom, or rather licentiousness. Tiberius, alarmed at their boldness, censured in his letter to the senate both them and the magistrates, for not quelling by their authority the mutinous populace. This encouraged the fathers to pass a severe edict against rioters and such as disturbed the public tranquillity, which restored peace and quiet to the city. In the end of the year, Geminus, Pompeius, and Julius Celsus, all Roman knights, were arraigned of treason and condemned. Geminus was indeed one of Sejanus's friends, but had never been trusted by him with his private designs. However, he was executed with Pompeius; but Celsus, by stretching his chain over his head, and straining with great violence against it, broke his neck, and escaped the infamy of a public execution^r. This year Tiberius, having crossed the channel between Capreae and Surrentum, sailed along the coast of Campania, and entering the Tiber, as if he designed to proceed to Rome, came as far as the gardens on that river, having first posted guards all along the banks to keep off the multitude. But he advanced no farther, being ashamed of his cruelties and abominable lusts, and impatient to return to his gloomy rocks, and beloved solitude, where he rioted without check or controul in the most infamous and unnatural debaucheries^s.

THE next consuls were Servius Sulpicius Galba (X) and L. Cornelius Sylla Felix. This year Tiberius disposed of his two grand-daughters, who were now of age, bestowing Drusilla on Lucius Cassius, and Julia on Marcus Vinicius, as we have related above. On this occasion he wrote to the senate with a short commendation of the young men; then touching upon the causes of his absence, and the hatred and ill-will he had drawn upon himself by his zeal for the republic, he desired, that Macro, commander of the prætorian guards, with some few tribunes and centurions, might always attend him into the senate. The fathers readily granted him his request, without any limitation either to the number or condition of the guards who were to accompany him^t: nay, they passed a decree, ordering, that whenever the prince came to the senate, all the senators should be searched to prevent their carrying arms under their robes^u. But for all this, Tiberius never appeared in the senate, nor entered the walls of Rome, though he came sometimes to the very gates, for the most part by solitary and by-ways, and flying back with great precipitation. This year great disturbances being raised by the debtors, the emperor, to administer some relief, declared, that he would lend a hundred thousand great sesterces for the term of three years without interest, provided each borrower mortgaged in land double the value of what he borrowed. But this generosity did not in the least allay the public hatred which the emperor drew upon himself with his cruelties, many illustrious persons being this year condemned and executed, and many others banished upon the most groundless suspicions. Among these, Considius Proculus, while, void of all apprehension, he was celebrating his birth-day, was suddenly accused of treason, hurried to the senate, condemned, and executed. Pompeia Macrina was sentenced to exile; her husband and his father, two men of great distinction among the Greeks, were both executed; but her father, an illustrious Roman knight, and her brother, once prætor, prevented their execution by a voluntary death. The crime laid to their charge was, that Macrina's husband being descended from Theophanes, who had been one of the confidants of Pompey the Great, they had all paid divine honours to that illustrious book to be examined by the college of the quindcemvirs. Whether the book was admitted amongst the authentic prophecies of the sibyl, we are nowhere told. Augustus, as we have observed in his reign, having gathered together a great number of prophecies and books of predictions written by unknown authors, whether in Greek or Latin, he caused them all to be burnt, to the number of two thousand and upwards, reserving only some select pieces, which he deposited under the pedestal of Apollo Palatinus (60).

(X) Servius Sulpicius Galba was afterwards raised to the empire: Suetonius observes, that he succeeded in the consulship Cn. Domitius the father of Nero, and was succeeded by Salvius Otho, the father of the emperor of the same name. As the name of Otho is not marked in the consular tables, Onuphrius, Cassiodorus, and the learned cardinal Noris conclude, that he was substituted to Galba. Lucius Vitellius, one of the following year's consul's, was father to Aulus Vitellius, who was likewise emperor, and succeeded Otho. Tacitus tells us, that Tiberius having sent for Galba, during his consulship, and sifted him upon several subjects, he at last told him in Greek, that one day he should taste of empire, signifying thereby his short sovereignty (61).

illustrious Greek. The death of Sextus Marius, the most wealthy man in Spain, reflected great disgrace upon Tiberius; for though he was accused of incest with his daughter, and for that crime, as was pretended, thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock, yet it was commonly believed, that his immense riches had occasioned his ruin; and indeed not without good grounds; Tiberius having, after his condemnation, appropriated to himself his mines of gold, though forfeited to the public. So many bloody executions, instead of satiating, served only to whet and inflame, Tiberius's cruelty. For this year he commanded all those to be put to death without distinction of sex or age, who were kept in prison under accusation of any attachment to Sejanus^w. A general massacre of Sejanus's friends. Infomuch, that twenty were executed on one day, and among them several women and children; their bodies were exposed on the scalæ Gemoniæ, from thence with iron hooks dragged through the city, and then thrown into the Tiber. The butchery, says Tacitus, was dreadful and general; exposed to the sun lay the carcases of the noble and ignoble; those of every sex and age scattered up and down, or ignominiously thrown together in heaps: their surviving friends were not allowed to approach them, to bewail them, or even behold them; but round the dead, guards were placed to watch countenances, and observe the signs of sorrow: when the bodies began to putrify, they were dragged to the Tiber, where they floated, or were driven upon the banks, no man daring to burn or touch them, the force of fear having cut off all intercourse of humanity, and banished every symptom of pity and tenderness. Among the rest perished this year three of the most illustrious persons of the empire, Asinius Gallus, Drusus the son of Germanicus, and the celebrated Agrippina. Of Asinius Gallus we have spoken above^x (Y). He was the son of the famous Asinius Pollio, one of Augustus's chief favourites, and married Vipsania the daughter of Agrippa, after Tiberius had divorced her to marry Julia: so that his children were brothers to Drusus, whom Tiberius had by Vipsania, nephews to Agrippina, and nearly related to the Cæsars. Tiberius had long hated him on account of his marrying Vipsania, but with his usual dissimulation concealed his hatred till this year, when Gallus being, we know Tiberius's dissimulation. not about what business, dispatched to him by the senate, he received him in a most obliging manner, but at the same time wrote to the senate, requiring his condemnation; so that the very day he was entertained as a familiar friend at the emperor's table in Capreæ, he was condemned as a traitor to Rome, and a prætor was sent to see the sentence put in execution. However, the inhuman tyrant would not allow him to be immediately dispatched; but caused him to be kept under close confinement, no one being suffered to come near him, except such as were charged to watch, lest he should by a voluntary death put an end to his miseries. He perished at length, after three years painful confinement, through famine; but whether of his own accord, or starved by Tiberius's orders, was never known. The pleasure of the emperor being consulted, whether he would suffer him to be buried, he was not ashamed to reckon his allowing the last offices to be paid to him as a particular favour^y. As for Drusus, The death of Drusus. he was condemned by the emperor to be starved; but protracted his life nine days by feeding, for want of other sustenance, on the flocks of his bed. The inhuman monster, not satiated with the death of his grandson, pursued him even beyond the grave with cruel invectives, and in a letter to the senate charged him with many heinous crimes, ordering at the same time the minutes of his words and actions to be read, which had long and daily been registered by persons expressly appointed to observe his looks, to watch all his actions, and note down every word, every complaint he uttered. The recital of this journal filled all who heard it with horror; and indeed, that a grandfather should appoint persons to watch all the actions, should have all the weaknesses or crimes of his grandson registered by secret spies, and thus exposed to the world, seems such a series of treachery and meanness, as would hardly be credited, were it not attested by the most eminent writers of antiquity. Tacitus quotes the letters of Atius the centurion and Didymus the freedman, declaring particularly the names of the slaves set purposely to abuse and provoke Drusus, with the several parts they acted, in order to draw from him complaints against Tiberius. The centurion, to whose custody

(Y) Lipsius takes this Asinius Gallus to be the son of Asinius Pollio, who was surnamed Saloninus, and upon whose birth Virgil composed the famous eclogue Sicelides Musæ, &c. He owns, that no historian gives Asinius the surname of Saloninus, but founds his opinion intirely upon the authority of Servius; which is very surprising in so wary a critic, since Servius tells us in express terms, that Saloninus died soon after he was born; nam ipsum puerum inter ipsa primordia periisse manifestum est, says that commentator.

custody he was committed, being introduced to the senate, repeated in the presence^a of the fathers, as matter of glory, his outrageous language to the young prince, with the words uttered by him under the agonies of hunger. He told them, that Drusus at first pretending to be distracted, vented in the style of a madman dismal imprecations against Tiberius; but afterwards, finding his doom inevitable, he invoked with great deliberation and sedateness the vengeance of the gods, beseeching them, that as Tiberius had slaughtered his daughter-in-law, his nephew, his grandchildren, and filled with slaughters his whole house, so they would in justice to the ancestors of the slain, in justice to their posterity, avenge on this man of blood so many cruel and barbarous murders. The senators, in hearing the centurion, raised a mighty noise, as if they detested those imprecations; but they were struck with amazement in hearing the detail of the barbarities practised by the emperor's orders upon his grandson. The death of the son was followed by that of the mother, which happened on the seventeenth of October. Agrippina had been confined before the disgrace of Sejanus, upon whose execution she hoped Tiberius would use her and her son Drusus with more humanity. But finding him no less implacable than before, she put an end to her miseries by abstaining from all food. Suetonius tells us, that after she had taken a resolution to starve herself, Tiberius caused her mouth to be opened, and nourishment crammed down her throat by force^a. But Tacitus questions whether she abstained voluntarily from all food, or was denied it by Tiberius's orders; and a report was afterwards spread, that death had been her own choice. Be that as it will, her death^c did not put an end to the malice and cruelty of the outrageous tyrant, who charged her with several abominable crimes, especially with adultery, as if she had maintained a criminal correspondence with Asinius Gallus, and upon his death become weary of life. But Agrippina's character and known chastity sufficiently cleared her from all imputations of that nature; for she had sacrificed, as Tacitus observes, to a manly ambition all the passions and vices of her sex. The emperor in his letter to the senate observed, that she died the same day on which Sejanus had been executed two years before, adding, that such a day ought to be particularly distinguished; nay, he boasted of his clemency, since he had not caused her to be strangled, and her body to be exposed on the scalæ Gemoniæ, and thence dragged to the Tiber. For this^d instance of mock-mercy the senate solemnly thanked him, and decreed, that on the seventeenth of October, the day of the death of Agrippina and Sejanus, a yearly offering should be consecrated to Jupiter Capitolinus for ever^b. The death of Agrippina procured that of her declared enemy Plancina, the widow of Cneius Piso. She was guilty of many other crimes, besides that which was laid to her charge of poisoning Germanicus. When her husband fell, she was protected by the solicitations of Livia, and also by the animosity of Agrippina, whom the spiteful Tiberius, could not find in his heart to gratify with the death of a person, whom she abhorred. But as there was now no farther room for favour or hatred, justice prevailed; and Plancina, being accused of crimes long since sufficiently proved, executed with her own hand that vengeance which was rather too late than too severe. Notwithstanding the pleasure Tiberius took in destroying the most illustrious families in Rome, yet he was sensibly affected with the death of Cocceius Nerva, though it was intirely owing to his cruelty. He was one of the most learned civilians in Rome, had been consul twelve years before, had attended Tiberius to Capree, and was in high favour with him, so that he had no reason to be weary of life. But though thus in full prosperity of fortune, in perfect vigor of body, he resolved to die, and accordingly refused all nourishment. Tiberius, having learnt his design, did all that lay in his power to dissuade him from putting it in execution; examined his motives, and descended even to intreaties, declaring, that it would be a great affliction to him, that it would reflect disgrace upon him, and tarnish his reputation, if one of his most intimate friends, his inseparable companion, should thus shew himself weary of life. But notwithstanding the remonstrances and reasoning of Tiberius, Nerva persisted in his purpose, and ended his life by abstinence. Towards the end of this year died three illustrious citizens, Ælius Lamia, Manius Lepidus, and Pomponius Flaccus. Lamia had for several years held the government of Syria, but had never been allowed to visit his province. Upon the death of L. Piso, which happened the preceding year, Tiberius discharged him from the mock-administration of Syria, and appointed him governor of Rome. A public funeral was decreed him by a by the senate c. He was succeeded in his last employment by C. Cossus, who, though a famous drunkard, was never known, as Seneca informs us^d, to disclose a secret; whence Tiberius trusted him with his most private counsels. Lepidus was one of the most worthy men in Rome; we have already given various instances of his wisdom and moderation: as to his abilities, he was in the opinion of Augustus, as we have observed in the beginning of this reign, well qualified for the sovereign power, but not fond of it. Pomponius Flaccus was by Tiberius first raised to the government of Mæsia, where he betrayed and seized Rhescuporis, as we have related above. He was afterwards made proprætor of Syria, either for this piece of treachery, or upon the merit of his famous debauch with L. Piso and Tiberius. This year, Claudia daughter to Marcus Silanus, a senator distinguished by his illustrious birth and great eloquence, b was married to Caius Caligula, the only surviving son of Germanicus. The people were no less pleased with this match, than dissatisfied with that of Julia, the daughter of Drusus and widow of Nero, who debased herself to marry Rubellius Blandus, whose grandfather was a native of Tybur, and only a Roman knight c.

THIS year, the thirty-third of the common æra and nineteenth of Tiberius's reign, Christ cruci- our Saviour was crucified, according to the opinion of the best chronologers; Phlegon, sed. the emperor Adrian's freedman, who wrote sixteen books of the olympiads, seems to speak of the darkness which happened at his death: his words are; There hap- pened the greatest and most remarkable eclipse that ever had been known; at the sixth hour the day was suddenly turned into night, insomuch, that the stars were seen: at the same time, an earthquake in Bithynia overturned many houses in the city of Nice. This darkness, which Phlegon calls an eclipse, happened, according to him, in the fourth year of the two hundred and second olympiad, which ended about the middle of the present year f.

THE following year, when Paulus Fabius Persicus, or, as some call him, Priscus, and L. Vitellius were consuls, many eminent persons fell, either by their own hands, or those of the public executioner, among the rest Pomponius Labeo and Marcus Æmi- lius Scaurus; the former, once governor of Mæsia, being charged with male-admi- nistration, and other crimes, prevented condemnation by opening his veins, his wife d Paxea following his example. The latter, a noble orator, a man of an illustrious descent, but a professed debauchee, was accused by Servilius and Cornelius of adultery with Livia the widow of Drusus, and of offering magical sacrifices; but his true crime was the hatred Macro bore him; for Macro, who was at this time as much in favour with Tiberius, and no less mischievous than Sejanus had ever been, prejudiced the emperor against him, by persuading him, that Scaurus, in a tragedy which he had com- posed, described him, and displayed his cruelties under the name of Atreus. But the pretended criminal, before sentence was awarded against him, laid violent hands on himself, being encouraged thereto by his wife, who died with him e. Servilius and Cornelius, his accusers, were soon after banished into several islands for accept- ing a bribe to drop the prosecution, which they had begun against Varius Ligur. Abu- e dius Rufus likewise, once ædile, was himself condemned and driven out of Rome, while he attempted to get Lentulus Getulicus, under whom he had commanded a legion, condemned, because he had espoused his daughter to a son of Sejanus. Getulicus was at this time commander of the legions in Upper Germany, and by them extremely beloved on account of his great mildness and clemency. He was likewise acceptable to the legions of Lower Germany in consideration of their general Apronius, his father-in-law. Hence he was generally believed to have written to Tiberius, that not by his own inclination, but by his advice, he had sought the alliance of Sejanus; that he had been as liable to be deceived as Tiberius, and that it was not reasonable a fault common to both should pass unblamed in one, and be punished in another: he added, that he had hitherto inviolably maintained the allegiance he owed him, and that he would continue unshaken in his fidelity to the last, provided no dark plots were framed against him; but that he would look upon a successor as the messenger of death; and therefore, that they should, as it were, strike up an agreement between them, by which the prince should enjoy the rest of the empire, and he always retain his pro- vince. This proceeding, however surprizing, was believed, because of all those who were allied to Sejanus, Getulicus alone escaped unhurt, and continued in high favour to the last. authority was supported more by reputation than by force, did not care to attack a man, who had both sufficient power and courage to defend himself^f. This year, as Dion Cassius will have it, or four years before, while Drusus was yet living, as Tacitus relates it, a young man gave out, that he was Drusus the son of Germanicus. He was first seen in the Cyclades, and soon after on the continent, attended by some of the emperor's freedmen, and by great crouds of people, who flocked to him from all parts. But in the mean time, Poppæus Sabinus, governor of Greece and also of Macedon, where he was at that time, hearing the story, hastened to Nicopolis, a Roman colony, to obviate the evil consequences of such a report. There he learnt, that this counterfeit Drusus, being artfully examined, had declared himself to be the son of Marcus Silanus, and that many of his followers falling off, he had imbarqued, as if he designed to sail to Italy. Further than this, says Tacitus, we have found nothing concerning the origin or issue of that affair^g. But Dion Cassius adds, that the impostor being received by many cities, and strengthened with vast numbers of followers, would have reached Syria, and probably been acknowledged there by the armies of his pretended father, had he not been discovered by some who knew, seized, and sent him to Tiberius^h. The same writer tells us, that this year, the twentieth of Tiberius's reign, ending on the nineteenth of August, the consuls solemnized it with public vows and sacrifices; which the emperor highly resenting, as if they had taken upon them to confirm to him the sovereign power for a further term of ten years, caused them both to be arraigned, condemned, and executedⁱ. What Dion says of the consuls of this year is not to be understood of those we have named, but of others, who were substituted in their room, it being evident both from Tacitus and Suetonius, that L. Vitellius, the father of the emperor Aulus Vitellius, was sent the year following into Syria to govern that province. We shall have frequent occasion to mention him in the following reign (Z).

In the following consulship of Cestius Gallus and M. Servilius Nonianus, the domestic evils continued, Tiberius, though now three years since the execution of Sejanus, being no ways appeased, either by time or the innumerable victims he had already sacrificed to his jealousy. He still pursued with fresh rage stale and dubious imputations, punishing them as recent, heinous, and proved crimes. The most distinguished persons, who perished this year, were Fulcinus Trio, Granius Martianus, Tatius Gratianus, Trebellienus Rufus, and Sextius Paconianus. Trio, who was consul the year Sejanus was executed, being accused of having been privy to the treacherous designs of that minister, made his last will, in which he compiled a long charge of iniquities and dreadful invectives against Macro and the emperor's chief freedmen, not sparing the prince himself, whom he styled an old dotard, and, on account of his long absence, a despicable exile. These invectives were suppressed by the heirs of Trio; but Tiberius, not ashamed to publish his own infamy, ordered them to be read in the senate, either to shew that he could bear such liberties, or because he was willing, since he had been so long ignorant of the black enormities of Sejanus, that whatever was said, and however said, concerning him and his administration, should be divulged, that (Z.) Tacitus tells us, that in the consulship of Fabius and Vitellius, after many ages the phoenix appeared in Egypt, and furnished the learned, both of that country and of Greece, with matter for various observations concerning that miraculous bird. On this occasion he acquaints us with the opinions of such as have written on that subject, and tells, that they all agree in this, viz. that it is a creature sacred to the sun, and that as to its beak and feathers it differs from all other birds; but as to the length of its life relations vary: the common opinion is, says our historian, that it lives five hundred years; but there are not wanting some who extend its life to 1461, and affirm, that the three former phoenixes appeared in reigns greatly distant, the first under Sesofstris, the next under Amasis, and that the last was seen under Ptolemy, the third king of the Macedonian race, and flew to the city of Heliopolis, accompanied by a vast number of other birds wondering at her strange shape. But the accounts of antiquity, says Tacitus, are obscure: between Ptolemy and Tiberius, scarce passed two hundred and fifty years; whence some thought that this was no true phoenix, nor come from Arabia, and that it had nothing of the instinct which ancient tradition ascribes to the genuine; according to which tradition the true phoenix, having completed a certain course of years, builds just before its death a nest in its native land, upon which it sheds a generative power, whence springs up a young one, whose first care, when grown up, is to bury its father: this it does not undertake unadvisedly; but first tries its strength by gathering and carrying a great way loads of myrrh: when it finds itself equal to the burden, and fit for a long flight, it takes upon its back its father's body, carries it to the altar of the sun, and there burns it (62). Such were the opinions of the ancients, touching this miraculous, or rather fabulous, bird.

he might at least learn from the reproaches uttered against him, the truths which flattery studied to disguise. Granius Martianus, the senator, being charged with treason by Caius Gracchus, laid violent hands on himself (A). Tatius Gratianus, who had been prætor, was for the same charge sentenced to death; and also Trebellienus Rufus, who had been likewise prætor, and formerly appointed by the senate guardian to the sons of Cotys, king of Thrace; but he prevented condemnation by a voluntary death. Paconianus, who had been chosen by Sejanus to plot the overthrow of Caligula, as we have related above, was after three years confinement strangled in prison for verses made there against Tiberius^k. In the end of the year, died Poppæus Sabinus, who had been consul under Augustus, had acquired triumphal honours, and governed for the space of twenty-four years the two Mæstias, to which Tiberius had added in the second year of his reign Macedon and Achaia^l. Tacitus tells us, that he was not distinguished either by his birth or abilities; but was nevertheless raised and favoured by the princes, because he had talents equal to the employments given him, and not above them^m. He was succeeded in the government of the above-mentioned provinces by *C. Memmius Regulus*ⁿ. As for the disturbances which happened this year in Armenia, Parthia, and Cilicia, the reader will find them described by us at length in the histories of those kingdoms.

THE following year, Q. Plautius and Sextus Papinius Allenius being consuls, the same course of slaughter continued unrelenting. Lucius Aruseius and several others were condemned and executed. Such executions were now become so frequent and familiar, that they were hardly taken notice of; but that of Vibulenus Agrippa, a Roman knight, struck all with terror and amazement. After his accusers had finished their pleadings against him, he pulled out poison, which he had concealed under his gown, and swallowed it in open senate. He immediately fell, so potent was the poison; but nevertheless was hastily dragged by the lictors to the dungeon, where, though ready to expire, he was strangled by the common executioner^o. Caius Galba, a consular and brother to the emperor of this name, with the two Blæsi, fell by their own hands; Galba, upon the receipt of a letter from the emperor, forbidding him to cast lots for the government of a province; and the Blæsi, because Tiberius bestowed their priesthoods, as vacant dignities, upon others; this they took as a signal of death, and obeyed it. Tigranes, grandson to Herod king of Judæa by his father Alexander, and to Archelaus king of Cappadocia by his mother Glaphyra^p, and who had himself reigned some time in Armenia, was accused like a private citizen, and, without any regard to the royal dignity, condemned and executed with the other pretended criminals^q. This prince and his elder brother Alexander had renounced the Jewish, and embraced the Pagan, religion out of complaisance to their grandfather Archelaus. Agrippa their cousin german was in the month of September dragged to prison loaded with chains, and kept there under close confinement till the death of Tiberius, as we have related in the history of the Jews. The same year, the city suffered greatly by an inundation of the Tiber^r, and by fire, which burnt down that part of the circus which was contiguous to mount Aventine, and all the buildings on the mount itself. This misfortune turned to the glory of the prince, for he paid the value of the houses destroyed, and expended in this bounty a hundred thousand great sesterces; which proved the more acceptable to the people, says Tacitus, as he had ever been sparing in private buildings (B). To make an estimate of every man's loss, he appointed

(A) No wonder, that voluntary deaths should be so common at Rome, not yet illuminated with the light of the gospel. For those, who fell by the hand of the executioner, forfeited their estates with their lives, and were debarred the honour of burial. Their bodies were publicly exposed to the insults of the populace, dragged through the streets with iron hooks, and thrown into the Tiber. No criminal, of what rank soever, nay not even women, were exempted from this base treatment. On the other hand, the bodies of such, as by a voluntary death prevented condemnation, were interred; their wills

(B) Tacitus tells us, that this bounty proved the more grateful to the people, as he was ever sparing in private buildings; and adds, that his public works never exceeded two, viz. the temple of Augustus, and the scene of Pompey's theatre: nor, when he had finished both, did he consecrate either, whether prevented by old age, or despising popularity, is uncertain. Thus Tacitus (64), with whom Suetonius does not intirely agree. During the whole time he was emperor, says that writer, he built nothing that pointed his four sons-in-law, Cneius Domitius, Cassius Longinus, Marcus Vinicius, and Rubellius Blandus, assisted by Publius Petronius, nominated by the consuls^r. The ecclesiastic writers tell us, that in this or the preceding year, Pontius Pilate wrote to Tiberius on account of the passion, resurrection, and miracles of our Saviour, adding, that the number of his followers daily increased, and that he was accounted a God. Hereupon the emperor, say they, made a report of the whole matter to the senate, with this favourable suffrage, that Christ might be reckoned among the gods: the senate opposed this motion, and even by an edict commanded all christians to be banished the city. But Tiberius by another edict threatening their accusers with death, the persecution ceased, and the number of the believers daily increased both in Judea and at Rome^s. Whether this account is consistent with the servile spirit of the senate, and the dread they were all under of opposing any motion made by the emperor, is what we refer to the judgment of every impartial reader.

THE next consuls, and the last under Tiberius, were Cneius Acerronius Proculus and Caius Pontius Nigrinus, or, as Suetonius calls him, Niger. The emperor was now in the seventy-eighth year of his age, without having been ever once indisposed since he came to the empire, though he neglected, and was even wont to ridicule, the rules and prescriptions of physicians, and such as after the age of thirty wanted to be informed by them, what helped or hurt their constitutions. At length he was taken ill at Astura between Antium and Circei, as he was returning to Capreae from the neighbourhood of Rome (C). However, he went forward, and reached Circei, where, to dissemble his indisposition, he not only assisted at the military games exhibited there, but threw darts himself at a boar, and killed him. From Circei he advanced to Misenum, and finding his strength began to fail him, he settled in a villa near the promontory, which once belonged to the celebrated Lucullus. Already his strength, already his spirits failed him; but his dissimulation failed him not. To hide his declension now very visible, he exerted the same vigor of mind, the same energy in his discourse, and even affected sometimes to be gay. In the mean time, the course of executions was not interrupted at Rome by the emperor's illness. Acutia, once the wife of Publius Vitellius, being charged with treason by Lælius Balbus, was condemned. Afterwards Albucilla, who had been married to Satrius Secundus, and was infamous for her amours and debaucheries, was accused of devising charms against the life of Tiberius. In the same charge were involved, as her accomplices and adulterers, Cneius Domitius, Vibius Marsus, and Lucius Arruntius, all three persons distinguished by their birth and employments. But as the minutes transmitted to the senate imported, that Macro had presided in the examination of the witnesses, and torture of the slaves, and the minutes were not accompanied by any letter from Tiberius against the accused, the fathers suspected, that while he was ill, the accusations were in great measure forged, perhaps without his privacy, by Macro, an irreconcilable enemy to Arruntius. However, that brave Roman chose to die, and to his friends attempting to divert him from that resolution, by representing to him, that news of the emperor's death, which would deliver him from the present danger, was daily expected, he answered in the following manner: "The same measures are not alike honourable to all men: I " have lived long enough, and have not wherewithal to reproach myself, save that I " have submitted to bear thus far an old age exposed to so many dangers, long hated
" as I was by Sejanus, and am now by Macro, always obnoxious to some reigning " minister,

was great and magnificent: the temple of Augustus, and the reparation of Pompey's theatre; the only public works he ever undertook, he left unfinished after so many years (65). And in the life of Caligula, he finished the temple of Augustus, says he, and the amphitheatre of Pompey, which Tiberius had begun, but not completed (66): So that, according to Tacitus, he finished these buildings; but left them imperfect according to Suetonius.

(C) About the end of the preceding year, Tiberius, leaving his island, approached Rome, and having staid some time at Tusculum, he came within six miles of the city, and thence beheld his metropolis floating, as it were, in blood. On his return to Campania, he was taken ill at Astura. Suetonius tells us, that he removed from the neighbourhood of Rome, being frightened with a kind of prodigy: for being wont to feed with his own hand a dragon, in which he took great pleasure, he found it one morning killed and half devoured by a swarm of ants. Hereupon, being warned by the soothsayers to avoid the multitude, he hastened back to Campania. We find no accounts of this nature in Tacitus, who only tells us, that Tiberius, after much shifting of places, settled in the end at the promontory of Misenum in a villa, which once belonged to Lucullus.

a "minister, through no fault of mine, but because I am irreconcilable to the wicked.
 " 'Tis true, I may outlive, and escape, the few and last days of Tiberius: but how shall
 " I escape the young prince, his heir? If Tiberius, at such an age, and after so long " experience, has been intirely changed by the spirit of an uncontrouled power, is it to " be hoped, that Caligula, who is yet scarce out of his childhood, unexperienced in " affairs, and brought up in the worst of principles, will pursue a better course, having
 " Macro for his guide? that Macro, who, being chosen to oppress Sejanus as the more
 " wicked of the two, has since afflicted the republic with more mischiefs and cruelties.
 " I foresee a servitude yet more dreadful, and therefore will fly both from the present " and the impending calamities." Having uttered these words, as if he had been b inspired by the gods, he opened his veins, and bled to death^h. Such was the end of His death.

Lucius Arruntius, a man of a most illustrious descent, of great fortune, and extraordinary accomplishments, for which he was accounted by Augustus, as we have observed in the beginning of this reign, equal to the sovereignty. Domitius, by pretending to prepare for his defence, and Marsus, by seeming resolved to end his life by abstinence, outlived Tiberius, and escaped the present danger. As for Albucilla, she attempted to lay violent hands on herself; but the blow proving ineffectual, she was by order of the senate dragged to prison, and there executed. Against the accomplices of her debaucheries, it was decreed, that Grafidius Sacerdos, formerly prætor, should be banished to an island; and that Pontius Fregallanus and Lælius Balbus, both senators, should be degraded. About the same time, Sextus Papinius, of a consular family, probably the son of Sextus Papinius, who was consul the foregoing year, ended his life, by throwing himself headlong from a high place, to avoid the impure sollicitations of his own mother, who was thereupon accused, but only banished Rome for ten years, till her younger son had passed the dangers of youthⁱ.

d In the mean time, Tiberius, having read in the journal of the senate, that some prisoners had been discharged, because he had only writ that informations were lodged against them without mentioning witnesses, transported with rage, resolved to return at all adventures to Caprea, and there, as in a place of safety, revenge the affront offered him; but the bad weather and his distemper kept him against his will at Misenum^k. However, he still hoped to overcome his present indisposition, depending His indisposition prevents his return to Caprea upon the predictions of Thrasyllus, which he esteemed as so many oracles (D), that famous astrologer having assured him, that he was to live ten years longer, either deceived himself, or with a design to deceive Tiberius, that he might not hasten the execution of those who were in prison. However that be, many were indebted to Thrasyllus's prediction for their lives^l. Tiberius, relying upon this, pursued his former course of life, without so much as relinquishing his shameful debaucheries, or mentioning his distemper to any physician. However, Charicles, an eminent man in that profession, who always attended him, as if he were departing upon some private affair, under the appearance of kissing his hand as he went out of the room, touched his pulse. Tiberius, suspecting the artifice, instantly ordered the entertainment Endeavours to hide his distemper.

(D) Tiberius, during his retirement at Rhodes, applied himself chiefly to the study of judicial astrology under the direction of Thrasyllus, whose skill in that art he proved by the following trial. He led him to a house built on the top of a steep rock by the sea-side, and there minutely consulted him about various events. Thrasyllus gave satisfactory answers to all his questions, assured him, that he should be soon raised to the empire, and foretold many revolutions, which afterwards happened as they had been predicted. Tiberius, struck with amazement, asked him, whether he had calculated his own nativity, and could thence foresee what was to befall him the same year, nay, that very day? The reader is to know, that the way to the abovementioned house lay cross solitary rocks and dreadful precipices; and that Tiberius, if he suspected the predictions of the astrologer, whose art he meant to try, to be vain, used on his return to cast him headlong into the sea. This had been the fate of several, who, unskilled in the art they professed, had attempted to impose upon him with false predictions. Thrasyllus therefore, when the abovementioned question was put to him, surveying the position of the stars and calculating their aspects, began at first to hesitate, then to tremble, and the more he meditated, the more he appeared dismayed with wonder and dread; at last he cried out, that just then he was threatened with a danger very near fatal. At these words Tiberius embracing him, congratulated him upon his foresight of dangers and his security from them; and thenceforth, esteeming his predictions as so many oracles, held him in the rank of his most intimate friends (67). Tiberius himself is said to have been skilled in astrology, but nevertheless died, if Dion Cassius is to be credited (68), ten years sooner than he expected; which discovers, to use the expression of Tacitus, the short bounds between the art and the falshood of the art.

(67) Tacit. annal. 6. c. 20.(68) Dio, l. lviii. f. 635.

to be served up, persuaded Charicles to sit down again, and continued himself at table longer than usual, as if he meant that honour only for a farewell to his friend, but in reality to feign health and hide his weakness. When the entertainment was over, he did not forget his old custom; but standing in the middle of the room with an officer by him, he called them all by their names, and took his leave of each of the guests in particular, as if he had been in perfect health. But for all this, Charicles assured Macro, that the emperor declined apace, and that he could not last two days longer. Hence the whole court was filled with close consultations, and expresses were sent to the generals and armies^m.

Is puzzled
about settling
the succession.

Tiberius had no surviving children of his own; he had indeed a grandson, the son of Drusus, named Tiberius Nero, and surnamed Gemellus, or the Twin, because born at a birth with another, who died in his infancy. Caius, surnamed Caligula, was his grandson too, but only by adoption, he being the son of his nephew Germanicus, whom he had adopted by order of Augustus. Hence he was at a loss to which of the two he should bequeath the empire. The son of Drusus was nearer in blood, and far more dear to him, but too young to govern such a mighty empire; being at this time but in the seventeenth year of his age. Caius was in the flower and vigor of youth, but greatly beloved by the people, which was a sufficient motive for his grandfather to hate him. In this perplexity the emperor thought even of Claudius, who was his nephew and brother to Germanicus; but the weakness of his understanding prevented the choice: for he had been hitherto reckoned incapable of any public employment. To seek a successor out of his own family was disgracing, and in a manner insulting, the name of the Cæsars and the memory of Augustus. For he had more at heart the grandeur of his race, than the welfare and security of the Roman state. So that, his mind still wavering and his strength decaying, he left to the decision of fate a deliberation, to which he was now unequalⁿ. Thus Tacitus. But Dion

Various opinions of writers
about his last will.

Cassius tell us, that he bequeathed the empire to Caius, whom he knew to be naturally cruel, arrogant, and tyrannical, hoping that his vices would efface the memory of his own wickedness, and that he would complete the destruction of the Roman nobility, being often heard to say, that Priam was a happy prince, who had the pleasure to outlive all his subjects, and see his kingdom with his whole race perish with him; and that in Caligula he had brought up a serpent for the people of Rome, and a Phæton for the rest of the world^o. But with Dion Cassius's leave, we cannot persuade ourselves, that such horrible thoughts should have ever entered into the mind even of Tiberius; and if they had, we may boldly affirm, that he was not so impolitic as ever to have uttered them. Suetonius assures us, that two years before his death he made his will, of which there were three copies, one under his own hand, the other written by one of his freedmen, but both to the same purpose, and witnessed by persons of no rank or distinction. By that will he left coheirs, Caius his grandson by Germanicus and Tiberius by Drusus, both in equal portions, and substituting them successively^p. This, in the opinion of a modern critic of no mean character^q, did not so much regard the emperor's private estate, as the empire; for Dion Cassius tells us in express terms, that the prince left the empire by his last will to young Tiberius too, that he took care to make this his last disposition well known, and even caused it to be read by Macro in the senate^r. Suetonius likewise in his life of Caligula writes, that the senate and people unanimously declared Caligula sole emperor, contrary to the express will of Tiberius, who had left him but his coheir with another of his grandchildren, who was then under age, and still in his prætexta^s. Philo likewise the Jew assures us, that young Tiberius was left coheir of Caius, and his colleague in the sovereignty; and adds, that Tiberius, if he had lived a little longer, would have cut off Caius, and left the empire to his grandson without either a partner or a rival^t. Agrippa, who was afterwards king of Judeæ, being come to wait on Tiberius, while he still resided in his island, the emperor recommended to him his grandson Tiberius, and highly resented his paying more court to Caius than to him; nay, he caused him six months after to be dragged to prison, though he had received him on his arrival with the greatest marks of friendship and affection, because in a private conversation with Caius he had wished young Tiberius might soon die, and surrender the empire to him^u. Caius therefore, doubting of the inclination of Tiberius, left no stone

^a stone unturned to secure the empire by other means. He even debased himself so far as to court the favour of Ennia Nevia, the wife of Macro, with the promise of marriage, as soon as he attained the sovereign power. His view in this was to engage in his interest her husband, whose credit with the emperor was known to be great^w. Tacitus and Dion Cassius tell us, that after the death of Claudia, who had been espoused to Caligula, Macro himself, to make his court to him, obliged his wife to sacrifice her honour to his ambitious views, and to secure the young prince by a promise of marriage^x. But Philo says, that Macro was altogether a stranger to the infamy of his wife, and suspected nothing dishonourable in the affection she shewed for Caius. The same writer adds, that Tiberius, whom no prince ever surpassed in sagacity and penetration, looking upon Caius as incapable of the government of such a vast empire, and at the same time suspecting him an enemy in his heart to the whole race of the Claudii, that is, to all his relations on the father's side, and consequently to young Tiberius, would have cut him off, instead of naming him for his successor, had not Macro diverted him from this design, by excusing the faults of the young prince, by ascribing to modesty his seeming want of parts, and assuring the emperor, that he had a great respect and affection for his grandson Tiberius^y. Macro's partiality for Caius was not unknown to Tiberius, who upbraided his minister with it, telling him, that he neglected the setting sun, and courted the rising. On several other occasions he dropt certain words, which plainly shewed, that he foresaw what would happen after his death (E). As one day Caius ridiculed Sylla upon some occasional discourse, Tiberius told him, that he would have all the vices of Sylla, and none of his virtues. At another time, a debate arising between the two young princes, the emperor embraced with many tears his little grandson; and addressing himself to Caius, who at this demonstration of kindness betrayed great sternness in his countenance, Thou, said he, wilt one day murder him, and another wilt murder thee^z. This he foretold, not from his skill in astrology, as Dion imagines^a, but from his sagacity and thorough knowledge of mankind. Caius saved by Macro.

In the mean time, the emperor's strength failing him more and more, on the sixteenth of March so deep a swoon seized him, that he was believed to have finished his course. Hereupon Caius, quitting in haste the palace to take possession of the empire, shewed himself abroad in the midst of a great throng of persons of all ranks, paying him their congratulations upon his accession to the throne. But in the height of his joy, sudden notice was brought him, that Tiberius had recovered his sight and voice, and had called for some refreshment to strengthen his fainting spirits. This unexpected news struck all with dread and horror; the croud about Caligula dispersed in a trice, every one resuming false sorrow, or pretending ignorance, and the young prince himself, trembling, speechless, and not able to stir from his place, expected there immediate death instead of the empire. Macro alone continued undisturbed, and, ordering the apartment to be cleared, caused the weak old man to be smothered with a weight of coverings under colour of keeping him warm^b. Seneca, as quoted by His death foretold by Tiberius.

(E) Josephus writes, that Tiberius, desirous to know by some prognostic to which of his grandchildren the gods reserved the empire, told Evodus, one of his freedmen, that he had a mind to see Caius and young Tiberius early next morning. As he was persuaded no doubt from his skill in astrology, that he, who came first, should succeed him, he charged Tiberius's governor to bring his grandson to him next morning by break of day, ordering at the same time Evodus to introduce to him immediately the young prince, who should arrive first. Accordingly, as soon as day appeared, the freedman, pursuant to his orders, went to wait at the door of the emperor's chamber the arrival of the princes, not doubting, but Tiberius, upon the warning he had had, would get the start of Caius. But it happened quite otherwise; Caius was already there, and immediately introduced by Evodus to the emperor, who in seeing him burst into tears, but soon restrained them, to acquaint Caius that the gods reserved the empire for him, and to recommend to him his grandson, whom they debarred from the power and authority which was due to him by right of succession. Caius made many fine promises, though he meant nothing less than to perform them; and the emperor, having named him for his successor, died a few days after (69). According to this account, which in our opinion favours of the fable, Tiberius left the empire to Caius alone; according to Dion Cassius and Suetonius, to Caius and Tiberius jointly; and according to Tacitus, to neither, but to the decision of fate, that is, to the person for whom fate or destiny reserved it. The authority of Tacitus is of great weight with us, especially in what he relates here, since all authors agree in describing Tiberius as a fatalist, or one who was persuaded that all things were governed by fate.

by Suetonius, tells us, that Tiberius, finding his end approached, pulled off his ring, and held it a considerable time in his hand, as if he designed to give it to some body; that he put it upon his finger again, and that after having continued a long time motionless with his left hand shut close, all of a sudden he called one of his attendants, and no one answering, he rose up; but his strength failing him, he fell down by the bed-side, and died^e. Others write, that Caius not only gave him a slow working poison, which consumed him by degrees, but that having commanded his ring to be taken off of his finger, and observing Tiberius to make some resistance, he immediately smothered him with a pillow; they add, that this action seemed so cruel to one of his freedmen, that he could not forbear crying out; which so provoked Caius, that he caused him to be immediately apprehended and crucified. This does not at all seem incredible, says Suetonius, since there are authors, who affirm, that he bragged of having attempted to dispatch the old emperor on another occasion, publicly owning, that, to revenge the death of his mother and brothers, he went with a dagger in his hand into Tiberius's chamber, while he was asleep; but being touched with compassion, he threw away the weapon, and retired; that Tiberius saw him, but thought it adviseable to take no notice of what he had observed. This circumstance inclines us to believe the whole account fabulous, and invented either by Caius himself, or by those who relate it. He did not indeed want cruelty for such an attempt, but courage and resolution, if we may depend upon the character which Tacitus and most writers give him. Tiberius died, according to Tacitus^f and Suetonius^g, on the sixteenth, according to Dion Cassius^h, on the twenty-sixth of March; so that he reigned from the death of Augustus, twenty-two years, six months, and twenty-six days, or ten days more, as Dion will have it. He was at his death in the seventy-eighth year of his age, which he had entered four months, and nine, or at most nineteen, days beforeⁱ. Though he had the preceding year highly obliged the city by a generous bounty on occasion of a fire, yet the news of his death was received with the greatest demonstrations of joy, the populace running up and down the streets in great crouds, and crying, Throw the tyrant into the Tiber, or beseeching their mother earth and the infernal gods to vouchsafe him no place but among the impious: some threatened to drag his vile carcase to the Gemoniæ, and there expose it to the rage and fury of the multitude, provoked not only by his past cruelties, but by a new piece of inhumanity, even after his death. For whereas, by the decree we have spoken of above, it was provided, that no criminal whatsoever should be executed till the tenth day after sentence pronounced, that term happening to expire with respect to several persons on the same day the news of Tiberius's death reached Rome, they earnestly begged for a farther reprieve, not doubting, but Caius would grant them their lives and liberty. But as he was absent, and no one else at Rome, to whom any petition in their behalf could be addressed, the keepers of the prison strangled them of their own accord, and exposed their bodies to public view; which cruel action increased the hatred of the people against Tiberius, as if his cruelty had outlived him^k. Several others, however, were saved; for the emperor dying before the term of their reprieve expired, they had time to apply to his successor, who set them at liberty^l. The body of the deceased emperor was by the soldiers, without doubt of the prætorian guards, carried from Misenum to Rome, where it was burnt with the usual solemnity, Caius, who had never abandoned the body, pronouncing the funeral oration, in which he spoke little of Tiberius, but greatly extolled Augustus and Germanicus, without forgetting himself. He had written to the senate before, acquainting them with the death of the emperor, and his accession to the empire, and requiring them at the same time to decree those honours to Tiberius which they had formerly bestowed on Augustus. But the senate, not yet acquainted with the humour of the new emperor, postponed the affair till his arrival, when he took no farther notice of what he had written; but causing the body to be brought into the city in the night-time, exposed it the next day, and then ordered it to be burnt without any extraordinary pomp or honours^m. As for his character, every reader may draw it to himself after the detail we have given of the most remarkable actions of his life. However, to what we have already said, we shall subjoin the words with which Tacitus closes the history of his reign. Tiberius, says he, was deservedly esteemed by all while he was a private man, or commanded under Augustus: with great cunning and address he feigned virtue, while Germanicus and Drusus lived: he bore a bore a mixt character of good and evil till the death of his mother; he did not disguise his execrable cruelty, but concealed his lewdness, while he loved and feared Sejanus: at last he abandoned himself at once to all wickedness, being no longer restrained either by shame or fear; but following the bent of his own disposition and nature^m (F). Many eminent writers flourished in his reign, of whom we shall give a succinct account, not to interrupt the thread of our history, in our notes (G), to which we refer our readers.

(F) We shall subjoin here some observations on Tiberius, which we have found in the ancients; but for brevity's sake avoided inserting in our text. He was, as Suetonius informs us, a great lover of the liberal arts: he was an eloquent and ready speaker, and in his writings imitated Messala Corvinus, a famous orator; but his too great niceness, or rather affectation, rendered his style perplexed and obscure; whence he was esteemed a better speaker without, than upon, premeditation and study. He wrote a lyric poem, intitled, A complaint on the death of Lucius Cæsar, which was greatly esteemed; and several Greek pieces in imitation of Euphorion, Rhianus and Parthenius, poets whom he admired above the rest, and whose statues he caused to be dedicated in the public libraries amongst those of the most celebrated writers. He took great delight in the fables of the poets, with which he was thoroughly acquainted, and used to puzzle the grammarians with the following and such-like questions; Who was Hecuba's mother? What was the name of Achilles amongst the maids at the court of Lycomedes? What songs the Sirens were said to sing? &c. The Greek tongue he spoke with great readiness and ease, but used it very seldom. In his speeches to the senate he took care to avoid Greek words; insomuch, that the Latin tongue supplying him with no word to express monopoly, he begged leave to use a foreign one. Having read in a decree of the senate the word emblema, he desired the senators to alter it, and either put a Latin word in its room, or express the meaning of it by circumlocution (70). He betrayed even from his infancy manifest tokens of a cruel, savage, and untractable temper; whence Theodorus Gadareus, who taught him the first rudiments of learning, used to call him, A mass of clay tempered with blood (71). Most of the ancients, who speak of him, observe, that though he could brook no opposition, yet he abhorred flattery, as suiting only with the spirit of slaves, and was even ashamed of the mean and slavish submissions of the senate. He never forgave free speakers, never could endure men of a bold spirit, whom first or last he pursued to destruction: but at the same time he abominated flattery, when he knew it to be so; whence it was dangerous, says Tacitus, to practice no flattery, and dangerous to practise too much, adulatione, quæ preinde anteps si nulla, & ubi nimia est: and elsewhere; libertatem metuebat, adulationem moderat. As he was a man of great penetration, and endowed with extraordinary talents both for civil and military employments, he would have made a great figure in the times of the republic, well supported the dignity of a senator, discharged with credit the first offices of state, and in all likelihood died in renown, and left behind him a high reputation. But being, unhappily for himself and his country, invested with an uncontrouled power, he let loose all his passions; so that he, who might have proved an excellent and useful member of a free state, became a prince altogether merciless, nay a destructive and insupportable tyrant. What is not to be apprehended from power without controul? and who is to be trusted with it, when a man of such great parts and so long experience, as Tiberius, was so intirely mastered and intoxicated with it?

(G) These were, Velleius Paterculus, of whose history the far greater part is lost; what still remains of it comprehends the ancient history of the Greeks and that of the Romans, from the defeat of Perfes to the seventeenth year of Tiberius's reign. He is thought to have written with candor and impartiality till the times of the Cæsars, in whose favour he miserably perverts truth, or utterly suppresses it. What he writes of Tiberius ought rather to be styled a fulsome panegyric, than a history. Semper magna fortuna comes est adulatio, says he; Flattery is a constant attendant upon greatness: and indeed he is himself a remarkable instance of the truth of this saying, as must evidently appear to every impartial reader in the perusal of the account he has left us of Tiberius's reign. He accuses Germanicus of cowardice, while he represents others as consummate heroes, who were no ways to compare with that brave prince, either in courage or conduct. His chief hero, after Tiberius, was the favourite minister Sejanus, on whom he bestows the highest encomiums, not foreseeing the doom that hung over his head, and soon after overtook him. Some writers think, that Velleius himself fell with Sejanus, as a friend, if not an accomplice, of the traitor whom he so undeservedly commended. He put the last hand to his work in the consulship of M. Vinicius, to whom he inscribed it; that is, in the seventeenth year of Tiberius's reign, as he himself informs us (72), and twenty-seven after he had been adopted by Augustus. He was of an equestrian family, come originally from Campania, and descended by the mother from the celebrated Decius Magius, who, being condemned by the senate of Capua to be delivered up to Hannibal, for his steady adherence to the Roman interest, was sent away for Carthage, but driven by a storm to the dominions of Ptolemy king of Egypt, who took him under his protection. His paternal grandfather was likewise a native of Campania, but raised to great preferments, first by Pompey the great, and afterwards by Brutus, under whom he served. He himself served nine years under Tiberius, first as military tribune in Thrace and Macedon, and afterwards in quality of commander of the legionary horse in Germany. As to his civil employments, he was honoured with the quæstorship, the prætorship, and, as some writers conjecture, with the consulate; which is not improbable, since he was in great favour both with Tiberius and Sejanus (73).

Valerius Maximus, who left behind him a collection of the memorable actions and sayings of the ancients, wrote about the latter end of Tiberius's reign, after the fall of Sejanus, as is manifest from his own words, and from those of the ancients who quote him. His style, which has nothing of the purity of the age he is supposed to have lived in, has prompted some to imagine, that his writings are of a much later date. These take it for granted, that all those who wrote in the golden age, wrote well, which others deny. Vossius takes the work, which passes under the name of Valerius Maximus, to be only an abridgment of what he wrote, done by one Julius Paris. In what age the supposed author of this epitome lived, we are no-where told; but to him is generally ascribed the treatise of Roman names, which is subjoined to the nine books of Valerius Maximus (74).

Strabo, whose seventeen books of geography are so much and so deservedly admired by the learned, observes in his sixteenth book, that the kingdom of Comagene had been but very lately reduced to a Roman province. This happened, according to the opinion of the best chronologers, the eighteenth year of the christian æra and the fifth of Tiberius's reign; so that we reasonably suppose Strabo, who was then very old, to have ended both his work and his life before the death of Tiberius. He wrote other books, but none of them have reached us.

Dionysius the geographer, who wrote a description of the earth in Greek verse, died, according to Vossius, in the reign of Tiberius. For that writer takes this to be the Dionysius who was sent into the east by Augustus, as we read in Pliny (75), to survey those countries, and make an exact description of them for the use of Caius Cæsar, who was to be sent thither. The Dionysius, whom Augustus employed, was a native of Corax, called also Alexandria and Antioch, and situated between the Tigris and Euphrates. He was the last, says Pliny, who wrote a description of the whole earth. Scaliger will not allow the description of the earth, which has reached us, to be the work of that Dionysius, but of another, who flourished under the emperor Severus. Salmasius on the other hand ascribes it to one of the same name, who wrote in the reign of M. Aurelius; and in his notes on the Augustean historians (76), promises to support this opinion with unanswerable arguments in a new edition, which he then designed, of Dionysius. This promise he made in 1620. But in his notes upon Solinus published in 1629, speaking occasionally of Dionysius the geographer, he says, that he lived under the emperor Severus, without taking the least notice of his invincible arguments, or so much as deigning to acquaint us with the reasons which prompted him to change his opinion (77). He speaks of him in another place (78); but there endeavours only to prove, that he did not flourish in the reign of Augustus. Suidas mentions three geographers, all bearing the name of Dionysius; one a native of Corinth, another of Miletus, and the third either of Rhodes or Samos (79). In such variety of opinions, we will not take upon us to ascertain the time, in which flourished the author of the description of the earth that has reached us: all we can say is, that Eustathius, Vossius, father Pagi, and cardinal Noris were certainly mistaken in supposing him to have lived in the time of Augustus, since he mentions some events, as Salmasius rightly observes (80), which happened in the reign of Domitian.

Phædrus, who translated into Latin verse the fables of Æsop, was, according to Vossius (81), a native of Thrace, and one of Augustus's freedmen, and died in the reign of Tiberius.

Thrasyllus the astrologer, of whom we have spoken above, was well versed in several other sciences, especially in Plato's philosophy. Jonssius takes him to be the author of a work quoted by some of the ancients, on the genealogy of Plato (82). To him are likewise ascribed some books of physics quoted by Pliny. The emperor Julian assures us, that Thrasyllus acquired more fame by the books he left behind him, than by his mighty credit with Tiberius (83). Jonssius tells us, that he was put to death by Tiberius in the sixteenth year of the christian æra, that is, in the second year of Tiberius's reign (84). But it is manifest from Dion Cassius, that Thrasyllus died by the course of nature in the thirty sixth year of the christian æra, that is, a year before Tiberius (85).

L. Feneftella, the poet and historian, died towards the latter end of Tiberius's reign. He seems to have been greatly esteemed by the ancients (86); but some are of opinion, that none of his works have reached our times. The treatise of the Roman magistrates, which goes under his name, is of a later date, and generally ascribed to Andrea Domenico Flocco, a native of Florence.

Verrius Flaccus, a celebrated grammarian and preceptor to Caius and Lucius Cæsars, died in the reign of Tiberius, extremely old (87). He wrote, according to Aulus Gellius (88), several books of memorable things, and a book of the signification of words, which that writer sometimes quotes (89). We have still some fragments of several of his works, quoted sometimes by Macrobius, and frequently by Pliny. He wrote a book of Fasti, and a catalogue of all the Roman consuls to his time, which was engraved on marble, and set up in the forum of Prænestæ (90). Most writers take the fragments of the Fasti, which are still to be seen in the capitol at Rome, to be the same that were set up at Prænestæ; but they can alledge nothing in proof of their opinion, except mere conjectures, since others, as well as Verrius, might have undertaken a work of the same nature. The Fasti Capitolini, besides the names of the consuls, mark the triumphs, several incidents relating to history, and also the years of Rome; but are always a year behind Varro, whom most authors follow. To these we might add many other writers, who flourished under Tiberius, according to Vossius and Jonssius; but, as their works are long since lost, we shall not detain our readers with a detail, from which they can reap no profit.

As the reverend fathers, Catrcu and Rouillè, have not yet carried their Roman history beyond this period, the death of Tiberius, we think ourselves bound both in justice and gratitude to acknowledge in this place the assistance we have received from their labours. The copious materials, which they have collected with incredible pains from almost innumerable authors, have been we must own, a great help to us, though we have never made use of them without consulting the originals, a caution, we are sorry to say it, which we have found too often necessary. But of their most material and remarkable mistakes notice has been occasionally taken in the course of the present history; and in this place we are only to return them thanks, which we do accordingly, for the assistance they have lent us. We might justly be taxed with ingratitude, if we did not at the same time discharge another obligation, and own ourselves greatly indebted to a writer of our own nation; we mean the ingenious Mr. Hooke, whose excellent performance has proved more serviceable to us, than the numerous volumes of the jesuits. As we are obliged, both by the nature of our undertaking and our engagement with the public, to have immediate recourse to the ancient writers, it is our constant custom to compare with them such of the moderns of any repute as have handled the same subjects with us. Upon this collation, we must do Mr. Hooke the justice to own, that he has with a scrupulous

As Caius, surnamed Caligula (H), was greatly beloved both by the senate and people, on account of the extraordinary merit of his father Germanicus; and the injuries done to him and his family, news was no sooner brought that he was advancing from Misenum with the corps of the deceased emperor, than persons of all ranks and ages crowded out to meet him. At his entrance into the city he was received with new names of honour and all possible demonstrations of real affection. The senate immediately a scrupulous exactness adhered all along to his authors; which is more than we can say of the Jesuits, of monsieur Vertot, or monsieur Rollin, who, like most writers of their nation, seem to take delight in embellishing their narrations with circumstances unknown to the ancients, which, in other words, is adulterating truth with romance, and passing fables upon the readers for history; since there are but few who have either the leisure or convenience of undeceiving themselves by recurring to the originals. Thus much we have thought ourselves obliged to say in commendation of a writer, who deserves so well of the public and of us in particular, tho' the favourable reception, which his undertaking has already met with, may seem to have rendered our testimony in some degree useless.

(H) Caius, says Tacitus, was born in the camp; nursed in the arms of the legions, and by them named Caligula, a military name from the boots, which, of the same fashion with their own, in compliment to them and to win their affections, he frequently wore (20). The surname of Caligula, says Suetonius (21), was given him in the camp by the legions, because he was brought up amongst them in the habit of a common soldier; in virtue of which education, he was to such a degree beloved by them, that upon a mutiny after the death of Augustus, his presence appeased them, when in the height of their fury. Thus Tacitus and Suetonius agree as to the origin of the surname of Caligula; but they differ as to the place of his birth. Caius Cæsar, says Suetonius (22), was born the last day of August, his father and C. Fonteius Capito being consuls, that is, the twelfth year of the common christian æra. As to the place of his birth, continues the same writer, the diversity of reports hath rendered it uncertain: Cn. Lentulus Getulicus writes, that he was born at Tibur, now Tivoli; Pliny in the country of the Treviri in a town called Ambitarinum, at the confluence of the Rhine and the Moselle; and, to confirm his opinion, he adds, that there are still altars to be seen there with this inscription; OB AGRIPPINÆ PUERPERIUM, for the delivery of Agrippina: the following verses likewise enforce the common opinion, that he was born in the place where the legions were at that time in their winter-quarters:

But I find amongst the public records, that he was born at Antium. Pliny refutes Getulicus as one who did not scruple to depart from truth; that he might flatter a young and ambitious prince by assigning him for his birth-place, a town which was consecrated to Hercules. This he could do the more boldly, as Agrippina had been delivered of a son at Tibur but a year before, whose name was likewise Caius Cæsar. As for Pliny, he is sufficiently confuted by the computation of times: for those who have written the history of Augustus assure us, that Caius was born before his father Germanicus was sent into Gaul, after his consulship was expired. Neither is the inscription upon the altars of any weight, seeing Agrippina was delivered of two daughters in that country; and the word Puerperium may be understood of either sex. Besides, in former times, girls were called Pueræ, and boys Puelli. There is also still extant an epistle from Augustus to his granddaughter Agrippina, written not many months before his death concerning this Caius, for there was no other child then of this name, in these words: Yesterday I ordered Talarus and Afellus to bring little Caius hither, if it pleased the gods, on the seventeenth of May. I send with him one of my physicians, whom, as I have written to Germanicus, he may keep with him, if he thinks good. Farewel, my dear Agrippina; take care of your health; that you may be well when you meet your husband. From this letter it is evident, that Caius was at this time in Italy; and he could not be born in a country, into which he was conveyed from Rome, when he was near two years old. This evidence confutes also the verses, the more because the author was never known. It therefore remains, that we acquiesce in the testimony of the public records; the rather because Caius preferred Antium to all other places, nay, being weary of Rome, he is said to have resolved to remove his imperial seat thither. Thus far Suetonius (23), whose arguments, in the opinion of Lipsius, carry no great weight with them. Were Tacitus and Pliny ignorant of what was contained in the public acts? Can we suppose, that such an accurate writer as Tacitus would have positively affirmed, without consulting the public records, that Caius was born in the camp? Germanicus, as it is agreed on all hands, was sent into Germany immediately after the slaughter of Varus and his legions, and continued there till his consulship; when he left Germany and returned to Rome; but we are no-where told, that his wife Agrippina accompanied him in that journey. She was perhaps then big with Caius, remained on that account in Germany, and was there delivered of him, during her husband's consulship. There appears at least in this no incongruity no improbability. As to the public registers, perhaps another son, bearing the same name, was born to them at Antium; for they had in all nine children, of whom three died infants. The surname of Caligula, which was given to this Caius by the legions some time after his birth, was not, we imagine, added to his name in the registers: Suetonius therefore might have mistaken another Caius for this. But he could not be born in a country, into which he was conveyed from Rome, when he was two years old. Why not? Might not Agrippina have been delivered of Caius in Germany, then come to Rome, and afterwards return to Germany? We are surpris'd that Suetonius should lay any stress on so weak an argument. Caius, 'tis true, preferred Antium to all other places, as Tiberius did Capræ, and Augustus Tibur and Lanuvium; but no one ever pretended to infer from thence, that they were born in either of these places. Whoever was the author of the above-mentioned verses, they were published upon Caius's accession to the empire; and we can hardly persuade ourselves, that the place of his nativity was not then known at least to every Roman. Upon the whole, we cannot help preferring to the authority of Suetonius that of Tacitus, supported by the testimonies of Pliny, Athenæus, and Sextus Victor (24).

diately assembled, and, the people thronging into the hall with the senators, he was by universal consent declared emperor with full power, contrary to the express will of Tiberius, who had left him coheir with his grandson Tiberius, then under age and in his pretexta. The joy for his accession to the imperial throne was not confined to the narrow bounds of Rome and Italy, but reached the most distant provinces; insomuch, that in the space of three months a hundred and sixty thousand victims were slain on that occasion within the limits of the empire^a. He had no sooner paid his last duty to the remains of his grandfather, than he hastened into the islands of Pandataria and Pontia, where he gathered with great reverence the bones and ashes of his mother and brother Nero, brought them to Rome, and caused them to be deposited with extraordinary pomp in the mausoleum of Augustus^b. The inscriptions which he placed over them are still to be seen^c; and from the medals of Agrippina, which have reached us^d, it appears, that he distinguished her with the title of Augusta. All the decrees of the senate enacted against them, and against Drusus, who died at Rome, were annulled^e; nay, a stately villa, on the sea-side, where Agrippina had for some time been kept under confinement, was levelled with the ground, that no monuments might remain of her misfortunes^f. Public sacrifices were at his motion appointed by the senate to be yearly offered to perpetuate their memory; solemn games in the circus, and chariot-races, were instituted in honour of his mother, in which her image was to be carried amongst those of the gods; and the month of September was by a decree of the senate to be thenceforth called by the name of his father Germanicus. Having thus signalized his piety towards his father, his mother, and his brothers, he honoured his grandmother Antonia with the name of Augusta, appointed her priestess of Augustus, granted her all the privileges enjoyed by the vestals, and all the marks of distinction which had ever been conferred upon Livia, either by Augustus or Tiberius^g. The privileges of the vestals he likewise granted to his sisters, Agrippina, Drusilla, and Livilla or Julia (I), and ordained that their names should be added to his in all solemn oaths, with this clause; Neither am I dearer to myself, nor are my children dearer to me, than Caius Cæsar and his sisters; and to all the public acts the following form was ordered to be prefixed; May it prove fortunate and happy to Caius Cæsar and his sisters^h. All the papers, registers, and records, which Tiberius had left relating to the proceedings against his mother and brothers, he caused to be brought publicly into the forum, and there to be committed to the flames in his presence, after having solemnly called the gods to witness, that he had never read, nor even opened, them. This he did, as he then declared, that no room might be left for fear or apprehensions in those who had been the occasion of the misfortunes which befel themⁱ. However, as they were all afterwards to a man cut off under the imputation of various crimes, it was commonly believed, that he had burnt only the copies, and preserved the originals^j. The very day he made his entry into Rome, he was for setting at liberty Agrippa, the grandson of king Herod, whom Tiberius had confined six months before. But his grandmother Antonia, though a great friend to Agrippa, advised him to suspend for some time the effects of his good-nature, lest he should seem to insult the memory of his grandfather^k. However, he was released a few days after, as were likewise all the other state prisoners, and among the rest L. Pomponius Secundus, of whom we have spoken above, after seven years close confinement. Such as had been banished by Tiberius were all recalled home, which occasioned an universal joy in the city. But nothing gave greater satisfaction both to the nobility and people, than his solemnly declaring, that he would not suffer any one to be accused of treason, since under the appearance of that crime so many illustrious citizens, so many ancient and noble families, had been involved in endless calamities. Of this his resolution he gave soon after a remarkable instance; for a note being offered him tending to the discovery of a conspiracy against his life, he rejected it,

(I) Caius had, according to Suetonius, but three sisters, Agrippina, Drusilla, and Livilla; so that Livilla and Julia must be one and the same person. Julia was the youngest of Germanicus's daughters, born in the seventeenth year of the christian æra, and in the thirty-third married to Marcus Vinicius (25).

^a it, saying, *I am not conscious to myself of any action that can deserve the hatred of any man, and therefore have no ears for informers*². Though the will of Tiberius had been declared null by the senate, yet he executed every article of it with great punctuality, except that which related to the deceased emperor's grandson; the same regard he paid to the testament of Livia, which had been suppressed by Tiberius, causing their legacies to be discharged forthwith, and adding to them large sums of his own to be divided among the Roman people and the soldiery³. In his first speech to the senate he promised to govern with justice and moderation, to do nothing without their advice, and to follow their directions, as their child and pupil. Pursuant to his protestations, he caused the famous institutions of Augustus to be revived and published, though they had been long neglected and disused by Tiberius; he gave free jurisdiction to the magistrates, without reserving any appeal to himself, and even attempted to restore the antient method of elections by the suffrages of the people. The senate were for declaring him consul, as soon as the funeral ceremonies, performed in honour of his grandfather, were over; but he could not be prevailed upon to accept that dignity, till Proculus and Nigrinus had ended their year, which expired in the month of July^b. In the mean time, he applied himself with the consuls and senate to the reformation of many abuses, which had crept into the state. He reviewed the Roman knights, and publicly took away the rings and horses of such as he found guilty of any notorious crime; smaller offences he thought sufficiently punished by passing over the names of the offenders, as he read the roll. He was for casting the spintriae, or inventors of abominable lewdness, into the sea; but being dissuaded from that severity, he banished them from Rome. He allowed every one to keep and peruse the books of Titus Labienus, Cremutius Cordus, and Cassius Severus, which, in the reign of Tiberius, had been by order of the senate prohibited and suppressed, saying, it nearly concerned him, that all the actions of Tiberius should be transmitted to posterity. He likewise remitted several impositions, which had been exacted with great severity during the whole reign of his predecessor^c. Thus did Caligula happily begin his reign; and of him it may be truly said, that no prince came ever to a throne with greater advantages, or more to the satisfaction of his people.

^d IN the month of July, Caius entered upon his first consulship, and chose for his colleague his uncle Claudius, then in the forty-sixth year of his age; who till that time had continued in the equestrian order, being judged unequal to any public employment, on account of the weakness both of his body and mind^d. We are told, that when he first entered the forum with the fasces, an eagle perched upon his shoulder, which was looked upon as a prognostic of his future grandeur^e. The same day, Caius, in a speech which he made to the senate, spoke with great vehemence against the disorders of the late administration, promised to avoid them as much as lay in his power, and solemnly protested, that he had nothing so much at heart, as to render the people happy, whom the gods had committed to his care. The senate decreed, that his speech should be publicly read every year, without all doubt to remind him of the promises he had made them, and lay him under some obligation of performing them^f. On the last day of August, which was his birth-day, he entertained the people with the most magnificent shews that had ever been seen in Rome; and on this occasion cushions were first laid on the seats of the senators, who till that time had sat both in the senate and theatre on bare benches^g. Thenceforth no day passed without some shew or other, the emperor taking great pleasure in such diversions, and expending on such occasions immense sums. During his consulship, he restored the kingdom of Comagene, which had been reduced to a Roman province eighteen years before, to Antiochus, the son of that Antiochus who had been driven out by Tiberius, ordering at the same time a hundred millions of sesterces, that is, about a million of our money, to be paid to him by way of restitution for the revenues of his kingdom, which Rome had so long enjoyed without any just title^h. Antiochus, out of gratitude to so generous a benefactor, gave two of his names to a town of Comagene, calling it, Cesarea Germanica, which were afterwards changed into that of *Germanicia*ⁱ. Of his generosity to Agrippa we spoke in the history of the Jews; and therefore shall only observe here, that he bestowed on him the tetrarchy of his uncle Philip, with the title of king; but reserved for for himself the rest of Judæa, whither he dispatched this year Marcellus in quality of a governor in the room of Pontius Pilate, whom Lucius Vitellius, governor of Syria, had sent to Rome, to answer the many grievous complaints of the Jewish people, whom And to others. he had oppressed in a most tyrannical manner ^k. His generosity to several private persons was no less remarkable; for a fire happening in the first months of his reign, he made good the losses which every particular had sustained. To a freedwoman, who had endured most exquisite torments, without discovering the crime of a patron, he gave eighty thousand sesterces. For these and other bounties a shield of gold with his image was decreed to him, which by order of the senate was to be carried annually on a certain day, by the colleges of priests, to the capitol; the senators following it, and the noblemens children of both sexes singing hymns in praise of his virtues. ^b Besides, it was ordained, that the day of his accession to the empire should be called Palilia, as if Rome had been founded anew on that day ^l. Caius having held the consulate two months and twelve days, that is, to the twelfth of September, resigned the fasces to those who had been appointed by Tiberius for the rest of the year ^m; but their names we find no-where recorded.

It was probably about this time, that Caius wrote to Lucius Vitellius, governor of Syria, to conclude a peace with Artabanus king of the Parthians. Suetonius tells us in one place, that Vitellius used all manner of artifice to draw Artabanus to a conference ⁿ; and in another, that the Parthian king, who had always shewn the utmost contempt and an irreconcilable hatred to Tiberius, sought of his own accord the friendship of Caius ^o. According to Dion Cassius, that prince had already passed the Euphrates, and was upon the point of invading Syria, when Vitellius, coming unexpectedly upon him, obliged him to agree to a treaty ^p. Be that as it will, Artabanus and Vitellius came to an interview on a bridge which they caused to be laid over the Euphrates, each attended by a certain number of guards; and concluded a treaty, the conditions of which were very advantageous to the Romans ^q. The Parthian even condescended to give by way of hostage one of his own sons ^r, or at least a noble youth of great distinction, named Darius ^s, probably of the race of the Arscidae, whom he sent some time after to Rome, with a Jew, by name Eleazar, seven cubits high ^t. When the treaty was concluded, Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee, gave a magnificent entertainment to Artabanus and Vitellius, under a rich pavilion raised upon boats in the middle of the river ^u. Suetonius ^w and Dion Cassius ^x tell us, that Artabanus passed the Euphrates, adored the eagles and ensigns of the legions, and kissed the images of Augustus and Caius Cæsar. Herod immediately dispatched messengers to Rome with a minute account of what had passed, who arriving before the messengers of Vitellius, the emperor received the latter coldly, telling them, that Herod had already transmitted to him a detail of all that had been transacted on the Euphrates; which occasioned a misunderstanding between the tetrarch of Galilee and Vitellius ^y.

He is taken ill. AFTER Caius had thus happily reigned about eight months, he was seized with a violent fit of illness, occasioned by his intemperance and debaucheries; for while Tiberius lived, he was mighty temperate in his diet; but upon his death he forsook his antient way of living, and gave himself intirely up to all manner of disorders; which so affected his constitution, that towards the end of October he fell dangerously ill. As that was the time of the year, in which those who traded to foreign countries returned home, news of the emperor's indisposition was immediately carried to all the provinces of the empire, and every-where received with the greatest tokens of sorrow ^a. At Rome his palace was constantly crouded with multitudes of people of all ranks inquiring about his health; many passed whole nights at his gate, and some, devoting their lives for his, promised to fight amongst the gladiators for his safety, and set up bills of this their resolution in the streets. At length he recovered, and with his recovery restored happiness to the whole empire: innumerable victims were slain, and sacrifices offered in the most distant provinces subject to Rome, by way of thanksgiving to the gods for so signal a favour. But how blind is man in his imagination! how vain in his hope, and ignorant of what is most to his advantage! ^b This

This prince so much beloved, and universally looked upon as the author of all public and private happiness, either changed all on a sudden his nature, or discovered that which he had some time artfully disguised. Some writers think, that this distemper affected his brain; for ever after he was much troubled for want of sleep, never resting above three hours in a night, and that never quietly, but constantly frightened with strange dreams and dreadful imaginations; so that he passed great part of the night, either sitting up in his bed, or wandering about the galleries of his palace, longing for day. He was himself, says Suetonius^a, so sensible of the infirmity of his mind, that he once resolved to retire in order to purge his brain. He was subject, when a child, to the falling sickness; and in his youth, though patient of labour and hardships, subject to fainting fits. Others ascribe this odd and unaccountable conduct to a philtre, or love-potion, which was afterwards given him by his wife Cæsonia, and impaired his understanding. But, whatever was the cause of this change, it is certain, that from the time of his malady to the hour of his death he acted more like a madman than a prince; so that for the rest of his reign the reader is to expect nothing but an uninterrupted train of execrable vices, monstrous extravagancies, and such ridiculous inconsistencies, as cannot well be related with that gravity and decency which becomes an historian. On his accession to the throne, he would admit of no titles of honour; but soon after his recovery he assumed them all in one day, though Augustus had taken them separately, and Tiberius had to the last declined several of them^b. These were probably the titles of Augustus, of emperor, of high pontiff, of perpetual tribune. From several medals which have reached our times^c, it appears, that he bore all these titles before his second consulate; but that of father of his country he did not assume, till the third year of his tribunitial power^d. To the above-mentioned titles he added the following surnames, styling himself, the most pious, the son of the camp, the father of the armies, the most gracious, the most mighty, Cæsar^e. This year, Tiberius the son of Drusus, being eighteen complete, took the manly robe; on which occasion Caius, after many protestations of kindness and sincere affection for the young prince, first adopted him, and then declared him prince of the Roman youth. But these honours the unfortunate Tiberius enjoyed a very short time, Caius not being ashamed to put him to death a few days after he had solemnly declared, that his life was as dear to him as his own, and that he would ever cherish him as his own child. Philo tells us, that he adopted him with no other view, but to acquire that absolute power over him, which the Roman laws gave to every parent over his children^f. Be that as it will, he had no sooner adopted him, than he charged some tribunes and centurions of his guards to acquaint the young prince, that he must with his own hand put an end to his life, thinking it unlawful for any inferior person to imbrue his hands in the blood of one of the imperial family. The innocent youth expected nothing less, and therefore was, as we may well imagine, struck with surprise and amazement, when the officers denounced to him the emperor's orders. As he was of a mild temper, and had ever avoided assisting at executions, and even at the combats of gladiators, he presented his throat first to the officer who stood next to him, and then to all the rest, begging them with many tears to execute the cruel order they had brought him. But as they all declined that office, pursuant to the emperor's orders, strictly forbidding them to be any ways aiding and assisting to his death, the young prince drew at length his sword; but not knowing where to strike, he begged they would at least shew him where the wound might prove mortal, and soon put an end to his life and misery. So far they complied with his request, and then the unfortunate youth stabbed himself in their presence^g. Caius, to excuse this first act of cruelty, which was soon followed by many others, pretended, that Tiberius had, during his illness, wished him dead^h; and that, through fear of being poisoned, he had taken an antidote, which when he discovered, he cried out, What! an antidote against Cæsar? But this pretended antidote was only a remedy he had taken for a cough, with which he had been long troubledⁱ. Thus he rid himself of the only prince, to whom those could apply, who might in process of time be dissatisfied with his government. As for his uncle Claudius, he looked upon him as a person utterly unfit for any office in the empire, or in private life, as he really was; and therefore saved him, as he openly declared, for a laughing-stock. Being thus by the death of

of Tiberius delivered from all restraint and controul, he gave a full loose to his furious passions, and commenced an open enemy to mankind, a complete tyrant, or rather, as Suetonius styles him^k, an outrageous monster. Soon after his recovery, he obliged all those, who, during his malady, had devoted their lives for his, and promised to fight amongst the gladiators, to fulfil their promise; and because one was somewhat backward in the accomplishment of his vow, he caused him to be adorned like a victim, and delivered to a company of rude and merciless boys, who, after abusing him in a most cruel and inhuman manner, dragged him through the streets, requiring the accomplishment of his vow, and at last threw him down a precipice, and put an end to his life^l. His grandmother Antonia, venerable for her age and no less illustrious for quality, for she was the daughter of Marc Antony, the niece of Augustus, sister-in-law of Tiberius, and mother of Drusus, having taken upon her to admonish him, he resented that freedom to such a degree, that he reduced her to the necessity of laying violent hands on herself^m; whether by an express order, or only by the unbecoming manner with which he treated her, we are not told. That illustrious princess having one day begged to speak with him in private, he refused her that favour, and ordered Macro to be present the whole time she continued with him. On another occasion, as she offered to advise him, he immediately interrupted her in a violent rage, bidding her remember, that he could do what he pleased, with whom he pleased. With these indignities and affronts, 'tis most probable, he hastened her death. Some indeed have written, that he caused her to be poisonedⁿ, which, if true, Philo would never have passed over in silence. He bestowed no honours upon her after her death, and from one of the windows of his palace beheld the funeral pomp quite unconcerned^o. Dion Cassius fixes the death of Silanus, the emperor's father-in-law, to this year; but, according to Philo, it happened after that of Macro, of which we shall speak, the following year. In this or the foregoing year, was born on the fifteenth of December the emperor Nero, and much about the same time Josephus the historian.

Various instances of
elty.

THE next consuls were M. Aquilius Julianus and P. Nonius Asprenas^p, appointed by Tiberius, whose appointment Caius did not think fit to alter^q. In the beginning of the year the senate and consuls bound themselves by a solemn oath to observe all the laws and constitutions of Augustus and Caius, without mentioning those of Tiberius; and this omission passed into a custom, which ever after obtained. At the same time, vows were made for the safety of Caius and his sisters. Dion Cassius observes, that on the same day, a slave, named Macaon, placing himself upon the bed of Jupiter Capitolinus, foretold many dreadful calamities; and when he had done, killed first a small dog, which he had brought with him, and then himself. This year, Caius appointed Soemus prince of the Iturean Arabs; gave Armenia Minor, and soon after part of Arabia, to Cotys king of Thrace; and to his cousin Rhemetalces that part of Thrace which Cotys had held; to Polemon he gave the territories of Pontus, which his father Polemon had possessed^r. Suetonius tells us, that Caius, having advanced this year Flavius Vespasianus to the ædileship, and being one day angry with him for his remissness in seeing the streets kept clean, which was part of his province, he commanded his guards to take some of the dirt, and besmear with it the ædile's embroidered robe. This some interpreted as a presage of Vespasian's future grandeur^s; no doubt when they saw him already possessed of the empire. Dion Cassius and Suetonius give us dismal accounts of the many cruelties practised by this bloody idiot, in the second year of his reign. Among the rest he tells us, that one day, finding there were no criminals condemned to fight with the wild beasts, according to the barbarous custom which obtained at Rome, he commanded such of the people as were already come to see the shews, to be thrown to them, having first ordered their tongues to be cut out, that they might not disturb with their cries and complaints his inhuman diversion. Finding it very chargeable to maintain the wild beasts, which were kept for such entertainments, he often visited the prisons in person; and, ordering all the prisoners to be ranged in a gallery before him, sentenced many of them to be thrown to the wild beasts, without examining whether they were guilty or innocent. Once in particular, as they stood drawn up before him, he commanded all to be taken away to feed his beasts, a calvo ad calvum, that is, from such a bald head, whom he pointed out, to another. Great numbers of old men, of infirm persons, and of such as were reduced to poverty, met with the same cruel fate, the inhuman tyrant pretending, that by such unheard-a unheard-of barbarities he consulted the public welfare, since he delivered the state from persons who were but so many burdens to it. A Roman knight whom he had caused to be cast to the wild beasts, crying out that he was innocent, he ordered him to be taken up, his tongue to be cut out, and then to be thrown in again. It was his constant custom to oblige parents, though free from all guilt, to assist at the execution of their children, and often ordered them to be assassinated the following night in their houses. To one of them, who pretended sickness and begged to be excused, he sent his own litter^c. Having caused the son of an illustrious Roman knight, named Pastor, to be dragged to prison, for no other reason, but because he was remarkable for his comeliness and the tallness of his stature, the unhappy father went b immediately to intercede for his child. But the cruel monster, instead of hearkening to his tears and intreaties, commanded the innocent youth to be executed without delay; and when the news of his death was brought, to insult nature itself, he invited the distressed parent to dine with him that very day, and forced him, by threatening to treat in the like manner his other son, if he betrayed any symptoms of grief, to drink to excess, and in the height of his affliction to shew such outward signs of joy, as would have been at any time altogether unbecoming a person of his rank and age^d. One Caninius Iulus having in a private conversation advised Caius with great liberty to alter his conduct, as he was withdrawing, That you may not flatter yourself, Caninius, with vain hopes, said the emperor, I have already signed the warrant for your death. At these words Caninius, without shewing the least concern, turning about, c I return you thanks, said he, most gracious prince, for this favour. As the decree of the senate, granting to condemned persons ten days respite, was in this instance observed by Caius, the undaunted Caninius during that interval never betrayed the least uneasiness; inasmuch, that the centurion, who came, when the ten days were expired, to see the sentence put in execution, found him playing, with his usual calmness, at chess. When the executioner appeared, he started up with a cheerful countenance, embraced his friends, and, taking his leave of them, told them, that he should soon know whether or no the soul was immortal; that in the very article of his death he would particularly mind in what manner it abandoned the body, and after his death return to acquaint his friends with the state of souls after their separation. He then offered his d neck to the executioner, with the intrepidity of a true hero^w. The emperor, if such an inhuman madman deserves that name, assisted in person at most executions; so great was the delight he took in cruelty and bloodshed; but always caused the mouths of those, who suffered in public, to be stopt, either with their cloaths or a sponge, lest they should upbraid him with his wickedness^x. He seldom suffered them to be dispatched at once, desiring they might feel themselves dying, which was his usual expression. While he was at table, he often caused criminals, and sometimes innocent persons, to be racked in his presence, nay, and their heads to be cut off by a soldier, who did it with great skill and dexterity. Being once mistaken

 e in the name of a person, and causing him to be executed instead of another, when he understood his error, 'Tis no matter, said he, he deserved it as well as the other. Five of the gladiators, called retiarii, because they used in fighting certain nets, having yielded to the like number of secutores, who were their antagonists, he commanded them to be slain; but one of the five, snatching up his arms, killed all the conquerors. This action Caligula looked upon as cruel, lamented it in public, and loaded all those with curses who were so hard-hearted as to behold it. As he pretended to great skill in fencing, a famous gladiator, with whom he often fought in jest, pretending to be conquered, fell down at his feet, as the gladiators, who were overcome, used to do. But his flattery cost him dear; for Caius, taking advantage of f his fall, stabbed him with a dagger; then with a branch of palm-tree, the symbol of victory, in his hand, he ran up and down triumphing, as if he had fairly overcome him. As one night at supper he burst suddenly into a loud laughter, and the consuls, who sat near him, desired with great respect to know the cause of his mirth: What makes me so merry, said he, is, that I can have both your throats cut with the least nod of my head. A victim being brought to the altar and ready to be offered, he appeared unexpectedly among the rest in the habit of a priest, and, lifting up the ax, as if he designed to kill the victim, he knocked out the brains of the priest who stood by him. Having demanded of one, who had been banished by Tiberius, and recalled by him; how he employed himself in his exile; upon his answering, that he had constantly prayed for the death of Tiberius, that he might come to the empire, he immediately concluded, that those, whom he had banished, prayed likewise for his death; and upon that presumption dispatched officers to the islands, with orders to put them all to the sword without mercy¹. To these and innumerable other acts of cruelty, related at length by Suetonius and Dion Cassius, the latter adds the death of Macro and his wife, whom Caius with the utmost ingratitude caused to be put to death this year. To Macro he was indebted both for his life and empire, and had promised him the government of Egypt, the highest post to which a knight could aspire. But, instead of the promised reward, he ordered both him and his wife, as some historians have written^k, to dispatch themselves with their own hands. With them were put to death all their children, nay, and their slaves, so that not one of the whole family was left alive. Macro indeed, according to the character Tacitus gives us of him, deserved so tragical an end, but not at Caius's hands. The true cause of his death was, if Philo is to be credited, his using with more liberty, than the tyrant could endure, the authority which his eminent services gave him; but Caius charged him with other crimes, and pretended, that, unmindful of his condition, he had even challenged an equal share in the sovereign power¹. The next person he sacrificed to his cruelty was M. Silanus, whose daughter he had married in Tiberius's reign, a man of a most illustrious descent, and highly esteemed by all on account of his great experience in affairs, his prudence, and eminent probity. He took upon him to disapprove Caius's wild measures, and suggest others to him, by which, if followed, he would have answered the expectation the public had entertained of him. But the jealous idiot, having a mighty opinion of his own abilities, and looking upon those as his enemies who found fault with his measures, resolved to lay hold of the first opportunity to rid himself of so troublesome a counsellor; which he did accordingly on the following occasion. One day all on a sudden he took it into his head to divert himself on the sea, Silanus, who could not endure the agitation of the ship, begged to be excused from attending him: this Caius imputed to him as a great crime, pretending, that he remained ashore with a design to seize on the empire, in case any misfortune had happened to him; and upon this groundless pretext he obliged him to cut his own throat with a razor^m (K). The death of Silanus was followed by that of many other persons of great distinction, whom he condemned, under pretence that they had been accessory to the death of his mother or brothers; though his real motive was to seize on their estates; for he had already squandered away great part of the immense treasure left him by Tiberius. This year about the month of July died his sister Drusilla. She had been given by Tiberius five years before to L. Cassius Longinus, and taken from him soon after by Caius, who lived publicly with her, as if she had been his own wife, and had, during his sickness, appointed her to succeed him in the empireⁿ. He had maintained with her, as well as with his other sisters, if Suetonius is to be credited, a criminal conversation, even before she was married. When she died, she was, according to Dion Cassius^o, the wife of M. Lepidus. That writer gives us a very particular account of the extraordinary honours conferred upon her by Caius after her death. She was immediately ranked amongst the gods, and thenceforth styled the goddess Drusilla, which impious title the prostitute bears on some Greek medals,

(K) Julius Grecinus, father to the famous Agri- cola, had some time before been ordered by Caius to accuse Silanus, and put to death for declining that infamous office. Grecinus was a senator, no less famous for his eloquence, than his probity (26). Seneca often mentions him, and tells us, that not having wherewithal to defray the charges of the public shews, which he was obliged to exhibit in virtue of his office, one Fabius Persicus, a man of great wealth, but of an indifferent character, sent him a very considerable sum; which he refused, answering his friends, who found fault with his unseasonable generosity; Would you have me to accept a favour of one with whom I should not care to eat a meal's meat? Rubelius, who had been consul, but was a man of the same stamp with Persicus, sent him a larger sum than the other, which he likewise rejected; but Rubelius pressing him, he begged to be excused, saying, Neither have I accepted any thing of Persicus (27). The same writer tells us elsewhere (28), that he was murdered by Caius's orders, because he was a better man, than was expedient for any one to be under a tyrant. He wrote a book upon agriculture, which is quoted by Columella (29). Pliny likewise ranks him among writers (30).

a medals, which have reached our times ^p. A senator, by name Livius Geminus, declared in full senate upon his oath, that he saw her carried up to heaven ^q. Seneca rallies him with a good deal of humour upon this vision, but nevertheless chose rather to adore the divinity of Drusilla, than incur the displeasure of the prince. The emperor's passion for his sister appeared no less foolish after her death, than it had been infamous during her life. He immediately left Rome, and, after having wandered some time up and down Campania, he passed over into Sicily, where he exhibited most magnificent shews, and repaired at a vast charge the walls of Syracuse, and some temples that were decayed with age. He ridiculed many things, which were looked upon by the Sicilians as miracles; but was so terrified with the smoke and noise of mount Ætna, that he fled from Messena in the night, not having courage enough to wait till day appeared ^r. Upon his return to Rome, he pursued the course of his cruelties with more barbarity than ever. If any one betrayed joy, it was on account of the death of Drusilla; if sorrow, it was on account of the divine honours that were paid her; and both were crimes against the state, and punished with death: insomuch, that they were all at a loss how to comport themselves, it being alike capital to mourn and to rejoice ^t.

Caius had continued a widow ever since the death of Junia, the daughter of Si- ^{His marriages and divorces.} lanus. But C. Calpurnius Piso marrying one Livia Orestilla, and inviting him to his wedding, when the solemnity was over, he commanded the bride to be carried to his own palace, and there married her; but divorced her a few days after, and in the term of two years, or two months as some will have it, banished both her and Piso, under pretence that they had lived together ^u. Not long after he married Lollia Paulina, the grand-daughter of M. Lollius, whom Augustus, as we have related elsewhere, had appointed governor of Caius Cæsar, when he sent him into the east. Lollia was already married to C. Memmius Regulus, governor of Macedon and Achaia; but Caius having heard in a private conversation, that her grandmother had been famous for her beauty, he immediately sent for her, forced her from her husband, and married her ^w (L); but in a short time not only put her away, but threatened her with death, if she either returned to her former husband, or married any other man ^x.

d We shall have occasion to speak of her in the following reign.

AND now the bloody monster, finding no one dared to oppose his sovereign will and pleasure, notwithstanding the many murders he daily committed, began to look upon himself as raised above the condition of a mortal man. To confirm himself in this ridiculous fancy, he is said to have used the following no less ridiculous argument: As those to whose care sheep, oxen, and other cattle are committed, are themselves neither sheep nor oxen, but of a nature infinitely superior to the condition of those animals; so those who are set over all men and creatures in the world, ought not to be regarded as men, but revered like gods ^y. He first betrayed this extravagant fancy at an entertainment with some foreign kings, who came to pay him homage. As some dispute arose amongst those princes about the nobility of their extraction, Caius, starting up, repeated a verse of Homer in the person of Ulysses; Let there be but one king, one lord below; and was for assuming immediately the diadem, and changing the government into a monarchy. But being told, that he was already above all the kings and monarchs of the earth, he began from that time to challenge the honours paid to the demi-gods, such as Hercules, Bacchus, Tryphon, &c. assuming the dress in which they were represented, and appearing sometimes with a lion's skin about his shoulders and a club in his hand, to personate Hercules; sometimes with wings at his feet, and a caduceus in his hand, like Mercury, &c. But he soon thought it beneath him to be honoured only as a demigod, and claimed the same worship that was paid to Apollo, Mars, and Jupiter himself; nay he caused the heads to be taken off their statues, and his own to be put in their room. He often placed himself in the temple of Castor and Pollux, between the statues of those brothers, to be adored by all ^{Claims divine honours.}

(L) Lollia Paulina was herself very remarkable for her beauty. Pliny tells us, that he saw her adorned with a prodigious quantity of pearls and emeralds, which had formerly belonged to her grand-father M. Lollius (31).

all who came to offer their vows to them. He enlarged his palace, and brought one wing of it close to the temple of those two fabulous deities, which he altered to the form of a portico, that the gods themselves, as he used to say, might serve him in quality of porters. He frequently changed his godhead, being one day a male deity, and another a female; sometimes Jupiter, at other times Mars; sometimes Neptune or Apollo, and sometimes Venus, &c. But above all, he liked to be called Jupiter, the head and chief of the Pagan deities; and that he might be esteemed a true Jupiter, he had inventions to imitate thunder and lightning; and when the thunder was supposed to fall, he used to throw a stone against heaven, with the impious defiance in Homer; Do you take me from hence, or I'll take you. He often went to the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and, placing himself by his statue, sometimes whispered to it, then laid his ear close to it, as it were to receive an answer. Sometimes he seemed to be very angry with Jupiter, and was once heard to tell him in a threatening style, that he would send him back into Greece (M). At length being overcome by the importunity of the gods, as he foolishly gave out, who desired his company, he joined his palace to the capitol by an arch built over the temple of Augustus; and some time after, that he might yet be nearer, he laid the foundations of a new house in the court of the capitol. At length his pride, folly, and impiety carried him so far, that he would have a temple for himself, which he built at a vast charge, and dedicated to his own divinity, placing in it his statue in gold, done to the life, and every day cloathed in the same robes which he himself wore. He likewise instituted priests and priestesses to officiate in his new temple, the greatest and richest men in Rome, so great was their debasement at this time, purchasing the infamous priesthood with vast sums; for Caius sold it at such an extravagant price, that his uncle Claudius, not having wherewithal to discharge the debt, eight millions of sesterces, says Suetonius, which he contracted on that occasion, was obliged to surrender all his effects to his creditors, who publicly sold them by auction. The sacrifices, which his priests daily offered him, were peacocks, pheasants, Numidian hens, &c. And as though his other follies were not sufficiently extravagant, he became at last priest to himself, and admitted to the same dignity his wife Cæsonia, whom he married the year following; and also his horse, the most proper priest of all for such a deity. Besides the temple which he built to himself in his palace, the senate decreed him another, which was begun in this, and ended in the following, year. He ordered a temple to be erected to his godhead at Miletus, which might serve for all Asia; and because it was not finished at the time he expected, he commanded a magnificent temple, which that community was building in honour of Apollo, to be consecrated to himself. All nations, people, and cities, erected temples and altars to this new divinity, sacrificed victims, and swore by his name. But none were more forward in paying him this impious worship, than the inhabitants of Alexandria. The Jews alone, who were very numerous in that city, refused to bend their knees to the new idol, which brought upon them that cruel persecution from the Alexandrians, which we have described in our history of that nation. The distressed Jews dispatched ambassadors to Rome to lay

to be transported to Rome. We are told, that the ship, which was building for that purpose, was burnt by lightning; and that as often as the workmen attempted to remove the statue, a great noise was heard, like that of persons deriding their attempt. Memmius Regulus, governor of Greece, who was charged to see the celebrated statue conveyed to Rome, wrote to Caius, acquainting him, that he could not obey his commands on account of some extraordinary prodigies, and because the workmen assured him, that if once removed, it would fall to pieces. Hereupon, in the transport of his rage, he abused and threatened Jupiter for daring to oppose his sovereign will, and would have put to death Memmius, had he not been first put to death himself (34).

lay their sufferings before Caius, and beg his protection. At the head of this embassy was Philo, who gives us a very particular account of it, as we shall do from him.

THE following year, Caius resumed the fasces, having for his colleague Lucius Apronius Cæfianus (N), but held them only thirty days¹. When he entered upon his consulship, and also when he resigned it, he took the usual oaths, like a private citizen; but while he thus affected popularity, he filled the city with blood and slaughter, causing those very persons, who had been imprisoned by Tiberius, and by himself set at liberty, to be dragged to prison again, and executed for the pretended crimes with which they had been charged in the former reign². The people not assisting at the shews, which he exhibited almost every day, with the assiduity he expected, he commanded the public granaries to be shut up, with a design to starve them, and laid hold of all opportunities that offered to do them what mischief he could. Once in particular he caused them all to be driven by his guards out of the circus, on which occasion great numbers of the common people were crushed to death in the throng, and above twenty knights, and as many women of distinction. At another time, because they did not declare for the gladiators whom he favoured, he caused the sails, which covered the amphitheatre, to be taken down; and having thus exposed them to the scorching heat of the sun, he threatened with present death such as should offer to stir³. Nay, the acclamations of the people in the theatre differing one day from his, he uttered the inhuman wish, that the whole Roman people had but one neck, that he might dispatch them all at a blow. He often wished for some great calamity, as if the monster himself had not been curse and calamity enough. He envied Augustus the happiness of an army massacred, and Tiberius the sad disaster at Fidenæ, where fifty thousand persons were maimed, or perished, by the fall of an amphitheatre. In short, declaring himself an open enemy to his people, he often made use of the expression of the old tragedian: Oderint dum metuant; Let them hate me as much as they please, so they do but fear me. On the other hand, the people considering him no longer as their lawful sovereign, but as their implacable enemy, one day, to be re-

vengeed on him, rising up, abandoned the shews, which he was exhibiting at an immense charge; which piqued him to such a degree, that he immediately left Rome and retired to Campania, whence he did not return to the city till the feast of his sister

Drusilla, which he solemnized with extraordinary magnificence⁴. Historians this year take notice of the foolish regard he paid to one of his horses, named Incitatus, whom he often invited to his table, fed with gilt oats, and presented with the most delicious wines in cups of gold. His stable was all of marble, his manger of ivory, his collar of pearls, and his coverings of rich purple. He appointed him a great number of attendants, and supplied him with furniture no less magnificent than his own, that he might receive and entertain, in a manner suitable to his rank, such as came to wait upon him; for he was a member of the college of Caius's priests, and colleague to Claudius, to Cæsonia, and to the chief nobility of Rome; nay the emperor designed to raise him to the consulship, and would have honoured him, as was commonly believed, with that dignity, if he had lived longer⁵.

Caius had hitherto disapproved of Tiberius's conduct, and seemed to be greatly pleased with the invectives that were uttered against him. But this year, coming one day to the senate, he told the conscript fathers, that he, who was emperor, might well censure the measures of his predecessor; but that it seemed very strange to him, that they should presume to find fault with one who had governed them as their lord and sovereign. You inveigh against him, said he, as a tyrant, for having put many worthy citizens to death, without reflecting that you yourselves are involved in the same guilt, since he caused none to be executed, who had not been first convicted by your ^a evidence, and condemned by your decrees. Since you honoured him so much during his life, it ill becomes you thus to insult his memory after his death. Your conduct shews me what I may expect from you when I am gone. Having said many things to this purpose, in the end he upbraided the senate as the creatures and dependents of Sejanus, as the betrayers of his mother and brothers, as a herd of mean-spirited slaves and flatterers, and concluded with introducing Tiberius, addressing him in the following terms: You have said nothing, O Caius, but what I have by long experience found to be true; despise them therefore as unworthy of your esteem and affection, and use them with all the severity they deserve. They all hate you in their hearts, wish for your death, and will assassinate you, if they can with impunity. ^b Lay aside therefore all hopes of winning their affections, despise their impotent rage, and employ all your thoughts about your own safety: whatever most conduces to that, is most just and equitable. By this means you will have nothing to fear, you will enjoy your pleasures in safety, and at the same time be honoured by them; for they have not the courage to oppose you. If you study to gain their affections, you may perhaps acquire an empty reputation, which will die with you; but must resign your power, which will offer them an opportunity of attempting upon your life, and destroying you; for the yoke of sovereignty is ever grating; a prince is honoured so long as he is dreaded; when he is not feared, he is despised; and woe to that prince, whose subjects are more powerful than he¹. Caius having thus spoke, revived the ^c law of treason, and withdrawing from the senate, retired forthwith into the country. The senators, thunder-struck with such an unexpected speech, and in the utmost consternation on account of the dangers that threatened them; for who had not exclaimed against Tiberius? were not capable of coming to any resolution that day; but the following long speeches were made in commendation of so merciful, so gracious a prince, who after such just and well deserved reproaches, had been so generous as not to exert his vengeance: they enacted a decree, ordering the day, on which he made this memorable speech, to be yearly solemnized with victims and sacrifices as a festival; and heaped innumerable other honours upon a prince, who had given such glaring instances of his clemency and good-nature. One would think that such praises must have passed for ^d satire and mockery. But ambition is a credulous passion: Caius was highly pleased with such honours and praises; but nevertheless put afterwards many of those to death, who had spoken ill of Tiberius, though he hated all who spoke well of him^m.

(N) Cæfianus held the consulship till July, with Sanvinus, or rather Sanquinius Maximus, governor of Rome, who had been substituted to Caius. Sanquinius had been likewise consul under Tiberius, but in what year we find no-where recorded (58). Cn. Domitius Corbulo was also consul at this time, from the first of July, as is commonly believed (59), to the fourth or second of September, when Caius ignominiously deposed both consuls (60). Corbulo's colleague was so affected with the affront, that he laid violent hands on himself, and Caius named in his room Domitius Afer, a celebrated orator (61).

^e Caius builds a bridge upon the sea. THIS year is also remarkable for the famous work which Caius undertook at Puteoli: it is difficult to determine which was greater, the folly or the extravagancy of the attempt. To shew his power and greatness, and that he was able to walk upon the sea as well as the land, he caused an infinite number of ships to be gathered together in all parts, and a great many new ones to be built, which were all brought into the bay of Baiæ and Puteoli in Campania. There from the point of Baiæ to the opposite shore of Puteoli they were placed in two rows in the form of a crescent, being fastened and moored together with anchors, chains, and cables. So many ships were employed in this foolish undertaking, that none being left to convey corn to Rome, the city was greatly distressed by famine, which continued to the reign of *Claudius*ⁿ, and, to the great satisfaction of Caius, swept off daily great numbers of the people. Seneca tells us, that when Caius was killed, there was not sufficient corn in the public granaries to maintain the people eight days longerⁿ. When the ships were well fastened and secured, vast quantities of large planks and boards were laid over them, and covered with earth. Then to make this stupendous work the more magnificent and surprizing, he sent for an infinite number of artificers and workmen, who, at an immense charge and with incredible expedition, Caius punishing the least remissness with present death, built houses and convenient inns on the bridge for the reception of the emperor and his numerous retinue. Into these public houses was conveyed fresh water in pipes from the land, Caius taking delight in such things only, as to others seemed impossible. When this wonderful work was completed, Caius repaired to it with all the great lords of Rome, being attended by immense crouds of people, who flocked from every quarter to behold this mighty pomp. Upon his arrival at Baiæ he offered solemn sacrifices to the gods, especially to Envy, lest the other deities should be touched with jealousy in seeing their glory eclipsed by his. ^f Then

Then proudly adorned with magnificent robes of gold; and armed with the breast-plate of Alexander the Great, having a civic crown on his head, accompanied with the great officers of his army and all the nobility of Rome, he mounted on horseback, and entering upon the bridge at Baiæ, rid with an awful majesty to Puteoli. There he resided the remaining part of the day, and the following night, when with an infinite number of torches, lanthorns, and other lights placed in different parts of the work, the sea, the neighbouring mountains, and the shore, were illuminated to a vast distance, Caligula boasting, that he had turned the night into day, as well as the sea into land. The next day he appeared in the habit peculiar to the charioteers in the circus, and in a chariot drawn by two stately horses, being attended by young Darius, the Parthian hostage, a squadron of his guards, in bright armour, and a great train of his friends, magnificently attired; and likewise in their chariots; he set out on his return to Baiæ, but halted about the middle of the bridge; and there, ascending a magnificent throne, made a solemn oration in praise of his own exploit in riding so many miles upon the sea, and of the pains and care taken by his soldiers and workmen, among whom he distributed large rewards. He spent all the day and the next night in this place, revelling and banquetting with his friends; and when he began to be heated with wine, that he might perform some memorable action before he left his bridge, he all on a sudden caused great numbers of people to be thrown into the sea without distinction of friend or foe, noble or ignoble; and when they attempted to climb up into the vessels, he ordered them to be thrust off; so that many perished, tho' the far greater part saved themselves, however drunk, by swimming, the sea proving extremely calm and smooth the whole time, which Caius foolishly ascribed to the respect Neptune had for him as a more powerful deity^p. After this Caius returned to Rome, and entered the city in triumph, for having overcome, as he boasted, nature itself. Upon his departure, the bridge, as Dion Cassius seems to insinuate^q, was immediately broke down, and the ships employed in it restored to the owners. In such wild and useless attempts did Caius squander away in the space of two years, besides his ordinary revenues, the immense treasure left by Tiberius, amounting to eighteen millions of our money. As to the motive, which prompted him to such an extravagant undertaking, authors are not agreed (O).

Causes many persons to be thrown into the sea.

Caius having by this and many other extravagancies exhausted and drained his exchequer, he betook himself to all manner of rapine, inventing such kinds of penalties, confiscations, and imposts, as had never before been heard of. He would not allow any one to be legally a citizen of Rome, whose grant ran in the following terms; To him and his posterity, unless he was his son, pretending that the word posterity did not extend beyond that degree; so that most of the Roman citizens were obliged to purchase their freedom anew. He declared the wills void of all, from the beginning of Tiberius's reign, who had not named either that prince or himself amongst their heirs. Hereupon several persons named him in their wills amongst their friends and children, which he knowing, caused them under several pretences to be put to death, that he might receive his share the sooner; nay, he was heard once to say, that it was a great presumption in them to live, and keep him out of his inheritance. No commodity whatever, not even the necessaries of life, were exempt from some tax or other. For all actions at law, in what place soever commenced, he exacted the fortieth part of the thing in controversy, and laid heavy fines on such as were convicted either of compounding, or dropping the suit. He enacted a law, injoining all artificers, labourers, porters, carriers, &c. to pay into the exchequer the eighth part of their daily gains. Every prostitute was obliged to pay a certain portion of what she

(O) Some write, that he built this bridge in imitation of Xerxes, who laid a wonderful one over the Hellepont, as we have related in our history of Persia. Others say, that being then upon the point of invading Germany and Britain, he designed to terrify them with the report of some extraordinary work. But Suetonius tells us, that when he was but a boy, he was informed by his grandfather, that Caius had been put upon this undertaking by certain astrological predictions of the celebrated Thrasyllus, who, finding Tiberius unresolved as to his successor, yet more inclined to his own grandson, than to Caius, told him, It was as hard a matter for Caius to be emperor, as it was for him to ride over the gulph of Baiæ. Suetonius's grandfather lived under Caius, and had this intelligence from persons who were in high favour with him (62).

he earned; nay, he was not ashamed to turn his own palace into a brothel-house, maintaining there great numbers of prostitutes, and sending his officers to invite people of all ranks to his diversions. He received the money himself of such as came, and ordered his officers to enter their names in his books, as of persons well affected to Cæsar. He likewise encouraged gaming-houses, frequenting them himself; nay, at last he appointed an apartment in his own palace for gamesters, and there spent great part of his time. We are told, that one day, in the midst of his game, observing two Roman knights of great estates accidentally passing by, he immediately went down, caused both to be apprehended, and their estates to be confiscated; and then returning with joy to his game, boasted, that he had never had a better throw. Another time wanting money for his stake, he went down, and caused several noble-men to be put to death; then returning told the company, that while they sat playing for small sums, he had won six hundred thousand sesterces. He used frequently to expose to sale the effects of the condemned persons, and oblige the rich citizens to buy them at the price he was pleased to set upon them; which was so high, that many noble families were by that means reduced to poverty. He forced, not to mention others, a wealthy citizen, by name Apollonius Saturninus, to pay nine millions of sesterces for thirteen gladiators, whom he exposed to sale with all the furniture of the amphitheatre. A daughter being born to him about this time, he complained publicly of his poverty, not only as an emperor, but as a father; but applied to his own use all the presents and contributions made by the people for the education and portion of the child. The law of majesty, which he revived, proved an inexhaustible fund for the increasing of his revenues. Dion Cassius enumerates a great many worthy citizens, who were put to death, for no other crime but their great wealth; and tells us, that one Junius Priscus, prætor, who had been condemned and executed under colour of some other crime, being found after his death possessed but of a small estate, the emperor cried out, I have been imposed upon; Junius was not guilty (P). Lucius Vitellius, governor of Syria, had acquired great wealth in that province, and besides, his great power, and the reputation he had gained amongst the soldiery, gave Caius no small uneasiness, who thereupon recalled him with a design to put him to death, under pretence, that through his negligence the Parthians had driven Tiridates from

(P) Dion Cassius tells us in this place how Domitius Afer escaped condemnation. He was, says Tacitus (63), more famous for his eloquence than his integrity. He had been under Tiberius a zealous accuser, and acted that part against Claudia Pulchra, an intimate friend and cousin to Agrippina, as we have related above. It was not, however, this that provoked Caius against him, but his being esteemed the most eloquent orator of his age, which glory Caius thought due to himself; and therefore resolved to rid himself of the only person who disputed it with him. Domitius erected this year a statue to the emperor with an inscription, importing, that he was consul the second time in the twenty-seventh year of his age. This he meant as a compliment; but Caius, who wanted a pretence to destroy him, pretended, that he thereby reproached him with his youth, and a violation of the laws, forbidding any one to be raised to the consular dignity at that age. He therefore took upon him to accuse him himself, and delivered in the senate a long speech, which he had composed against him. Domitius, instead of answering it, which, without all doubt, would have cost him his life, extolled the eloquence of the speaker, admired the propriety of his expressions, repeated the most remarkable passages, giving them their due weight, and pointing out their beauties, &c. When he was ordered to make his defence, instead of answering the emperor's oration, he threw himself at his feet, acknowledged him for his master in eloquence, and declared, that he despised life after he was thus bereaved of the glory on which he piqued himself, of being esteemed the best orator of his age. Caius was so well pleased with this pretended submission, that he not only forgave him, but raised him that very year to the consulate. Calixtus, one of Caius's freedmen, whom Domitius had gained, and who had proved very serviceable to him on this occasion, having one day made use of the liberty which Caius allowed him to complain of the bitter invectives, which he had uttered against one, whom he knew to be free from all guilt, the emperor returned him this answer; Would you have had me to lose so fine a discourse (64)? Philo places in this year the massacre of the exiles, and tells us, that Caius, not being able one night to take any rest, being haunted, as it frequently happened, with inward horrors, he began to think, that the banished persons were too happy, that they lived in ease and tranquillity, and wanted neither the necessaries nor conveniences of life. Hereupon concluding with himself, that it was not reasonable criminals should enjoy any happiness, as soon as day appeared, he made a list of the most eminent persons amongst them, and dispatched officers with orders to put them all to death, which occasioned an universal mourning among the most illustrious families of Rome. At the head of this black list was Flaccus, who had been governor of Egypt, and confined a few months before to the island of Andros (65). Eusebius fixes this cruel execution to the last year of Caius's reign (66); but Philo places it before the disgrace of Lepidus, which happened this year (67).

from the kingdom of Armenia, which had been given him by Tiberius. Vitellius was a man of good talents and qualifications, had eminently distinguished himself in the army, and in the government of provinces, says Tacitus ^f, exercised the integrity of a primitive Roman. But his dread of Caligula changed him into a contemptible slave, and he is handed down to posterity as a pattern of the most infamous flattery. For the first time Caius deigned to admit him to his presence, he appeared before him in a modest dress, and accosted him with the same ceremonies that were practised by the Romans, when they approached their gods, that is, having his head covered with a veil, turning himself round, and then falling down prostrate before him ^g. Caius was so taken with this unexpected behaviour, that he not only forgave him, but thenceforth numbered him amongst his most intimate friends. For he was the first who introduced amongst the Romans the custom of approaching the emperors, as the Parthians and other eastern nations did their monarchs ^h. We shall have occasion to relate in the course of this history other instances of his slavish spirit, and servile submission. He was succeeded in the government of Syria by P. Petronius, of whom hereafter. We are told, that Seneca was about this time in imminent danger of losing his life for no other crime, but having pleaded a cause in the senate with great eloquence, and universal applause. This Caius, who was present, and pretended to be the best orator of his age, could not bear, and would therefore have dispatched him, had he not been assured by one of his courtesans, that Seneca was infected with a distemper, which would soon corrupt his body, and put an end to his life (Q) ^w.

THE last of August, being his birth-day, the consuls forgot to warn the people to observe it as a festival; which incensed Caius to such a degree, that on the second of September he deposed them, and caused their rods to be broken. This proved so sensible a mortification to them, that one of them, not able to brook it, laid violent hands on himself. The pretence, which Caius took for thus stripping them ignominiously of their dignity, was, their observing the second of September, the anniversary of the battle of Actium, as a festival. This indeed was customary; but the emperor, who was descended from Augustus by his mother Agrippina, and from Antony by his grandmother Antonia, told his friends beforehand, that the consuls could not avoid giving him on that day a favourable pretence to revenge the late affront, either by omitting to celebrate the victory of Augustus, or by solemnizing the defeat of Antony ^x. Accordingly, the consuls having, according to custom, celebrated with the usual ceremonies the anniversary of the Actiac victory, they were the same day deposed by Caius's orders, under pretence that they had solemnized not so much the victory of Augustus, as the defeat of his great grandfather Antony. The city was then three days without consuls, that is, the third, fourth and fifth of September ^y; but on the sixth, Domitius Afer and another, whose name has not been transmitted to us, were nominated to that dignity. After this Caius forbade the boasted victories gained by Augustus in Sicily and at Actium to be solemnized for the future, saying, that they had proved tragical and calamitous to the Roman people, though at the same time he gave out, that his mother Agrippina was not the daughter of Agrippa, but of Augustus by his own daughter Julia. Thus he chose rather to asperse the memory of his great grandfather, and owe his birth to an abominable incest, than derive his pedigree from Agrippa, who was not of an illustrious descent (R) ^z. Dion Cassius

(Q) Caius despised the eloquence of Seneca, tho' then in great vogue, calling his writings Sand without lime. Caius himself was no mean orator, had a great fluency and command of words, especially when he declaimed against any one; and such a clear voice and distinct pronouncation, that he was heard at a great distance. He took great delight in writing answers to such orators as had performed with applause. He often pleaded in the senate for or against such persons of distinction as were accused, not being governed therein by friendship or enmity, but by the subject; for he was ready to accuse a friend, or defend an enemy, according as he thought the subject most proper to display his eloquence. When he declaimed, he constantly invited, by a public proclamation, the knights to hear him, who never failed to applaud him; and indeed he well deserved their applause, for though he undervalued the other liberal arts, he studied eloquence with great application, and spoke very pertinently, especially in accusing (68).

(R) He used to speak very contemptuously, not only of Agrippa, but of his great grandmother Livia Augusta, calling her Ulysses stolatum, that is, in our language, an Ulysses in petticoats. In a letter to the senate, he reflected on her pedigree, pretending that Aufidius Lingo, her grandfather by the mother, was but a common decurio at Fundi, though it appeared from the public records, that he had discharged very considerable offices at Rome (69).

Prepares for His march.

His fright and consternation.

His exploits.

Cassius observes in this place, that Caius being jealous of the power and courage of L. Piso, proconsul of Africa, and probably the son of that Piso, who was supposed to have poisoned Germanicus, took from him and his successors the command of the legion quartered there, and the Numidian auxiliaries, and gave it to a lieutenant. These lieutenants, by degrees, became more powerful than the proconsuls, and were in after-ages styled Counts of Africa^a. This regulation was introduced, according to Tacitus^b, one or two years before, while M. Silanus was proconsul of Africa. It is not easy, nor indeed of any importance, to decide, which of these two writers may be in the right.

TOWARDS the end of the year, Caius undertook an expedition into Gaul, under colour of opposing the Germans, who were said to have committed some hostilities; but his real motive was to plunder that wealthy province, and likewise Spain, after he had with extravagant tributes and taxes quite drained Italy. He never mentioned this design, till going one day to Mevania, at a small distance from Rome, to see the celebrated river and forest of Clitumnus, he was advised to complete the number of the Batavians, who were then his guards. Upon this he took a fancy to make war upon the Germans, and, without farther deliberation, ordered a great number of legions and auxiliaries to be drawn together, new levies to be made with great diligence, and a prodigious quantity of provisions to be got ready. His orders being executed with surprising expedition, he immediately began his march, moving sometimes with such haste, that the prætorian cohorts were obliged, which had never before been practised, to have their standards brought after them on their sumpter-horses; at other times so slowly, that he seemed to walk only for his diversion. He was carried the best part of the way in a litter on eight mens shoulders, having sent before messengers, commanding the neighbouring cities to have their high-ways well swept and watered, that he might not be troubled with dust. He was attended in this mock expedition by Herod king of Batanea and Trachonitis, and by Antiochus king of Comagene, and followed by a long train of gladiators, comedians, buffoons, loose women, &c. with whom he spent his whole time^c. When he arrived at the place, where the legions were encamped that guarded the banks of the Rhine, he reviewed his forces, which amounted to two hundred, or two hundred and fifty thousand men. To acquire the reputation of a severe and strict observer of military discipline, he dismissed with ignominy and disgrace several old officers, who had served their time, pretending that they were unfit for the service, but in reality to exempt himself from the obligation of paying them the rewards due to veterans^d. He passed the Rhine, but after advancing a few miles into the country, he returned without having killed or even seen a single enemy, though one would have judged from his mighty preparations, that he would have over-run the whole country, Tacitus tells us, that one Brinio or Brenno, prince of the Caninefates, ridiculed with impunity this foolish expedition of Caius^e. And indeed, well he might; for while he, who had threatened the barbarians with utter destruction, was passing in his chariot through a narrow lane, and his troops were forced to break their ranks on account of the narrowness of the place, one happening to say, that great would be their confusion, if the enemy should appear, he immediately threw himself out of his chariot, mounted on horseback, and flew back to the bridges with a design to repass the river; but finding them crowded with the servants and baggage of the army, he made them hand him from one to another, and convey him over their heads, thinking he could not too soon get out of the enemy's country^f. Being afterwards recovered from his fright, and well assured that there was nothing to fear, he caused some of his German guards to cross the Rhine, and after having concealed themselves for some time in a neighbouring forest, to rise out of their ambuscade in a great tumult and hurry; that upon the alarm, which this would occasion, word might be brought him, that the enemy was at hand; which being done accordingly, the mock hero, starting up from his dinner, and putting himself at the head of a party of the prætorian horse, hastened to oppose the enemy, and advancing to the forest, there spent the remaining part of the day in cutting down trees to erect trophies for so signal a victory. Upon his return he reproached with cowardice those who had not followed him, but rewarded such as had borne with him the brunt of the day with a new sort of crowns, which, to distinguish them from all others, he called exploratorie. But this expedition, however glorious and successful, not satisfying his martial ardor, he resolved to signalize himself by some other still more noble achievement. With this view he ordered some children whom he kept as hostages, to be privately conveyed away, and word to be brought him that they had made their escape; upon which he immediately mounted on horseback, pursued the supposed fugitives with a detachment of cavalry, and brought them back loaded with chains. After these noble achievements, he wrote a letter to the senate, complaining of them and the people, for indulging themselves in banquets, pleasures, and diversions, while Cæsar was fighting, and exposed for their safety to so many perils and hazards. But the most glorious of all his exploits was his receiving under his protection Adminius, who being banished by his father Cynobelinus, one of the kings of Britain, fled to him with a small retinue. This seemed to him so memorable an action, that he immediately wrote boasting letters to the senate, as if he had subdued the whole island, strictly injoining the messengers to ride directly through the forum to the palace, and not to deliver his letters to the consuls, but in the presence of the senate assembled in the temple of Mars. In the mean time he caused himself to be seven times proclaimed emperor by his victorious troops on the banks of the Rhine.

THE Gauls would have reckoned themselves happy, had he done them no more harm, than he did the enemy. But his avarice, equal to his prodigality, prompted him to harass and oppress that unhappy nation with such extortions, as reduced even the most wealthy to beggary. Not satisfied with the great presents, which he obliged both the cities and particular persons to make him, he caused the most wealthy men in the province, though free from all guilt, to be accused of treason, that he might seize their estates, which he sold in person, obliging others to purchase them at the price he thought fit to put upon them. Having one day lost at dice an immense sum, he caused the registers, which served for the census, to be brought to him; and writing a list of those who possessed the greatest estates in the province, ordered them to be immediately put to death, and seized all their effects.

ABOUT this time, was discovered a conspiracy against Caius; but whether it was real, or only supposed, is still uncertain (S). Lentulus and Lepidus were said to be at the head of it. Cneius Lentulus Getulicus had commanded the legions in Higher Germany for the space, of ten years, Tiberius not daring to remove him, as we have related in the history of that prince's reign. But he was doomed to death by Caius, says Dion, for no other crime, but because he was greatly beloved by the soldiery on account of his clemency and good-nature. Some monuments have reached our times of the sacrifices which were offered on the twenty-seventh of October, by way of thanksgiving for the happy discovery, says the inscription, of the wicked designs of Cn. Lentulus Getulicus. His employment was given to Sulpicius Galba, afterwards emperor, who, the next day after his arrival in the camp, gave signal instances of his zeal for military discipline, of which more in his reign. M. Æmilius Lepidus is supposed to have been the son of Julia, Augustus's granddaughter, and sister to Agrippina the mother of Caius, who nevertheless condemned him as guilty of treason, and charged a tribune, by name Decimus, to cut off his head (T). At the same time, he condemned his two sisters, Agrippina and Livilla, or Julia, as guilty of adultery with Lepidus, and privy to the conspiracy; and confined them to the island of Pontia, adding with threats, That he had swords as well as islands. After this he wrote a letter to the senate, acquainting them that he had escaped a dangerous conspiracy, and inveighing with great bitterness against his sisters, whom he was not ashamed to charge with most infamous crimes. He sent three was admitted by the emperor to the great employments five years before the age prescribed by the laws; nay, we are told, that Caius promised to name him for his successor. But Lepidus, notwithstanding the kindness shewn him by the emperor, debauched his two sisters Agrippina and Livilla, or Julia, hoping, as was supposed, by his familiarity with them, to raise himself to the empire.

three daggers to Rome to be consecrated there to Mars the avenger, with an inscription, importing, that they had been designed for his destruction; and obliged Agrippina to carry from Gaul to Rome the urn with the bones of Lepidus. He sold all the furniture, jewels, slaves, and even the freedmen of his sisters, after their condemnation. As he degraded himself to sell them in person, he put his own price upon them, and obliged the Gauls to purchase them. This kind of traffick proving very advantageous, he ordered the rich furniture of the imperial palace, with the robes of Marc Antony, of Augustus, of his mother Agrippina, and others of the imperial family, to be sent him from Rome, and sold them in the same manner. So many carriages and beasts of burden were employed in conveying the furniture of the imperial palace from Italy to Gaul, that no horses being found to turn the mills, according to the custom of those times, the city was reduced to great straits for want of bread^b. But, notwithstanding the immense and almost incredible sums, he raised by these sales, he still wanted money, being no less boundless in his prodigality (U), than iniquitous in his extortions.

New honours decreed him by the senate.

WHEN the death of Lepidus and Getulicus was known at Rome, Flavius Vespasianus, then prætor, and afterwards emperor, who studied to insinuate himself by any means into the emperor's favour, was for throwing the bodies of the conspirators into the Tiber, and depriving them of the honour of sepulture. Neither did the senate omit so favourable an opportunity of heaping new honours upon the prince; amongst others they decreed him an ovation, and deputed his uncle Claudius, with several other persons of the first rank drawn by lot, to go into Gaul, and congratulate him in their name upon the discovery of so dangerous a conspiracy, and the deserved vengeance he had taken on the conspirators. But Caius, not satisfied with the honours decreed him, especially with an ovation, and complaining of the small number of the deputies, ordered some of them to return even before they entered Gaul, as if they had been spies, and received the others with great coldness. He chiefly resented their sending his uncle, as if he were a child, and wanted a governor. He did not, however, send him back, but treated him in a most ignominious manner^p; nay, we are told, that he caused him to be thrown into a river the moment he arrived^q. After this the senate decreed him greater honours, and sent him a more numerous deputation; which he received with great marks of satisfaction, and even went out to meet the deputies

(U) In luxury, says Suetonius (28), and extravagance, he far outdid all the prodigals of his age. He used baths of sweet oils with the most costly perfumes that could be purchased. At his entertainments he often caused the largest pearls to be dissolved in vinegar, to display his grandeur and magnificence. Sometimes to divert himself with his guests, he caused empty dishes of pure gold to be served up, which he distributed among them, saying, that at Cæsar's table their bread and meat must be nothing but gold. For several days together he took delight in throwing down from the top of a tower considerable sums among the people. He built certain galleys of cedar, having the sterns, which were of ivory, adorned with precious stones. the sails of various silks, the cabins and galleries spacious and convenient, with great variety of vines and fruit-trees, under the shade of which he often dined, coasting along the shore of Campania, with great pomp and splendor, being entertained by the mixed melody of voices, and all sorts of instruments. In all his buildings he considered nothing but his own particular fancy, and thought nothing answerable to his grandeur, but what to others seemed impossible. He raised pillars and towers in the sea, cut his way through rocks of the most impenetrable flint, levelled mountains, raised plains and vallies, &c. (29). Josephus observes, that he never undertook any thing worthy of a prince, that is, useful to the public, except an harbour, which he began in the neighbourhood of Rhegium for the convenience and safety of the ships, which conveyed corn from Alexandria to Italy; but this he left unfinished (30). Suetonius (31) enumerates several works, which he undertook, but none of any use to the public, except a fine aqueduct, which Claudius finished fourteen years after. Frontinus mentions another aqueduct amongst the works of Caius, but upon what authority we know not. He caused an obelisk to be brought out of Egypt, which Suetonius (32) calls the great obelisk, and placed it in the circus on mount Vatican. The ship, in which it was conveyed to Rome, was the finest and largest that had ever appeared on the sea till Pliny's time, who tells us, that four men could scarce fathom the mast of this extraordinary vessel (33). He designed to rebuild the palace of Polycrates at Samos, to finish the temple of Apollo Didymæus at Miletus, and to found a new city on the top of the Alps; but his favourite project was to cut the isthmus of Corinth, and open a communication between those two seas; in which undertaking he was attended with no better success than those who attempted it after him (34). Seneca mentions an immense sum expended by him in one banquet (35); and Pliny speaks of a splendid and costly entertainment, which he gave to fifteen guests in the hollow of a plane-tree, framed in the form of a room (36).

^a deputies. In the mean time, prosecutions were carried on at Rome against the friends of Caius's sisters, and of those who had been executed for the late conspiracy. Several ædiles and prætors were obliged to lay down their employments, and appear before the senate in the habit of criminals. Among the rest Sophronius Tigellinus, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the reign of Nero, was banished for a criminal correspondence with Agrippina. These proceedings terrified the senate, who apprehended still greater evils from a prince, who was cruel by nature, and gave ear, as was supposed, to the pernicious counsels of the kings Agrippa and Antiochus.

Caius, after the condemnation of his sisters, divorced his wife Lollia Paulina to ^{He marries} marry Milonia Cæsonia, who was neither beautiful nor young, being already the mother ^{Cæsonia.} of three children by another husband, who was still alive. She had, however, a particular talent and address in gaining the affections of all with whom she conversed; insomuch, that Caius loved her intirely, and lived longer with her than any other (W)^f. He married her, according to Suetonius, the same day that she was delivered of a daughter, declaring himself her husband, and the father of the child^e. But Dion says, that he married her about a month before her delivery^u. To the child he gave the name of Julia Drusilla, carried her to the temples of all the goddesses in Rome, and put her into the arms of Minerva, as if to that powerful goddess he committed the care of her education^w. He laid her likewise at the feet of Jupiter Capitolinus, saying, that she was common to him and Jupiter, and leaving all men to judge which of her parents was the greatest, from which she derived the more noble origin^x. But nothing more assured Caius, that she was his daughter, for her mother was not renowned for her chastity, than her natural fierceness, of which she soon gave sufficient indications, by scratching and tearing the faces of the little children who played with her^y. Upon her birth Caius complained of his poverty, as we have hinted ^{His meanness.} above, and obliged the people to contribute large sums for the educating and marrying her suitable to her rank, which he applied to his own use. He likewise declared by an edict, that on the first of January he intended to receive new-year's gifts, which he did accordingly, standing in the porch of his palace, while the people and nobility with full hands and laps poured out their presents before him^z. Augustus had formerly received new-year's gifts, according to the Roman custom, but not out of covetousness, as Caius, who is said to have had such a passion for money, that his chief delight was to walk bare-foot, and even roll himself upon heaps of gold, which he had accumulated by all manner of rapine^a.

THIS year, the Germans, having no doubt drawn together their forces to oppose Galba ^{Galba defeats} Caius, made upon his departure an inroad into Gaul; but were repulsed by Galba with ^{the Germans.} such vigor and expedition, that Caligula could not forbear commending and rewarding both him and his troops, though he generally used out of jealousy and envy, to discountenance such of his officers as had gained any considerable advantage over the enemy. Caius, who was then in Gaul, assumed the whole glory of this action to himself, and acquainted the senate with it by a letter, which he sent wrapt up in the branch of a laurel, the symbol of victory, boasting, that he had utterly defeated the enemy's numerous forces, and put them out of a condition of disturbing for the future the tranquillity of Gaul^b. Vespasian, then prætor, begged he might be allowed to exhibit extraordinary sports on occasion of so signal a victory^c (X). This year, Hered Antipas

(W) Cæsonia was daughter to Vestilia, who, if Pliny is to be credited (37), was delivered of two children in seven months time, of one in eleven, and of Cæsonia in eight. All these children lived, as the same writer observes, to a competent age, and enjoyed good health. Suetonius tells us, that Cæsonia gained and maintained the affections of Caius by her monstrous lewdness (38). After her husband's death, she was charged with having fixed his affection to her with an amorous potion, which affecting his brain, had disordered his understanding, and occa-

fioned that fury and madness which had brought so many calamities upon the state. Whether she administered to him any such potion, is uncertain; but this served as a pretence for the conspirators to dispatch both her and her daughter after the murder of Caius (39). Suetonius tells us, that the emperor often shewed her to his soldiers habited like them, and to his friends without any garments (40).

(X) On this occasion probably happened what we read in Suetonius, viz. that Caius, upon the news of the motions of the Germans, seized on all the ships he

pas banished.

Antipas was by Caius deprived of his tetrarchy of Galilee, which was given to king Agrippa, and banished to Lions, as Josephus writes in one place ^a, or sent into Spain, as he tells us in another ^c. Perhaps Caius, who came this year with Agrippa into Gaul, ordered him to remove from Lions to Spain, where he died. He had enjoyed his tetrarchy forty-eight years, during which time he built a new city in the most delightful spot of Galilee, which from Tiberius he named Tiberias. But of his actions and cause of his disgrace, we have spoken in our history of the Jews.

Sports exhi-
at Lions.

THE following year, Caius was consul without a colleague for the first twelve days, not designedly, but because he was not acquainted sooner with the death of the person who had been named for his colleague, and died at Rome a few days before he was to enter upon his office ^f. Caius began his third consulship at Lions, and it was ^b probably on that occasion, that he exhibited the magnificent sports described by Dion Cassius and Suetonius. At the same time, he ordained a solemn contention of eloquence, both in Greek and Latin, obliging those who were overcome to give rewards to their competitors, and to make some composition or other in their commendation. Those who gave no satisfaction at all were condemned to blot out with a sponge, and even with their tongues, what they had wrote, unless they chose rather to be whipt like school-boys, or to be thrown into the Rhone ^g. Hence an ancient poet, speaking of one who was in fear, says, that he trembled like an orator, ready to declaim at Lions before the altar of Augustus ^h. Of this altar at Lions, and the sports yearly exhibited there in honour of the deified Augustus, we have spoken in the history of his reign.

The murder of
of Mauritania.

Caius held the consulship only twelve days; and when news of his resignation was brought to Rome, two new consuls, probably Publicola and Nerva (Y), were nominated. The first decree they made was, that the anniversary of the death of Tiberius and Drusilla should be solemnized in the same manner, as that of Augustus. This distinction Caius had required in a letter to the new consuls ⁱ. As for Caius, he began the year with the murder of Ptolemy, king of Mauritania, and cousin-german to his father Germanicus (Z). He had invited him to his court, and received him at his arrival with great demonstrations of kindness; but observing one day, as he entered the theatre to behold the sports, that the lustre of his purple drew upon him the eyes ^d of the whole company, he caused him, no doubt out of jealousy, to be immediately arrested, condemned him to banishment, and privately ordered him to be massacred on his journey ^k. Dion Cassius ascribes his death to the great riches he possessed ^l. Be that as it will, the Mauritanians, upon the news of his death, revolted, being stirred up by Edemon, one of the deceased prince's freedmen, desirous to revenge the death of his master. The inhuman and imperious tyrant caused likewise Mitbridates king of Armenia to be arrested, but only condemned him to banishment. We shall have occasion to speak of this prince in the following reign.

Caius's memorable expedition against Britain.

Caius, before he left Gaul, gave out, that he designed to invade Britain, and accordingly ordered his troops from all quarters to march to the Gaulish shore opposite to that island. He soon came to the place of the rendezvous himself, and upon his arrival drew up his men along the coast, imbarqued on a magnificent galley, and having advanced a small way from the shore, returned suddenly, and, ascending his tribunal, ordered the warlike engines to be disposed in order and to the best advantage, he could get, in order to convey himself into the Levant, comforting himself with this thought, that he should keep his transmarine provinces, though the enemy possessed themselves of Italy and Rome itself, as the Senones had formerly done (41).

(Y) Onuphrius takes these two to be the consuls of this year, because S. Prosper marks them as the consuls of the foregoing year, when, according to the general opinion of the chronologers, that office was discharged by Caius Caesar and L. Apronius æsianus. The same writer pretends, that Sex. Nonius Celer and Junius Quintilianus, set down by Frontinus (42) as consuls between the years thirty-eight and forty-nine of the christian æra, bore that dignity from the first of July to the end of this year (43).

(Z) He was the son of Cleopatra Selene, daughter of Antony and the celebrated Cleopatra, as Germanicus was the son of Antonia, daughter to the same Antony. Juba, the father of Ptolemy, was first king of Mauritania, which Augustus made him exchange for part of Getulia, and the countries formerly possessed by Bocchus, that is, the two Mauritanias, the Tingitana and Cæsariana (44).

age, the trumpets to sound, and the signal of battle to be given. Neither soldiers nor officers could conceive what he had in view, till at length, all on a sudden he ordered them to gather the cockle-shells on the shore, and to fill with them their laps and head-pieces, saying, These are spoils of the conquered ocean, due to the palace, due to the capitol. Then, to reward his fellow-soldiers for so glorious a victory, he distributed among them a very considerable sum, bidding them be merry, and enjoy in safety the rewards of their valour; and that so glorious a conquest might never be forgot, he caused a high tower to be erected, according to the model of the Pharos at Alexandria, for setting up lights to direct ships at sea in the night^m. A modern writerⁿ will have the tower built on this occasion to be that which stands at the entry of the port of Boulogne, and is called by the natives la tour d'ordre.

AND now Caius thought of nothing but the preparations for a triumph due to his noble achievements. Accordingly he wrote to his officers at Rome, injoining them to get every thing ready for the most magnificent triumph that had ever been seen; but at the same time warning them, not to put him to any extraordinary expence; His folly and ambition. since every man's estate was at their disposal. Before he left Gaul, he chose the tallest men of that province, without distinction of rank or condition, to grace his triumph, giving them German names, and obliging them to learn that language, to let their hair grow and colour it red, that they might pass for Germans. He likewise commanded the galleys, in which he and his chief officers had put to sea, to be conveyed to Rome for most part of the way of land^o. Before he left Gaul, he took it in his head to put those legions to the sword that had mutinied after the death of Augustus, and in a manner besieged his father Germanicus and himself, then an infant. His officers, with the utmost difficulty, dissuaded him from cutting them all off; but His cruel design. could not by any means divert him from decimating them for a crime, which had been so many years before committed and forgiven. Notwithstanding the warm remonstrances of his friends and chief officers, he ordered them to assemble without arms to receive his commands. The legionaries, not suspecting in the least his design, readily obeyed, and, in the mean time, the cavalry began to surround them. This gave them some umbrage, and many of them slipped away to take their arms, with a design to sell their lives dear, in case any violence was offered them; which the coward no sooner perceived, than he dismissed the assembly and fled, making what haste he could to reach Rome, that he might vent his rage upon the senate, for the wrong he pretended they had done him by not decreeing him a triumph, though he had declared the year before, that they had no right to decree him any honours, and that he would punish them with the utmost severity, if they pretended to assume it^p. They chiefly were at a loss how to behave with respect to his pretended conquest of Britain. To compliment him on his victory, looked like mockery; on the other hand, they were told, that he spoke seriously of it as a noble exploit. What resolution they took in the end, we find no-where recorded. Suetonius only tells us, that they dispatched an embassy to him, consisting of the most considerable men of their order, intreating him to hasten his return to the city. The deputies met him on his journey towards Rome, not yet recovered from his late fright, and with the utmost submission presented their request to him in the name of their whole body. I will come, answered Caius, I will come, and bring this along with me; laying his hand on the hilt of his sword. He even declared by an edict, which he caused to be set up in the city, that he would return; but it should be only for the knights and people; as for the senate, he would for the future be to them neither a prince nor a citizen. As he drew near Rome, he forbid any of the senators to meet him. He would not, however, enter the city in triumph, but contented himself with an ovation, making his entry on the last of August, which was his birth-day, four months and some days before his death^q. From this time he resolved utterly to extirpate the senate, and would have put his wicked design in execution, had he not been prevented by death. In the four months he lived, he caused several senators of distinction to be inhumanly murdered, one in particular for no other crime, but because he begged leave to shut his eyes being commanded by him, though nothing was laid to his charge, to assist at the execution of his son^r. For the bloody and inhuman monster took great delight, as we have hinted above, in thus tormenting the most innocent parents. It was commonly reported, that he designed to cut off the most considerable men of the senatorial and equestrian Various instances of his cruelty.

equestrian order, and then remove the seat of the empire to Antium, and from thence to Alexandria. This report gained great credit after his death, when two books were found in his cabinet, one with the title of gladius, the sword, the other of pugio, the dagger, both containing the names of many eminent persons, whom he designed to destroy^f. These books were committed to the custody of Protogenes, one of the ministers of his cruelty^g. Besides these books was found a great chest filled with various sorts of poisons, which being by Claudius's orders thrown into the sea, infected the waters, and destroyed a vast quantity of fish^h. However, he was somewhat reconciled to the senate before his death on the following occasion: Protogenes, his chief favourite, coming one day unexpectedly into the senate under colour of delivering some message from the prince, and all the senators crouding round him to pay their court to him, he fixed his eyes on Scribonius Proculus, and with an angry tone; How dare you, said he, presume to appear before me, you who are an enemy to Cæsar? There wanted no more; the other senators instantly fell upon him with their daggers, stabbed him in several places, and then delivered him over, as a public enemy, to the mob, who tore him to pieces, and dragged his mangled members about the streets, Caius beholding with great pleasure so dismal a spectacle^w. Suetonius tells us, that this worthy senator was thus inhumanly butchered, merely to satisfy Caius, who, taking a fancy to see a senator thus mangled, had without the least provocation pitched upon him. Neither was his cruelty satiated, till the limbs and bowels of the innocent victim were brought before him. Being highly pleased with so dismal a sight, and the readiness the senate had shewn to take vengeance on his supposed enemy, he declared himself by a public edict reconciled with that body^x; and the senate on their side, to acknowledge so great a favour, honoured him sometimes with the title of hero, and sometimes of god; which scandalous flattery puffed him up to such a degree, that thenceforth he shewed himself more ambitious than ever of divine honours, punishing with death, or dooming to the mines, or to the drudgery of mending the public roads, persons of great merit and distinction, for neglecting to invoke his celestial genius: nay, some, for pretended offences against his godhead, were first torn and mangled with stripes, and then sawed asunder (A).

The inconstancy and fickleness of Caius's temper.

Dion Cassius, after a long detail of his cruelties, and the dismal effects of his pride, avarice, lewdness, prodigality, &c. observes in this place, that he was chiefly remarkable for the inconstancy and fickleness of his humour, which often hurried him in a moment from one extreme to another; and concludes his observations with the following words: Sometimes he liked to see his palace crowded, and sometimes would see no company, not his most intimate friends: he was out of humour when any petition was presented to him; and more so, when no-body appeared to ask him any favour: sometimes he dispatched business with great expedition; at other times he was slow and tedious, putting off from day to day matters which required the greatest dispatch: he squandered away immense treasures with a prodigality which knew no bounds, and amassed new sums with the most sordid avarice: sometimes he was pleased with liberty of speech and abhorred flattery; but all on a sudden punished the least liberty, and took delight in being flattered: he often pardoned those who were guilty of most enormous crimes, and condemned such as were not charged with any: upon some of his favourites he heaped honours and riches, while he treated others, no-body knew why, with the utmost contempt: in short, so changeable was his humour, so various and inconsistent was his conduct, that his most intimate

into the sea to find out the cause of it; when they discovered a fish about half a foot in length, which seemed to be of the snail kind, fastened to the keel of the royal galley. This is the fish, to which the Greeks have given the name of echeneis, and the Latins that of remora. It was brought to Caius, who, instead of acknowledging his folly, in pretending to be equal in power to the gods, foamed with rage upon his reflecting, that so small a creature had thus bid defiance to so mighty a prince, to the lord of the universe.

mate friends were at a loss what they should do, what they should say to please him, seeing he was often affronted with what he had taken delight in a few hours before ² (B)

THE following year, Caius entered upon his fourth consulship, having Cn. Sextius Saturninus for his colleague, but held it only to the seventh of January, when he resigned the fasces to Quintus Pomponius Secundus. Rome had now for the space of near four years groaned under the oppressions of the most cruel and inhuman tyrant, that had ever been invested with power; when at length a bloody doom overtook the author of so much blood-shed and slaughter. The conspiracy, which for the present put an end to the public evils, was chiefly formed, carried on, and executed by Cassius Chærea, tribune of a prætorian cohort, who had signalized himself in a very eminent manner, as we have already observed, in the beginning of Tiberius's reign, when the legions in Germany revolted. As he was a man of no less probity than bravery, the hatred he bore Caius, on account of his cruelties and extortions, first inspired him with the design of ridding the world of so great a plague. He was already resolved to resign his employment, and spend the remaining part of his life in retirement, when he received a commission from Caius to gather the taxes; for no commodity escaped without paying some tax or other, and the emperor levied them not by the publicans, as was usual, but by the centurions and tribunes of the prætorian cohorts, that they might reap the advantages thence accruing. In this commission Chærea, who was naturally compassionate, acquitted himself more to the satisfaction of the oppressed people, than of the emperor, who thereupon reproached him with want of spirit; and, conceiving an aversion to him, took pleasure in exposing him to the derisions of the soldiery. For though he was a man of great courage and resolution, yet, from his manner of speaking and the tone of his voice, no one would have taken him, says *Seneca*², for a person of that extraordinary bravery, which he shewed on all occasions, without betraying the least concern in the greatest dangers. Caius, now incensed against him, laid hold of his outward appearance to reproach him with effeminacy and cowardice, and rally him as one more fit to converse with women, than command men. When it was his turn to come for the parole, the emperor, by way of raillery, gave him always either some obscene word, or the name of some famous prostitute; insomuch, that the soldiers could not forbear laughing when he brought them the parole, and often diverted themselves with guessing what word Chærea would bring. But, as he was a man of too great spirit to put up such gross affronts, he resolved to convince the emperor how undeservedly he was taxed by him with effeminacy and want of courage. Having therefore determined to be revenged at all adventures on the tyrant, for thus attempting to blacken, with his unseasonable sarcasms, the reputation he had deservedly acquired by his gallant behaviour, he imparted his design to some of his intimate friends, and only waited for a favourable opportunity of putting it in execution. In the mean time, a senator of great distinction, named Propedius, was accused by one Timidius of having uttered injurious speeches against Caius. The only evidence produced against him was Quintilia, a celebrated comedian; but she, when summoned to appear before the judges, declared, that she had heard no such speeches. Hereupon Timidius requiring that she might be examined by torture, Caius ordered Chærea to see her immediately put upon the rack. Josephus tells us, that the tyrant commonly charged Chærea with commissions of this nature, being persuaded, that to avoid the imputation of faint-heartedness, that is,

A conspiracy formed against him.

(B) This is intirely agreeable to what we read in Philo, who was well acquainted with Caius's strange and variable humour. There was no depending, says that writer, upon the kindness and good-will he shewed you, however great and in appearance sincere. When he had granted a favour, he soon repented and recalled it; nay his benefits were often the fore-runners of greater evils. Thus he frequently set at liberty such as were confined for crimes real or supposed, and soon after ordered them to be dragged back to the place of their confinement without any new guilt, telling them, to increase their former miseries, that now they were to expect no mercy.

Many he condemned only to banishment, when they expected nothing but a cruel death; then, repenting of his clemency, he caused them to be executed in the place of their exile. His bounties he often revoked, obliging those, who had received them, to refund them with usury. Several of his chief favourites he reduced to beggary, that they might not be tempted to retire, and enjoy the wealth which they acquired. Thus the very favours he bestowed were in the end attended with the ruin of those who received them, and therefore no less dreaded than his resentment (46).

of good-nature, he would take care to execute them with extraordinary severity^b. But he was never so much at a loss how to behave as on this occasion; for Quintilia was privy to the conspiracy; whence he was afraid she might discover it upon the rack, if tortured without compassion; on the other hand, to shew any mercy to her, might cost him his life. But Quintilia herself delivered him from his uneasiness; for meeting, as she was led to the torture, one of the conspirators, she trod upon his foot, giving thereby to understand, that no torments should extort from her a discovery of the plot. And truly she bore the rack with unparalleled constancy, without suffering a single word to escape her, in prejudice either of Propedius or the conspirators, tho' she was reduced to so deplorable a condition, that Caius himself, when she was brought back to him, being moved with pity and admiring her resolution, ordered her a sum of money, and dismissed Propedius untouched. As for Chærea, he was so affected with the constancy of Quintilia and the torments she had suffered, of which he had himself been the minister, that he immediately imparted his design to Papinius and Clemens, the former a tribune, as he was himself, of one of the prætorian cohorts, and the latter the commander of the whole body, encouraging them to exert their bravery, and deliver Rome and the world from so bloody a tyrant, who employed them, not as the officers of his guards, but as his executioners. They both approved of the design; but Clemens, desiring to be excused from bearing any share in the execution of it on account of his age, promised to assist them with his advice; and taking his leave, left them under no small anxiety and apprehension of his betraying the secret (C). Chærea therefore, without loss of time, had recourse to Cornelius Sabinus, tribune likewise of a prætorian cohort, whom he knew to be a man of great courage, a lover of liberty, and consequently highly dissatisfied with the administration of Caius. Sabinus had formed the same design, but had not yet made any one privy to it for fear of being discovered. He therefore readily joined Chærea, and with him went immediately to sound Annius Minucianus, or, as others call him, Vinicianus, a senator of great distinction and merit, and mortally hated by Caius, who suspected him ever since the conspiracy of Lepidus, with whom Minucianus had lived in close confidence. After the usual ceremonies were over, Minucianus asked Chærea, What was the parole for that day? which he taking for a sufficient declaration of his intention, Do you, said he, without any further preamble, but give me the word liberty, and under your conduct I'll revenge my private injuries and the public calamities: do you but give me the word of command, and Rome shall no longer groan under the oppressions of an insulting tyrant. At these words, which Chærea uttered with great vehemence and ardor, Minucianus embracing him, commended his resolution, exhorted him to pursue his design, and promised to assist, to the utmost of his power, both with his sword and counsel (D).

THE number of the conspirators increased daily, which retarded the execution of the design, some of them being over-cautious, lest they should miscarry in an enterprise, on the success of which depended their safety, and the welfare of their country. If the attempt, said they, should not succeed, we should soon see every house in the city floating in blood. Not our lives only, but those of our wives, children, friends, relations,

(C) Clemens seems to have had no share in the execution of the design; since Mucianus, in conferring after his death the command of the prætorian cohorts upon his son Clemens Arretinus, told him, that his father had with honour and reputation discharged that office under Caius (47). And yet Dion Cassius names amongst the conspirators, Calinius, one of Caius's freedmen, and the commander of the prætorian guards (48); and Suetonius tells us, that the conspiracy was not executed without the concurrence of the most considerable amongst the emperor's freedmen and of the officers of his guards, who joined the other conspirators the more readily, because they found themselves suspected and hated by Caius, ever since the conspiracy of Lepidus (49). As for the emperor's freedmen, Josephus assures us, that Calixtus, the most wealthy amongst them, favoured the conspiracy, being well apprised, that he could by no other means escape the cruelty of Caius, and enjoy the immense wealth he had unjustly acquired (50).

(D) Josephus tells us, that as Chærea was about this time entering the senate, no doubt to attend Caius, for he was no senator, he heard a voice, which seemed to come from some one in the croud, encouraging him to dispatch what he designed, and assuring him, that heaven favoured his design. He was at first afraid, lest some of his associates had betrayed the secret; but afterwards concluded, that either one of his friends, or some divinity, pushed him forward to the speedy execution of his purpose (51).

relations, and acquaintance are at stake. We must expect no mercy from so cruel and inhuman a tyrant, who will take care to guard himself well for the future against any attempts of the like nature. Let us not therefore be over-hasty, but patiently wait for such an opportunity, as may promise certain success to our undertaking. Chærea did not relish this speech; to him every opportunity seemed favourable: as he was not in the least suspected by Caius, he offered to dispatch him, when he went up to the capitol to offer sacrifices for his daughter, or when in his palace he assisted at certain religious ceremonies, which he himself had instituted. He was for throwing him down headlong from the top of the Julian basilic, whence he used to scatter money among the populace; but the rest of the conspirators, thinking they could not use too much caution, did not judge any of these opportunities sufficiently safe and proper for the execution of their design. However, they all agreed at last to make the attempt during the sports, which were to be exhibited in honour of Augustus in the palace on the twenty-first of January and the three following days; for after these sports, Caius was to leave Rome and repair to Alexandria, probably to plunder the wealthy kingdom of Egypt, as he had done the other provinces of the empire (E). But notwithstanding their agreement and the resolution they had all shewed at their last meeting, they were still for putting off the attempt; but Chærea, having called them together on the third day of the sports, exhorted them not to let slip the present opportunity, represented the dangers to which their irresolution exposed them, and, by a speech full of noble and generous sentiments, inspired them with such courage, that they unanimously agreed at all adventures to make the attempt the next day, when Chærea was by good luck to be upon guard, and consequently to receive of the emperor, according to custom, the parole with the sword by his side (F). Caius came that day, the twenty-fourth of January, more early than usual, to the theatre, and appeared, contrary to his custom, gay, affable, and good-humoured; so much, that the spectators were greatly surprised at his obliging behaviour, and the complaisance he shewed to all who approached him. After he had sacrificed to Augustus, in whose honour the sports were exhibited, he took his place, having his friends and favourites about him, and Chærea with the other officers that day upon guard at some distance behind him. When the sports began, one Bathybius, who had been prætor, happening to sit by a consular of his acquaintance, named Cluvitus, for at these shews there was no distinction of places, he asked him softly, Whether he had heard any news? None at all, answered Cluvitus: But I can tell you something, replied Bathybius, to which you are perhaps a stranger; in the piece, which is to be acted to day, will be represented the death of a tyrant. Cluvitus answered with a verse out of Homer, which he whispered in his friend's ear; Silence, lest some of the Greeks should over-hear us. Historians observe, that this was the day, on which Philip, king of Macedon, was slain by Pausanias, as he was entering the theatre to behold the same tragedy that was acted before Caius (G). Another piece was to be exhibited in the night, representing some fabulous accounts of the infernal regions; for Caius, who took great delight in such representations, declared, that as this was the last day, the sports should continue all night, with a design, as was believed, to appear on the stage himself, and there display his skill and address in dancing, in which he took great pride (G). (E) It was perhaps at these sports, that Caius, transported with rage against Jupiter, because the noise of thunder prevented him from hearing the actors, threw out most dreadful blasphemies against heaven, and impiously defied Jupiter himself, with these words; Dispatch me, or I'll dispatch you (75); for he foolishly persuaded himself to be upon a level with, and equal in power to, the greatest of the gods. This monstrous impiety, says Seneca, probably animated the conspirators with new courage.

(F) Dion Cassius tells us, that on the twenty-fourth of January, the day on which Caius was killed, an Egyptian, by name Apollones, was brought to him, having been sent out of Egypt to Rome for pretending to foretel the emperor's death. Caius not being then at leisure to examine him, ordered him to be kept under close confinement till the sports were over. But he being killed in the mean time, the Egyptian was after one day's confinement set at liberty (76). Suetonius mentions many prodigies, to warn the emperor of his approaching end; amongst the others he tells us, that Caius being admonished by the oracle at Antium to be upon his guard against Cassius, he immediately sent assassines to murder Cassius Longinus, at that time proconsul of Asia, not remembering that Chærea was likewise named Cassius (77).

(G) He was, says Suetonius, an excellent fencer, dancer, and charioteer; he sometimes danced on the stage, and frequently before his friends in the palace.

noon, when the emperor used to withdraw for a short time to bathe and refresh himself with some nourishment, Chærea stole out with a design to fall upon him as he passed from the theatre to his apartment. But Caius, contrary to his custom, shewed no inclination to leave the sports, telling those who sat by him, that since it was the last day of the shews he had a mind not to bathe till they were over. At the same time, he called for some refreshment, which he shared with those who were about him, amongst the rest with Pomponius Secundus, then consul, who sat at his feet and often kissed them. Minucianus, who was next to him, and had seen Chærea go out, rose up with a design to go out and acquaint the tribune with the emperor's resolution. But Caius taking hold of his robe, Sit still, my friend, said he, in a very obliging manner; you shall go out with me. Minucianus, as it were, out of respect, sat down again, but soon after rose up and went out; neither did Caius offer to detain him, thinking he went away upon some necessary occasion, and would soon return. He found Chærea waiting in the entry, which led to the theatre, and acquainted him with the emperor's resolution. Hereupon the resolute tribune thought it adviseable to fall upon him in the theatre, rather than let slip the present opportunity, and offered to go in immediately and stab him in his seat. Minucianus, and such of the conspirators as were with him, for some of them were in the theatre, expecting the signal, approved of Chærea's bold proposal, who was thereupon entering the theatre, when word was brought him, that the emperor, at the persuasion of Ampronas, and some others who were privy to the conspiracy, had changed his mind and was coming out. The conspirators immediately drew together, and, under pretence of clearing the way for the emperor, removed such as they imagined would lend him any assistance. Caius at length came out, his uncle Claudius and M. Vinicius, who had married his sister Julia, walking before him, with some persons of great distinction. When he entered the palace, instead of going straight to his apartment, as he usually did, and following his officers and attendants, he turned unexpectedly into a gallery, which led to a private apartment, to see there certain youths, who had been sent him out of Asia, to act and dance upon the stage, and were just then arrived. He was so pleased with them, that he would have immediately returned with them to the theatre, being impatient to see them perform, had not the chief of them complained, that he was cold, and begged leave to warm himself first^f. While he was entertaining himself with the Asiatic youths, Chærea came for the parole, and Caius gave him one, as usual, reflecting on his effeminacy and want of courage. Chærea returned him a smart answer; and at the same time drawing his sword, discharged a great blow at him, and wounded him in the neck. Though the wound did not prove mortal, yet we cannot give credit to those, who would make us believe, that Chærea did not, as he might, dispatch him at one blow, lest he should be too soon out of pain^g. Caius, struck with amazement at the boldness of the tribune, had not presence of mind enough to call for assistance; however, he attempted to fly; but Cornelius Sabinus, having pushed him down upon his knees, Chærea with another blow broke his jaw-bone; then the rest of the conspirators rushing in, dispatched him with thirty wounds, he for some time crying out, I am still alive; and the conspirators, Repeat, repeat the blow; which was the signal agreed on. We are told, that Aquila was the person who gave him the wound that put an end to his life. Some of the conspirators took delight in mangling his body even after his death; nay, they are said to have carried their rage to such a height, as to cut off and eat pieces of his flesh^h (H).

One night, while he was in that humour, he sent for three grave consulars, caused them to be awaked out of their sleep, and by his guards hurried away to his palace, where, while they were waiting in a great hall, and trembling in apprehension of immediate death, they suddenly heard a great noise of musical instruments, and at the same time saw the emperor come leaping out in a long robe, to display before them his skill and address in dancing. When he was tired, he withdrew, and sent the three consulars word, that they might, when they pleased, return home. He took such pleasure in seeing Mneſter, the famous mimic, dance, that he punished, with great severity, such as gave him the least disturbance: a Roman knight making some noise while he was dancing, the emperor immediately sent him word by a centurion to depart that instant for Oſſia, and there wait for a letter, which he should soon send after him for Ptolemy king of Mauritania. The knight obeyed, crossed over to Africa, and presented the letter to Ptolemy, who could not forbear laughing in reading it; for it contained only the following words; To the bearer do neither good nor evil (78).

(H) Some writers, quoted by Suetonius (79), say, that while he was speaking with the Asiatic youths, Chærea came behind him, and gave him a mortal wound

^a SUCH was the end of Caius Caesar Caligula, the fourth emperor of Rome, a prince so monstrously wicked, that nature, says Seneca, seemed to have brought him forth, to shew what mischief could be effected by the greatest vices, supported by the greatest authority^h. His death happened on the twenty-fourth of January; so that he reigned but three years, nine months, and twenty-eight days, according to those who fix the death of Tiberius on the twenty-sixth of March; or three years, ten months, and eight days, if we suppose him, as some do, to have begun his reign on the sixteenth day of the said month. He had lived, according to *Suetonius*ⁱ, twenty-nine years; according to others, twenty-eight years, four months, and twenty-four days^k. Of the confusion and disorders attending his death we shall speak in the following reign. His body remained in the place where he had been assassinated, till the night was far spent, when it was privately conveyed to the Lamian gardens, where, being half burnt upon a pile erected in haste, it was, without any solemnity, or even ceremonies, committed to the earth. This last duty was paid him, according to the Roman writers, by his wife Cæsonia; but, according to Josephus, by king Agrippa, who, mindful of the obligations he owed him, caused his body to be conveyed away, lest it should be insulted by the incensed populace. Some time after his sisters, being returned from banishment, took it up again, burnt it to ashes, and solemnly interred it. Suetonius affirms as a thing not to be doubted of, that those who had the care of the above-mentioned gardens were frightened with dreadful apparitions, so long as the body remained there; and that in the apartment where he was murdered, a frightful noise was heard every night, till it was burnt down to the ground^l. Chærea, to extirpate the whole race of the tyrant, sent the night after his death a centurion, or rather a tribune, by name Julius Lupus, to dispatch his wife Cæsonia, and with her his only daughter, an infant; the tribune stabbed without mercy the mother, and taking the innocent child out of the cradle, dashed her brains out against a wall^m. The senate, even after Claudius was raised to the empire, were for declaring Caius infamous. This Claudius, who was his uncle, would not allow; but nevertheless ordered all his statues to be pulled down and broken, disannulled most of his acts, and gave his assent to a decree of the senate, commanding his money to be melted down, that both his name and features might be unknown to future agesⁿ.

His body privately conveyed away, and buried.

As we have hitherto had no opportunity to speak of Claudius, who succeeded his nephew, but had led a retired life till he was raised to the empire, it may not be improper to premise to the history of his reign a succinct account of his birth and education, of his good and evil qualities, and also of his wives, children, and freedmen, whom we shall have frequently occasion to bring upon the stage. Claudius was born at Lions on the first of August, Iulus Antonius and Fabius Africanus being consuls, so that this year he was in the fiftieth of his age^o. He was named Tiberius Claudius Nero Drusus Germanicus^p. Upon his accession to the empire, he assumed the names of Cæsar and Augustus, as did likewise all his successors; by which means the name of Cæsar, which was peculiar to the Julian family, became a title of dignity, and was given to the presumptive heirs of the empire; whereas that of Augustus was a mark of the sovereign power. As for the name of Julius, it was quite laid aside, and never after assumed by any of the emperors^q. Claudius was, by his mother Antonia, the grandson of Marc Antony and Octavia, sister to Augustus, and by his father Drusus, who died in Germany, the grandson of Livia Augusta, and consequently nephew to Tiberius, brother to Germanicus, and uncle to Caius. However, no one imagined he would ever have attained to the sovereign power, till the very day he was invested with it, all men being rather destined to the empire, to use the expression of Tacitus, than he, for whom fortune, or rather providence, reserved it in the dark^r. For being wound on the head, saying, Mind this; after which Cornelius Sabinus ran him through the body. Others, cited by the same writer, tell us, that Sabinus coming for the parole, and Caligula giving him the word Jupiter, Chærea cried out, Be sure to remember it: hereupon Caius turning about, Chærea cut off his jaw at one blow, and struck him to the ground. The other conspirators then rushed in, and dispatched him (80).

being very sickly during the whole time of his childhood and minority, he was thereby so weakened both in his body and mind, that he was looked upon as incapable of any public employment, and long after he was of age kept under a governor, of whom he complained in a book, which he published, as of a barbarous and unmannerly person, who had been formerly a groom, and was set over him on purpose to plague and chastise him upon every trivial occasion. His mother Antonia used to call him a human monster, just begun by nature, but never finished; and when she upbraided any one with dulness and stupidity, her common expression was, You are as stupid as my son Claudius: his grandmother Livia could not bear the sight of him: his nephew Caligula, when he had butchered many of his kindred, saved him purely for a laughing-stock; he was held in the same contempt by his sister Livilla, by Augustus, and all his family (I): the kindest word Augustus gave him was that of Misellus, poor wretch^f. Being thus despised and utterly neglected by his own relations, he became the jest of the court (K), and was treated even by the freedmen of his uncle and nephew with the greatest disrespect imaginable (L). He was not only destitute

(I) Suetonius, to shew us what opinion Augustus entertained of Claudius, produces several of the letters to Livia concerning him: I have, says he, in one, my dear Livia, advised with Tiberius according to your desire, about what is to be done with your nephew Tiberius; that is, Claudius, at the solemnity of Mars. We are both of opinion; that we must resolve, without further delay, what course to take with him; if his weakness is not very remarkable, we ought, without all doubt, to advance him by the same steps and degrees by which his brother was raised. But if we find any weakness or incapacity in his body or mind, we must not give occasion to the world to mock and deride both him and us: it is now time to deliberate and conclude, whether he is capable of public employments or not. I think it would not be amiss to charge him, at the approaching solemnity of Mars, with the care of entertaining the priests, upon condition, that he suffers himself to be directed by the son of Silanus his kinsman, who will instruct him, and prevent his doing any thing notoriously ridiculous. But I am utterly against his seeing the Circensian games from so conspicuous a place as the pulvinar, because he will be there exposed to the eyes of the whole theatre. Neither would I have him to attend his brother on the feræ Latinæ to mount Albanus; and as to the government of the city, during his brother's absence, I do not think him at all qualified for such an employment. Thus my dear Livia, I have declared my opinion, which is, that we defer no longer, but come to a final resolution, whether we are to raise him or no. This part of my letter you may shew, if you please, to Antonia. In another he writes thus: During your absence, I shall constantly invite young Tiberius to my table, that he may not sup with his Sulpitius and Athenodorus: I wish the poor child would propose to himself the example of some well-bred person, and imitate him in his gesture, habit, and mein; for though he is not much esteemed by men of penetration, yet he is not without some noble sentiments. And in a third; may I die, my dear Livia, says he, if I am not amazed how your nephew Tiberius could give me so full satisfaction in his declamation; it is surprising, that a person who talks so ill, should write and declaim so well. Augustus, well apprised of the weakness of his understanding, honoured him with no other dignity but that of augur, and in his last will mentioned him only amongst his third heirs, who were no-ways related to him, and left him but a legacy of eight hundred sesterces. His uncle Tiberius honoured him with the consular ornaments, but never allowed him to discharge the office of consul; and when the young prince importuned him for some real preferment, he wrote him word, that he had sent him forty pieces of gold against the Saturnalia, or feasts of Saturn, for play-money, and to lay out, as he pleased, in the Sigillaria, which was a kind of fair after the Saturnalia, lasting seven days, and so called from the little images and puppets, in Latin Sigilla, which were then sold. Upon this answer, Claudius, laying aside all hopes of rising to any considerable employment in the state, betook himself to a retired life, spending his time with persons much below his rank, either in the gardens he had in the suburbs, or at his country-house in Campania, where he gave himself intirely up to gaming and drinking, diversions suitable to the low company he kept. However, the senate, in consideration of his high birth, passed a decree, enacting, that he should be added, above the limited number, to the college of the priests of Augustus, into which none had ever before been admitted but by lot; that a house belonging to him, which had been burnt down to the ground by accidental fire, should be rebuilt at the public charge; and that he should have a vote in the senate, and deliver his opinion amongst the consulars. But this decree did not take place, Tiberius alledging against his voting in the senate the weakness of his understanding, and promising to make good at his private expence the losses he had sustained by fire. Nevertheless, Tiberius in his last will named him amongst his heirs, and left him a legacy of about two millions of sesterces (81).

(K) Suetonius tells us, that if he happened to come to table, when the other guests had taken their places, no one shewed him the least civility, but diverted themselves with seeing him running about the table to find out a place; if he refreshed himself, as he usually did after meals, with a short repose, they took pleasure in throwing the stones of olives and dates at him; sometimes they awaked him with the blow of a rod, or whip; and sometimes, while he was asleep, they put his sandals upon his hands, that, when he waked, he might rub his face with them (82).

destitute of parts, but moreover extremely timorous; inſomuch, that there was no accident ſo trivial, no man, woman, ſlave, or child, ſo contemptible, as not to frighten him, and when frightened, he was altogether incapable of reaſoning. This timorouſneſs was owing to his education; for he was brought up amongſt women and freedmen, and obliged from his infancy to depend intirely upon them, and ſubmit to their will and pleaſure, without having any paſſions, or even diſcernment, of his own^c. He gave out after he came to the throne, that in the reigns of Tiberius and Caius he had counterfeited folly to eſcape their cruelty; but his conduct too plainly ſhewed, that it was not aſſumed, but real^u. Suetonius taxes him with being naturally cruel^w, while others aſcribe to his wives and freedmen the many executions of which we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak in the hiſtory of his reign. Though he had many great faults; yet, when compared with Tiberius or Caius, he did not paſs for a bad emperor^x. From his childhood he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the liberal ſciences, and gave frequently public teſtimonies of his proficiency in them^z. He arrived at no ſmall perfection in oratory, and his diſcourſe was not without elegance, when it was the reſult of ſtudy. He was well ſkilled both in the Latin and Greek tongues, wrote ſeveral books (M), and added three letters to the ancient alphabet (N), which, however, continued in uſe no longer than his reign^b. Seneca commends his works, and ſpeaks of him as an encourager of learning^c. As to his perſon, he was tall and well-ſhaped; but had ſomething very diſagreeable in his mein, ſomething very unbecoming in his action, which, together with his low voice and inarticulate pronunciation, is the chief ſubject of Seneca's ralleries^d. Theſe defects, as well as his ſtammering and the trembling of his head, Dion Caſſius takes to be the effect of the infirmities, to which he was ſubject in his childhood and youth^e.

His wife, when he came to the empire, was Valeria Meſſalina, his couſin, whom we ſhall have frequent occaſion to mention. He had already by her a daughter, named Oſtavia, who was afterwards married to Nero. Not many days after his acceſſion to the empire, his wife Meſſalina was delivered of a ſon, named firſt Claudius Tiberius Germanicus, and afterwards Britannicus Caſar^f. By his ſecond wife, Ælia Petina, whom he divorced, he had a daughter called Antonia, whom he married firſt to Pompeius Magnus, and afterwards to Fauſtus Sylla, both deſcended from illuſtrious anceſtors.

(M) At the perſuaſion of Livy the celebrated hiſtorian, and with the aſſiſtance of Sulpicius Flavius, Livy dying before he began his work, he wrote in forty-three books the hiſtory of Rome from the death of Cæſar the dictator to his own time. He is ſaid to have wrote with great liberty, and to have been on that account often rebuked by his mother Antonia and his grandmother Livia. He publiſhed alſo ſeven volumes of his own life, which were wrote with more elegance than judgment (86), and a deſence of Cicero againſt the writings of Gallus, which, in the opinion of Suetonius (87), was a learned performance. His hiſtory he recited in public, ſubmitting it to the judgment of his auditors. He had a particular value for the Greek tongue, ſpoke it fluently, and wrote in that language the hiſtory of the Tyrrhenians in twenty books, and that of the Carthaginians in eight. To make theſe hiſtories the more famous, he added a new ſchool to the old one at Alexandria, calling it by his own name, and ordering his two Greek hiſtories to be read in both ſchools (88).

(N) Tacitus, Quintilian, and Varro agree, that Claudius added three letters to the Latin alphabet, two of which are well known, viz. the Æolic digamma, and the antiſigma; the former was an F inverſed, thus J, and ſounded like the V; as terminaſit ampliſſitque, and Diſi Auguſti, &c. The antiſigma ſerved inſtead of the Greek Ψ, or inſtead of P S. and was wrote thus, ꝥ. The ſigma of the ancient Greeks reſembled our C; whence Claudius, to his new letter, conſiſting of two ſigmas, having their backs turned to each other, thus, cc, gave the name of antiſigma. As to the third letter, we are quite in the dark. Some take it to have been the diphthong ai, which is found in moſt inſcriptions of Claudius's time, thus Antoniai, Diſai, &c. But it is manifeſt, that this diphthong was in uſe long before his reign. Others, from a corrupt paſſage in Velius Longus, conclude it to have been we know not what letter, invented to ſoften the harſh ſound of the letter R. There are not wanting ſome who pretend the letter X to have been firſt contrived by Claudius; but Iſidorus plainly ſhews, that it was invented and uſed in the reign of Auguſtus (89). The Greek ϕ had, as Quintilian obſerves, a different ſound from that of the Latin PH; whence ſome conjecture the third letter invented by Claudius to have answered the Greek ϕ, which is not altogether void of probability. But on this ſubject nothing has been, or can be, offered, except what is merely conjectural. Claudius publiſhed a book, when he was yet a private perſon, on the neceſſity of admitting theſe letters, and the uſe of them: when he was advanced to the empire, he obliged all to uſe them; but after his death they were diſuſed and quite laid aſide, though in the times of Suetonius and Tacitus they were ſtill to be ſeen in ſeveral records and journals, and in the tables of braſs, on which were publiſhed the decrees of the people (90).

ancestors. His first wife, Plautia Urgulanilla, brought him Drusus, and a daughter, called Claudia. Drusus lost his life at Pompeii before he was fourteen, being choaked by an apple, which stuck in his throat, while, in play, he was throwing it up into the air, and catching it in his mouth. As for Claudia, though she was born five months before he divorced her mother; yet he would not acknowledge her for his daughter; but suspecting her to be the child of one of his freedmen, called Boter, he caused her to be stript naked, and to be laid, after the divorce, before her mother's door^s.

His freedmen. Messalina, and Agrippina, whom he married after her death, bore an absolute sway over Claudius, who acted under them more like a slave than a prince^b, disposing of honours, governments, employments, armies, &c. as they and his freedmen, whose power he raised as high as his own, thought fit to direct him. Amongst the latter his chief favourites were Possides the eunuch, Felix, Harpocras, Polybius, and above all Narcissus and Pallas (O). To these we may add Callistus; or, as others call him, Calixtus, a man of great craft and address (P). He was privy to the conspiracy against Caius, as we have related above; and gained the favour of Claudius, by persuading him, that he had been charged by Caius to poison him; but had, under various pretences, put off from day to day the execution of his orders^l. Calixtus's office was to receive the requests, which were presented to the Emperor; Narcissus was his secretary; and Pallas had the whole management of the finances. These three divided the sovereign power amongst them^h. Each of them was, according to *Pliny*ⁱ, richer than Crassus had ever been; nay, they possessed greater wealth than the emperor himself, who was thereupon told, as he complained one day of his poverty, that he would be rich enough, if he could but prevail upon his freedmen to take him for their partner^m. Having premised thus much in general concerning Claudius and those who governed under him, we shall now resume the thread of our history.

(O) Suetonius tells us, that Possides was rewarded by Claudius in his British triumph, and amongst the other brave officers presented with a spear; but whether the eunuch deserved that mark of distinction, we find no-where recorded. Felix was brother to Pallas, Claudius's reigning favourite, and the most powerful person in the whole empire. He is by most writers named Claudius Felix, but by Tacitus, Antonius Felix, because he was first the slave of Antonia, the mother of Claudius, and afterwards of Claudius himself, whose name he likewise took upon his being manumitted. He was in high favour with Claudius, and by him raised to the first posts of the army, and afterwards to the government of Judæa, Galilee, Samaria, and Perea, that is, of the country beyond the Jordan (91). Suetonius observes, that from a slave he became so great and considerable, that he was the husband of three several queens, or rather princesses of royal blood. One of these was Drusilla, the daughter of king Agrippa, whom, by means of a magician, named Simon, he persuaded to abandon her husband Azizus, king of Emesus, and marry him (92). In marrying Felix, she renounced, according to Josephus, the Jewish religion, which Azizus had embraced out of complaisance to her. S. Luke nevertheless calls her a Jew (93). Felix married another Drusilla, grand-daughter to Antony and Cleopatra, and daughter to Juba, king of Mauritania (94). Who was the third princess we find no-where recorded. To Harpocras, another of his favourite freedmen, he granted the privilege of being carried in a litter and of exhibiting plays, which was contrary to the decree passed in Tiberius's reign, and by us mentioned there. Polybius was a man of learning, and had assisted Claudius in his studies, who thereupon heaped extraordinary honours upon him, allowing him often to walk between the two consuls (95). Of Narcissus and Pallas we shall speak anon.

(P) Callistus had been slave to a private citizen, who sold him to Caius, but was afterwards obliged, as Seneca observes (96), to purchase his favour at a much higher price than that, at which he had sold him; nay, he was often seen waiting at his door, and courting even his porters, that he might be allowed to enter with the rest, and attend the levee of one, whom he had formerly kept in chains. Scribonius Largus, a celebrated physician of those times, inscribed to him a work, wherein he styles him Gaius Julius Callistus (97). Suetonius, in speaking of the freedmen of Claudius, makes no mention of Callistus, who, it is certain, bore a great sway in that reign; but names one Harpocras, who is scarce taken notice of by any other writer. This has prompted some to believe, that Harpocras and Callistus were one and the same person. But we can hardly persuade ourselves, that Callistus was also named Harpocras, since Scribonius Largus names him only C. Julius Callistus. Besides, Seneca speaks in one place of Callistus (98), and in another of Harpocras (99); and tells us, that the latter was executed by Claudius's orders. Had this been the end of so famous and celebrated a person as Callistus, Tacitus and Suetonius would not, we conceive, have failed to mention it. Suetonius perhaps makes no mention of Callistus in speaking of Claudius's freedmen, because he was not, properly speaking, one of his, but of Caius's, freedmen, by whom he was first manumitted, and afterwards employed in quality of secretary (100). He was alive in the eighth year of Claudius's reign, and died soon after (1.)

THE unexpected news of Caius's death, which was brought while the people were intent upon the shews, and in a trice spread all over the city, occasioned a general uproar. Upon the first alarm the deceased emperor's litter-men hastened with their poles to his rescue, and were immediately followed by his German guards, named the Celtic band, who, finding Caius lying dead on the ground and his body mangled, in the manner we have related, vented their rage on all they met, without examining whether they were privy to the conspiracy or not; and in this confusion were killed L. Asprenas, who had been consul three years before, Norbanus, descended from one of the most illustrious families in Rome, Anteius, a senator of great distinction, and several others, who came merely out of curiosity to know whether the report was true or no. As for Chærea, he retired, before the emperor's death was publicly known, to the house of Germanicus, which was contiguous to the palace, and there with the chief of the conspirators lay concealed, till the Germans, by whom Caius was extremely beloved on account of his prodigality, had vented their first fury. The people, suspecting Caius had caused the report of his death to be spread abroad, on purpose to discover their sentiments, continued in the theatre, without taking any notice of what was rumoured about. But they were greatly alarmed, when word was brought them, that the emperor's guards had surrounded the theatre, and were ready to enter it sword in hand, to sacrifice the whole multitude to the manes of their massacred general. And this indeed they designed in the first transports of their rage; but a public herald appearing unexpectedly in the theatre, clad in deep mourning, after having proclaimed the emperor's death, commanded the people quietly to retire to their respective houses, and the soldiery to withdraw to their quarters without raising any further disturbance. They both obeyed, which was more than was expected, with great readiness, so that the tumult was soon appeased, and tranquillity restored to the city. Then the consuls, Q. Pomponius Secundus and Cn. Sentius Saturninus, having, at the head of the city-guards who were under their command, seized on the forum and the capitol, assembled the senate, in order to deliberate with them about the most proper measures in so critical a conjuncture. While they were assembled, both the populace and soldiery, whom Caius had gained with the immense sums he distributed amongst them, and the magnificent shews he exhibited almost every day, cried aloud for vengeance; which so terrified the senate, that they were ready to pass a decree, enacting, that the conspirators should be forthwith apprehended and executed as traitors and enemies to their country, when Valerius Asiaticus, a senator of great quality and reputation, rising up, spoke with great vehemence against the measures they were entering upon, commended the zeal of the brave patriots who had delivered their country from so cruel a tyrant, publicly wished he had had the glory of dispatching him with his own hand, and exhorted the fathers to despise the clamours of the multitude. Hereupon they took courage, and by an edict, which they caused to be read to the people, commanded them to return to their several employments, and the soldiery to their camp. Then the conspirators appeared publicly, and owned the fact; and Sentius Saturninus, one of the consuls, having in a speech, which he uttered with great zeal and ardor, displayed the benefits of liberty and miseries of tyranny, encouraged the fathers to resume their ancient authority, and to begin the exercise of that power to which they alone had a just claim, by conferring such honours and rewards on Chærea, as the eminent service he had rendered the republic well deserved. The senators, animated with his speech, agreed to restore Rome to her ancient liberty, and utterly to extinguish the name of the Cæsars. They spent all that day and the following night, in deliberating about the measures for bringing about so great a change, without kindling a civil war within the very walls of the city, but parted after long and warm debates without agreeing upon any. When the senate rose, Chærea, whom they had appointed commander of the city-guards, went to the consuls for the parole, who gave him the word liberty. No such honour had been paid to the consuls ever since the establishment of the monarchy.

In the mean time, the soldiers in the camp took such measures as utterly defeated those of the senate. Claudius, who had been with Caius a few minutes before he was murdered, and was retired to a room in the palace called Hermaum, upon the first alarm of his death, stole away in a great fright, and hid himself behind the hangings in a dark corner of the palace, whence he heard the noise of the soldiery, and saw saw some of the German guards pass close by him with the head of Asprenas, which they carried, as it were, in triumph. This sight increased his fright to such a degree, that he continued motionless in the same place; scarce daring to breathe through fear of being discovered, till a common soldier, called by some Gratus, by others Epirius, but probably Epirius Gratus, running about the palace in quest of plunder, discovered his feet, and dragged him out of his hiding-place. Claudius, not doubting but the soldier designed to murder him, threw himself at his feet, and with many tears begged for mercy, which Gratus, finding who he was, not only granted, but saluted him emperor, and carried him to his comrades, who at his instigation honoured him with the same title. They then put him into a chair, and, as his servants were fled, carried him upon their shoulders by turns to the camp, the people, who imagined they were carrying him to execution, bemoaning his misfortune; for he had hitherto done nothing that could deserve any man's hatred. He was well received in the camp; but, as he was naturally timorous, he passed the night in no small apprehension^o. He was inclined not to accept the empire; but king Agrippa, who had just interred the body of Caius, arriving in the camp, and hearing the army designed to raise Claudius to the sovereign power, went immediately to him, encouraged him to lay hold of the present opportunity, and, leaving him in that resolution, returned home. On the other hand, the soldiery, being well apprised, that the state could not long subsist without an emperor, and reflecting that it would prove far more advantageous for them to give than to receive one, the very next day, the twenty-fifth of January, took an oath of allegiance to Claudius, who thereupon promised them fifteen great sesterces a man^p. He was the first emperor, as Suetonius observes, who gave money to the soldiers upon his accession to the empire; but his example was followed by most of his successors^q. The people, who had expressed great joy upon the hopes of recovering once more their ancient privileges, no sooner heard that Claudius was declared emperor by the army, than they changed their mind, approved with loud shouts what had been done in the camp, and openly declared, that they had rather obey one prince, than many tyrants. The senate, however, persisted in their former resolution of asserting the public liberty, and were even for making war upon Claudius; but afterwards growing cooler on account of the differences that arose amongst them, and not being able to come to an agreement, they sent for king Agrippa to advise with him. The king obeyed the summons with great readiness, and appearing in the senate, dressed and perfumed, as if he had not been out of his house that day, he asked what was become of Claudius, as if he suspected him to have been murdered together with his nephew. Hereupon the senate related to him what had passed, to which he pretended to be an utter stranger, and at the same time asked his advice (R). The traitor protested, that he was ready to sacrifice his life to the glory of the senate and to the public liberty; but at the same time starting innumerable difficulties and exaggerating the dangers and evils of a civil war, he craftily endeavoured to deter them, as solicitous about their safety, from having recourse to arms. He told them, that in his opinion they were no ways in a condition to make head against the prætorian guards; and that he therefore advised them, rather to send a deputation to Claudius, begging him not to accept of the empire. This embassy he offered to take upon himself; the senate returned him thanks for his zeal, accepted his offer, and dispatched him the same day to the camp with two tribunes of the people, Veranius and Bruchus. The tribunes conjured him to submit to the authority of the senate and people, put him in mind of the evils and calamities which the republic had suffered under the former tyrants, assured him, that the senate had resolved at all events to attempt the recovery of their ancient privileges, earnestly intreated him seriously to reflect on the calamities attending a civil war, and the unhappy end of Caius, &c. The speech of the tribunes made a deep impression on the mind of Claudius, who was

(R) Josephus tells us in his history of the Jewish war, that king Agrippa was at the same time sent for both by the senate and by Claudius, and that he chose to go first to Claudius, who sent him in his name to the senate (2). This is not to be easily reconciled with what he writes in his antiquities, viz. that Agrippa being sent for by the senate, immediately obeyed the summons, but pretended an intire ignorance of what had passed, either in the palace or camp, relating to Claudius. We have followed him in his antiquities, which he wrote the last.

was naturally timorous; but Agrippa in a private audience encouraged him to lay hold of the present opportunity, acquainted him with the fears, perplexity, and irresolution of the senate, and exhorted him to assume forthwith the imperial power, and return an answer to the deputies becoming an emperor. Claudius followed the advice of Agrippa, which occasioned no small confusion in the city, the senate declaring, that they were determined rather to risque a civil war, than submit to the will of one man. This was in effect declaring war, and accordingly Claudius, being acquainted with their resolution, began to put himself in a condition to repel force with force. In the mean time, the people, surrounding the place where the senate was assembled, demanded with threats an emperor, declaring aloud, that they would never acknowledge the authority of the senate. This frightened the fathers to such a degree, that they immediately separated; but the consuls summoned them to meet again the next morning before break of day. Only a small number of them obeyed the summons, scarce a hundred persons, the rest being either retired into the country, or keeping close in their houses, through fear of being insulted by the populace. While those who met were deliberating how to thwart the designs of Claudius, the city guards, the only troops that obeyed the senate, joining the populace, began to cry aloud, that they would have an emperor; that the senate might chuse whom they pleased; but that they were resolved to yield obedience to none but an emperor. This put an end to the deliberations of the senate; all thoughts of liberty were laid aside, and Claudius, with the usual ceremonies, declared emperor (S). After this declaration the senators hastened to the camp, each of them striving to be the foremost in paying their court to the new prince. The soldiery received them with insults, wounded some of them, and would have killed the consul Pomponius Secundus, who had been the most sanguine of all in the cause of liberty, had they not been restrained by Claudius, who received him with the greatest tokens of respect, and placed him next to himself.

AND now Claudius, being declared and acknowledged emperor, left the camp, Claudius accompanied by the senate and prætorian guards, and, entering the city in a kind of triumph, offered a solemn sacrifice in the capitol by way of thanksgiving to the gods, who had thus raised him to the empire; and then withdrew to the palace, where he immediately summoned a council of his friends to deliberate with them about his conduct, with respect to those who had murdered Caius: in his heart he approved of the action; but as he thought it nearly concerned all princes, that the death of one should not pass unrevenge, with the advice of his friends, he caused the brave Chærea and Lupus, who had put to death Cæsonia with her daughter, and a few more to be condemned and executed; but pardoned the rest, and amongst them

(S) The senate, being well apprised, that all their efforts towards the recovery of their liberty must, in the present disposition of the people and soldiery, necessarily prove ineffectual, resolved at first to name an emperor themselves, and not accept one from the soldiery. Accordingly, several persons were proposed, all better qualified than Claudius for that high station. Josephus names the three following senators, all men of extraordinary parts, and equal to the sovereignty; viz. Annius Minucianus or Vinicianus, Valerius Asiaticus, who had been both privy to the conspiracy against Caius, and Camillus Scribonianus, who revolted the following year. Minucianus had most votes; but the consuls, dreading the consequences of a civil war, which they thought unavoidable, if they named any but Claudius to the sovereign power, put off, under various pretences, the final decision of such an important affair. In the mean time, the gladiators, on whom the senate chiefly relied, and the city guards went over in crowds to Claudius; so that Minucianus and the others gave over soliciting for a dignity, which they were well apprised they could not long enjoy. Chærea did all that lay in his power to put a stop to the desertion of the soldiery, but to no purpose; for while he was encouraging the few who remained, to exert themselves in the defence of their liberties, instead of listening to him, they took up their standards, and, marching sword in hand out of the city, joined their comrades in the camp of the prætorian guards. The senate, seeing themselves thus abandoned by all their forces, were at length forced to join the people and soldiery, and declare Claudius emperor; which they did accordingly, decreeing him at the same time all the titles annexed to the imperial dignity. However, Chærea and Sabinus continued protesting, that they would rather fall by their own hands, than submit to Claudius (3).

(T) Chærea died with the constancy of a true hero; but Lupus betrayed a great deal of fear, notwithstanding the great example he had before his eyes. As he was pulling off his garments at the place of execution, he complained of cold; which unseasonable complaint Chærea turning into ridicule, told him, that cold had never yet done harm to a wolf, alluding to his name Lupus, which in the Latin tongue signifies a wolf (4). They were both beheaded, and the Roman people, a few days after their execution, offering the usual sacrifices in the month of February, in honour of their deceased friends, did not on that occasion forget the brave Chærea, acknowledging their obligations to him, for having delivered the republic from so destructive a tyrant (5).

Cornelius Sabinus, though he had acted a chief part in the murder of Caius; but the brave tribune, grieved for the death of his friend Chærea, and scorning to outlive him, laid violent hands on himself^f. After this the emperor caused an act of oblivion to be passed with respect to all that had been transacted in the senate, from the death of Caius to the time of his accession to the empire, and observed it so strictly, that he even raised those to the first employments who had been the most sanguine in the cause of liberty. The senate immediately decreed him all the honours which they had conferred on other emperors; but he modestly declined the greater part of them, and caused a decree to be passed in the senate, forbidding any one to pay him divine worship, or style him a god. Having, a few days after he was declared emperor, married his daughter Antonia to Cn. Pompeius, he would not suffer the people to make any public rejoicings on that occasion, nor even on his own birth-day, or on the anniversary of his accession to the empire^g. He no sooner began to exercise the authority with which he was invested, than he suppressed the law of majesty, which under the two preceding emperors had proved so fatal to Rome. At the same time, he called home all the exiles; eased the people of the tributes with which Caius had loaded them; forbade such as had any relations of their own, however distant, to name him among their heirs; restored the estates, which had been unjustly seized by Tiberius and Caius, to the owners or their heirs: ordered all the statues, which Caius had caused to be brought to Rome from Greece and other countries to be carried back, and restored to the cities whence they had been taken, &c. With these and innumerable other instances of his clemency, justice, and good-nature, he won the hearts of the people to such a degree, that upon a groundless report of his being assassinated, they raised dreadful disturbances in the city, calling the soldiers traitors, the senate parricides, and loading with horrible curses and imprecations all whom they suspected to have been any ways accessory to his death. The tumult continued till the magistrates assured the people from the rostra, that Claudius was only gone to Ostia, whence he would return in a short time^h. But the zeal, which the people shewed on this and several other occasions for his safety, was not sufficient to cure his natural timorousness. His friends could not prevail upon him, during the first month of his reign, to appear once in the senate, because Cæsar the dictator had been murdered there. He caused all, whom he admitted to his presence, to be first narrowly searched, lest they should have some weapon concealed under their garments. It was a long time before he could be persuaded to excuse women, and even children, from being searched in a very rude and unbecoming manner. At public entertainments he was constantly surrounded by his guards, whom he also obliged to attend him at table, distrusting the domestics even of his most intimate friends. He never failed to visit in person such of the senators as were indisposed, but always sent his guards before to search every corner of the houseⁱ. However, these unnecessary and ridiculous precautions did not render him so contemptible in the eyes of the multitude, as the weakness and want of judgment, which he betrayed in the administration of justice. He was no ways qualified for that office; but nevertheless could not be prevented from hearing and deciding the most intricate causes, which served only to expose him to public derision, and often to insults, which he bore with incredible patience. Suetonius tells us, that a Greek, pleading one day before him, not only reproached him with ignorance, but called him to his face an old fool; and that a Roman knight, thinking himself wronged by him, had the boldness to throw his pen-knife at him, which wounded him in the cheek^k. We are not told, that he ever resented these gross affronts; which sufficiently shews the weakness of his understanding.

In the first year of his reign, he enlarged the kingdom of Agrippa, who had greatly contributed to his advancement, with the addition of Judea and Samaria, which had been

(U) When news of Caligula's death reached Gaul, several persons of distinction in that province solicited Servius Sulpicius Galba, who commanded on the Rhine, to lay hold of that opportunity, and seize the sovereignty for himself. The legions too offered to stand by him, thinking they had as good a right

been formerly possessed by his grandfather Herod the Great. To his brother Herod he gave the principality of Chalcis at the foot of mount Libanus; and granted to both the privilege of entering the senate, allowing Agrippa to appear there with consular, and Herod with prætorial, ornaments¹. He also restored Mithridates the Iberian to his kingdom, Mithridates the Cilician to the kingdom of Bosphorus; and Antiochus to that of Comagene, who had been all unjustly deprived of their dominions by *Caius*². Soon after his accession to the empire, he recalled his two nieces, Agrippina and Julia, from the island of Pontia, to which they had been confined by their brother Caius; but his wife Messalina, who governed him with an absolute sway, jealous of the power which Julia assumed, prevailed upon him to send her back this very year to the place of her former banishment, under pretence that she was guilty of adultery and several other crimes, which by the envious Messalina were laid to her charge, but never proved. The celebrated Seneca had his share in the misfortunes of the unhappy princess, being after his quaestorship banished to the island of Corfica, upon a bare, and, as is commonly believed, altogether groundless, suspicion of a criminal conversation with her³. This year, the Romans gained some advantages over the Mauritanians, who had taken arms to revenge the death of Ptolemy their king, barbarously assassinated by Caius's orders⁴. About the same time, Sulpicius Galba overcame the Catti, and P. Gabinius Secundus the Marfi, two German nations. Gabinius after his victory had the good luck to discover and bring back with him to Rome one of the eagles, which the Germans had taken upon the defeat of Varus. For these victories Claudius took the triumphal ornaments and the title of emperor. Gabinius defeated likewise the Chauci, another German nation, and was allowed by Claudius, on account of his gallant behaviour on that occasion, to assume the surname of *Chaucius*⁵.

THE following year, Claudius entered upon his second consulship, having for his colleague C. Lælius, but held it only for two months: to whom he resigned the fasces we are no-where told; Lælius continued consul to the end of the year. The emperor, when he first assembled the senate in quality of consul, obliged all the senators to bind themselves by a solemn oath to observe all the laws of Augustus; took the same oath himself; but would not allow any of the magistrates or senators to lay themselves under any obligation with respect to his own laws⁶. This year the Mauritanians were defeated anew by Suetonius Paulinus, who extended his conquests to the river Nigris, which separates Africa from Æthiopia. Cn. Hosidius Geta, succeeding Paulinus in the command of the Roman troops in Africa, gave Salabas, the Mauritanian general, two great overthrows, which obliged the whole country to submit to the yoke. Claudius divided the kingdom of Mauritania into two provinces, viz. the Cæsariensis and the Tingitana, the former being so called from Cæsar, a name now common to all the emperors, and the latter from Tingis, now Tangier, the metropolis of that province. Both these provinces were, by the appointment of Claudius, governed by Roman knights⁷ (W). This year Claudius caused a law to be passed, commanding, that those who were named by the senate to the government of provinces, should depart from Rome before the beginning of *April*⁸; but the year following he allowed them to stay in Rome, till the middle of that month. At the same time, he published an edict, forbidding those, whom he should charge

(W) Dion Cassius tells us, that Geta pursued the Mauritanians beyond mount Atlas; and that while he was in those dry and sandy countries in great distress for want of water, a magician, who lived there, taught him certain charms, which, he said, were frequently practised by the inhabitants with wonderful success, when they wanted water. Geta gave no great credit to the magician; but being prompted, partly by curiosity, partly by the distress he was in, to make use of the charms which the Mauritanian had taught him, he was greatly surprised to see all on a sudden the sky overcast, and a great quantity of water fall from heaven. The barbarians, concluding from thence, that the gods favoured the Romans, sent deputies to treat with, and submitted to, Geta, upon his own terms. Thus Dion Cassius (7). We read in Pliny, that Claudius sent a colony to Tingis, which city he named Julia Traducta (8). But we are inclined to believe, that this colony was sent to Tingis by Julius Cæsar, since it is mentioned by Strabo (9), who died before the reign of Claudius. Vossius takes Pliny to have been mistaken in giving to Tingis in Africa the name of Julia Traducta, which, in his opinion, was peculiar to the city of Tingis in Spain, built in the time of Julius Cæsar, and peopled with inhabitants from Tingis in Africa (10).

charge with the government of provinces, to return him thanks, as was customary, in the senate; since they owed no obligations to him; but he on the contrary was greatly indebted to them, for easing him of part of his burden^g. The great famine, which raged this year at Rome; prompted Claudius to undertake the forming of a large and convenient haven at the mouth of the Tiber, which great work he happily completed, though Cæsar the dictator, if some mistake is not crept into Suetonius, had many years before attempted it in vain^h. It was an undertaking; says Dion Cassius, worthy of the grandeur of the Roman empire; but the successors of Claudius were not able to maintain it; so that soon after his death it was choaked up with sand and became quite uselessⁱ (X). At the same time, Claudius undertook the draining of the lake Fucinus, in the country of the Marfi, and the conveying of its waters, by a deep canal, into the Tiber, or rather the Liris, in which work he employed thirty thousand men for eleven years together; but to no effect; as we shall see in the tenth year of his reign.

Messalina.

THIS year, Messalina and Claudius's freedmen began to abuse the prince's weakness and the too great power he allowed them, to the destruction of such of the nobility as gave them umbrage, or any ways incurred their displeasure. The first who fell by their treachery was Appius Silanus, a person of great distinction and known integrity. He married to his first wife Æmilia Lepida, grand-daughter to Julia the daughter of Augustus, and had by her L. Junius Silanus, to whom Claudius had betrothed his daughter Octavia. Upon the death of Æmilia Lepida, which happened this year, Claudius, who held him in the number of his most intimate friends, persuaded him to marry Domitia Lepida, mother to his own wife Messalina. But to his great misfortune the empress, whose lewdness knew no bounds, fell in love with him herself, and was not ashamed to disclose to him her passion. Silanus rejected with the utmost indignation her incestuous solicitations, which provoked her to such a degree, that she resolved upon his ruin, and compassed it with the concurrence of the freedman Narcissus in the following manner. Narcissus rushed into Claudius's chamber one morning by break of day as in a great fright, and told the emperor, who was still in bed, that he had dreamt Silanus designed to murder him that very day. Messalina, as had been agreed on beforehand, pretending to hear the freedman's account with surprise and amazement, assured the emperor, that she had been for several nights together frightened with the same dream. In the mean time, Silanus, who had been told the day before, that he was to wait upon the emperor at that hour, suddenly came in; which so terrified Claudius, of all men the most timorous, that, without any further inquiries, he commanded him to be immediately seized and executed. The same day he acquainted the senate with what had passed, and was not ashamed publicly to return thanks to his freedman for watching over his safety, even in his sleep^k (Y). The death of Silanus alarmed the nobility, who thinking their lives and estates precarious under a weak prince, intirely governed by his wife and freedmen, resolved by his death to put an end to their reign, and deliver themselves from the dangers that threatened. Annius Vinicianus, or, as Josephus calls him, Minucianus, who had acted a chief part in the murder

(X) Suetonius calls it the port of Ostia, though it lay on the other side of the Tiber over-against Ostia at a place still called by the inhabitants il porto, the haven. The same writer tells us, that at the entrance of the harbour was sunk the vessel, in which the great obelisk we spoke of in the preceding reign, was brought out of Egypt, as a foundation for the piles, upon which was raised a high tower, according to the model of the Pharos of Alexandria (11).

(Y) Suetonius tells us, that a person, who had a suit at law depending before Claudius, in the same manner rid himself of his adversary, telling him he had dreamt the night before, that he was assassinated; and afterwards, when his adversary appeared, whispering him in the ear, that he was the assassin. This was enough for Claudius to have him immediately apprehended and executed, as if he had been convicted. The poor unmanly wretch was at the least apprehension of danger easily put upon the most cruel and sanguinary precautions, fear getting the better of his reason and temper, which had naturally no bias to cruelty. When returned to himself, he often testified great grief and concern for the executions which he had commanded in a sudden fright, without knowing what he did or said: nay, we are told, that he frequently inquired what was become of those very persons who had been executed by his orders; that he sometimes sent to invite them to dine with him the very next day, and was under the utmost concern, when informed of their death, protesting with tears in his eyes, that he had given no such orders (12). Thus was his whole life governed by fears, and his fears by his wives and freedmen: hence many bloody executions, according to the degree of his own timorousness, or of their ambition, revenge, and avarice.

a murder of Caius, and after his death had been by the senate judged equal to the empire, was at the head of the conspiracy, and drew into it Furius Camillus Scribonianus, governor of Dalmatia, who had been consul ten years before, and with him a great number of knights and senators. Camillus, who was at the head of a powerful army, openly declared his design, and by assuring the troops under his command that he had nothing in view but to restore Rome to her antient liberty, persuaded them to take an oath of allegiance to him; and at the same time, as he was well acquainted with Claudius's timorous temper, he wrote a letter to him filled with reproaches, and threatening him with a cruel death, if he did not forthwith resign the empire, and, betaking himself to a private and retired life, save him the trouble and charge of making war upon him. The coward was so terrified with this letter, that he assembled, in the utmost consternation, his friends, to deliberate with them, whether or no he should resign the sovereign power to Camillus? But he was soon delivered from his fears; for Camillus's soldiers, not being able, by some strange accident, to remove their ensigns, when they were ordered to march out and meet their new emperor, began upon that omen to repent of their revolt, and being persuaded that the gods disapproved of it, fell upon their officers; and cut most of them in pieces. Camillus himself found means to escape to the island of Issa on the coast of Dalmatia, where he was stabbed in the arms of his wife Junia by a common soldier, named Vologinius, after he had bore the name of emperor for five days¹. Upon his death most of the conspirators, and among the rest Vinicianus, laid violent hands on themselves; some were seized and executed, and some by purchasing with large sums the favour of Messalina and the emperor's freedmen, never were, though notoriously guilty, inquired after, while many innocent knights and senators were, under colour of being concerned in the conspiracy, stripped of their estates by the rapacious Messalina and Narcissus, and either sent into banishment, or executed without mercy. Dion Cassius tells us, that one of Camilla's freedmen, by name Golefes, being apprehended and brought before the senate, spoke there with great courage and freedom. Whereupon Narcissus, who was present among the emperor's attendants and stood behind him, making up to the freedman, asked him, What would you have done, if your master had got possession of the empire? I should have kept behind him, said he, and, mindful of my condition, not presumed to speak in his presence^m. The courage and resolution of Arria is celebrated by most of the antient writers. She was wife to Cæcina Pætus, a consular man, who, having joined Camillus, was seized in Dalmatia, and sent to be tried at Rome. Arria being by the merciless soldiers denied the satisfaction of attending her husband in the same vessel; followed him in another, and arriving at Rome, there publicly reproached Junia, the wife of Camillus, with want of courage and conjugal affection, in living after she had seen her husband inhumanly murdered in her arms. Her friends, concluding from thence, that she was resolved not to outlive her husband, watched her day and night; but she, to convince them that all their precautions were to no effect, beat her head against the wall with such violence, that her friends, for some time, believed her dead. However, she recovered; but finding she could not, with all her interest, for she was in great favour with Messalina, save her husband, and that he had not the courage to fall by his own hand, she took a dagger, plunged it into her own breast, and pulling it out again, presented it to her husband, saying, *Non dolet; I don't feel it*ⁿ. Martial makes her say, I don't feel my wound, but shall feel yours^o (Z). Otho, father to the emperor of that name, being appointed to succeed Camillus in the command of the troops in Dalmatia, had the courage to cause the heads of those soldiers, who had any hand in the murder of their officers, to be cut off

(Z) This action of Arria is mightily cried up by the antients, especially by Pliny the younger: but nevertheless, that judicious writer thinks his heroine far more commendable for the constancy and resolution she shewed in dissembling the extreme grief she felt on the death of one of her children, than her husband who was dangerously ill and tenderly loved the child, might not be acquainted with his misfortune, till he was perfectly recovered. The constancy and intrepidity she shewed at her death proceeded probably from vanity and a certain fondness for fame, says Pliny; but her manly behaviour in the height of her grief was the effect of the most refined virtue, since she could not be prompted to it by any prospect of fame or glory (13).

off in his presence; nay in the midst of the camp, though he well knew, that Claudius had approved of what they had done, and even advanced some of them to considerable posts in the army. This conduct displeased the emperor; but Otho soon regained his favour, by discovering a conspiracy formed against him by a Roman knight, who was apprehended, convicted, and thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock, by the consuls and tribunes of the people^p.

The two Julia's put to death.

Claudius designs to subdue Britain.

Plautius passes over into that island.

THE following year, Claudius was the third time consul, having for his colleague L. Vitellius, the second time consul. Claudius held that dignity, according to Suetonius^q, only two months; but, according to Dion Cassius, to the beginning of July^r, when both he and his colleague resigned the fasces to Decimus Haterius Agrippa and C. Sulpicius Galba, as we learn from an antient inscription^t. This year, Claudius deprived the Lycians of their liberty, to put a stop to the differences that reigned amongst them, and to punish them for having in a tumult put some Roman citizens to death^b. Their country was added to the province of Pamphylia^u (A). In Rome, Messalina, abusing the absolute sway she had over her weak husband, persuaded him by her malicious insinuations first to put to death his niece Julia, the daughter of Germanicus, whom he had banished the year before to the island of Pontia, and afterwards Julia, the daughter of Drusus and grand-daughter of Tiberius: she was likewise niece to Claudius, being the daughter of his sister Livilla. They were both condemned and executed, says Suetonius, without being allowed to defend themselves, though no-body could prove the charge that was brought against them^w. However, the latter Julia well deserved on another score the doom that overtook her; for she was chiefly instrumental, as we have related above, in the ruin of her husband Nero the son of Germanicus. When Claudius quitted his consulship, the senate decreed him triumphal ornaments, which put him upon undertaking some enterprize that might intitle him to a real triumph. The theatre he chose for his warlike exploits was Britain, at that time harassed with civil wars. Some Britons of distinction having abandoned their own country, to avoid the fury of the factions that raged there, and taken refuge in Gaul, their countrymen complained, not without threats, of the Romans for entertaining them, and insisted upon their being sent back. This served as a pretence to make war upon them, one of the fugitives, by name Bericus, persuaded the emperor by many arguments to attempt the conquest of that great island, which no Roman had ever dared to invade since the time of Cæsar the dictator. At his instigation, Claudius dispatched orders to Plautius, who had succeeded Gabinus in the command of the troops in Lower Germany, to convey, without delay, all his forces over into Britain. This order was not relished by the soldiery, who, in a mutiny declared, That they would not make war out of the compass of the world. Hereupon Claudius sent his freedman Narcissus to appease the mutiny, and encourage the disheartened legions to obey their general. Narcissus, upon his arrival, ascended the tribunal, and thence began to harangue the legions, who, provoked at the audaciousness of the slave, abused him with most opprobrious language, bidding him quit the camp, and return to the masquerades and plays at Rome; for they were determined, without his harangues, to follow their general. Accordingly, they immediately began their march to the sea-side; and imbarquing on the vessels, which Plautius had with incredible expedition got ready for that purpose, landed in Britain, before

(A) The Lycians on this occasion sent a deputation to Claudius, at the head of which was one of their country, who enjoyed the rights of a Roman citizen; but Claudius, finding he did not understand the Latin tongue, caused his name to be razed out of the roll of citizens: he treated in the same manner many others, whom he judged unworthy of the Roman name (14). He forbade under severe penalties such as were not free of the city to assume the name of any family in Rome; and even condemned some persons to death, and caused them to be publicly executed, for no other crime, but because they had falsely passed themselves upon the world for Roman citizens. But notwithstanding this rigor, he granted the freedom of the city to an infinite number of persons of all nations, who had wherewithal to purchase it of Messalina or his freedmen. It was at first sold at a very high rate, but became afterwards so common, that it was purchased, as was then said by way of raillery, for a broken glass (15). Hence Seneca wrote in the invectives he published against Claudius, that if he had lived longer, he would have made all the Greeks, Gauls, and Spaniards free of Rome (16). This to Seneca seemed very absurd; but was afterwards practised by other emperors, and, in the opinion of St. Austin, very wisely (17).

a before the inhabitants had any notice of their design, whom therefore they easily defeated in several skirmishes, and advanced as far as the Thames. But Plautius, not thinking it safe to penetrate farther into the country, wrote to Claudius, pursuant to his instructions, acquainting him with the progress he had already made, and the dangers he apprehended from a farther pursuit of his conquests. Upon the receipt of this letter, the emperor, who had drawn together a good number of legions, and kept them in a readiness to march to the assistance of his lieutenant in Britain, left Rome, and imbarquing at Ostia, sailed to Marseilles (B); thence he marched by land to Gessoriacum, now, as is commonly believed, Boulogne, and from that place set sail for Britain, where he landed without opposition; and joining Plautius, whom b he found incamped on the banks of the Thames, which he passed, defeated the enemy, Is followed by Claudius. and made himself master of several strong-holds, among the rest of Camalodunum, now Maldon in Essex, according to Cambden, where stood the palace of Cynobelinus, one of the British kings. In this expedition Vespasian distinguished himself in a very eminent manner; for partly under Plautius, partly under Claudius himself, he fought thirty pitched battles, subdued two powerful nations, took twenty strong towns and upwards, and reduced the island Vetis, or the island of Wight. Claudius, having disarmed the Britons who had submitted, appointed Plautius governor of the conquered provinces, and, charging him to pursue his conquests, returned in His conquests there. great haste to Rome, which, however, he did not enter till the next year; but the senate decreed both to him and his son the surname of Britannicus (C).

THE following year, L. Quinctius Crispinus being the second time consul with M. Statilius Taurus, Claudius was received at Rome with a most magnificent triumph (D): His triumph: and the senate, to encourage the emperor and his lieutenants to pursue their conquests, decreed, that all the treaties made by them should have the same force, as if made by the senate and people of Rome. Claudius after his triumph restored to the senate the provinces of Achaia and Macedon, which thenceforth began to be governed again by proconsuls. He likewise honoured M. Julius Cottius, prince of the Alps called Cottia, with the title of king, and enlarged his barren territories; but deprived the Rhodians of their liberty for crucifying some Roman citizens, which d however, he restored to them nine years after, that is, in the fifty-third year of the christian æra.

(B) Claudius, before he set out from Rome, committed the government of the city, and the command of the troops left there, to Lucius Vitellius the father of the emperor of that name, and this year the emperor's colleague in the consulship. He was a man of parts and valour; but, as we have observed already, a most infamous and slavish flatterer of persons in power. Being appointed, we may say, regent in the absence of Claudius, he discharged his trust with great credit and integrity. Suetonius tells us, that Claudius put off his departure from Rome for a few days upon a slight indisposition; which seized Sulpicius Galba, afterwards emperor; so highly was he favoured and beloved by Claudius after the discovery of the abovementioned conspiracy. Claudius in his passage from Ostia to Marseilles was twice in danger of being shipwrecked, which induced him to pursue his journey from Marseilles to Boulogne by land (18).

(C) Claudius set out from Rome on his British expedition about the beginning of July, and returned to the city in the beginning of January (19). He staid in Britain a few days, says Suetonius (20); sixteen days, says Dion Cassius (21). On his return he imbarqued on the Po, and, entering by one of the mouths of that river the Adriatic sea, landed at Ostia (22). Suetonius tells us in one place, that he left the island without fighting one battle, nay without bloodshed (23); and in another (24), that Vespasian, partly under Plautius, partly under Claudius himself, fought thirty battles. The latter is agreeable to what we read in Dion Cassius, whom we have followed. Eutropius (25) and S. Jerom (26) fix to this year the conquest of the islands Orcades. But Tacitus writes, that they were not subdued by, or known to, the Romans, till the reign of Vespasian (27). They were not perhaps subdued, but they were certainly known this very year to the Romans, since Pomponius Mela mentions them in his description of the world, which he wrote while Claudius was waging war in Britain (28).

(D) That the shew might be more glorious by the concourse of people, he not only gave leave to the governors of provinces to be present at it, but permitted several banished persons to return home on purpose to behold it. In the solemnity his wife Messalina, magnificently adorned, followed him at some distance in a stately chariot. He mounted the steps of the capitol on his knees, being supported by his two sons-in-law. Among the spoils of the enemy, he placed a naval crown on the top of his palace hard by the civic crown, in token of his victory over the sea (29).

Claudius.

THE next consuls were M. Vinicius, whom Claudius named to that dignity, though he had caused his wife Julia the daughter of Germanicus to be put to death, and T. Statilius Taurus Corvinus. As the city was filled with statues, Claudius enacted a law, forbidding any new statues to be erected within the walls of Rome, without the consent of the senate, and at the same time ordered a great many already raised to be taken away^d. He punished with great severity some governors of provinces, who had oppressed the people they were set over, and enacted several wholesome laws for bringing such to justice as should for the future be guilty of the same fault; ordering all governors to return to Rome, as soon as the time of their command was expired, to answer there the complaints that might be brought against them. The prerogative of granting leave to senators to travel out of Italy, which Augustus had lodged in the senate, he claimed himself, and obliged the senate to yield it to him by a decree^e. This year, on the first day of August about an hour after mid-day, happened an eclipse of the sun. The emperor, as this was his birth-day, took care to give notice of it to the people before-hand, that they might not be surprised at that phenomenon, or draw bad omens from it^f.

Vinicius poisoned by Mes-
salina.

IN the following consulate of Valerius Asiaticus and M. Junius Silanus, died M. Vinicius, brother-in-law to Claudius, being poisoned by Messalina. He was a man of a quiet temper and lived retired, concerning himself only in the affairs of his family; but, to his misfortune, the lewd Messalina conceived a violent passion for him, and poisoned him, because he could not by any solicitations be prevailed upon to injure Claudius^g. Asinius Gallus, the son of Agrippina Tiberius's first wife, conspired this year against the emperor, with a design to seize the sovereign power for himself; but the conspiracy being discovered, Claudius only condemned him to banishment, as a person from whom he had nothing to apprehend, since he was of a very low stature, ill-shaped, of a very deformed countenance, and so inconsiderate, that he had aspired to the sovereignty, though quite destitute both of friends and money, upon the bare supposition, that he should be immediately acknowledged by all on account of his noble descent. This generous behaviour in Claudius was highly commended by persons of all ranks; and no less pleasing to the people was the decree, which he got passed in the senate, forbidding freedmen to appear in judgment against their patrons, and empowering their masters to deprive them of their liberty, and bring them back to the chain, when they proved ungrateful, or gave them any just motive of complaint^h (E).

THE next year, Claudius was consul the fourth time with Lucius Vitellius, the third time consul; but after two months resigned that dignity, and took upon him the office of censor, chusing for his colleague Lucius Vitellius already consul, who, as we have often observed, had a wonderful talent for flattery (F). In the discharge of this important office, Claudius performed some things highly commendable, but in others gave such instances of his weakness and want of understanding, as exposed him to public derision. He published above twenty edicts in one day, most of them quite trifling and ridiculous; by one of them, for instance, he warned the senate and people to

(E) S. Jerom tells us (30), that Thrace, which had hitherto been governed by kings, was this year, the fifth of Claudius and forty-seventh of the Christian æra, reduced to a Roman province. Eusebius likewise writes, that Rhemetalces, king of Thrace, being killed by his own wife, Claudius conquered that country. But of this memorable event no mention is made by the Greek or Latin writers, whose works have reached our times.

(F) He left no stone unturned, says Suetonius, to work himself into the favour of Claudius: observing him intirely addicted to his wife Messalina and his freedmen, he begged of the former, as the greatest favour she could bestow upon him, that she would grant him the honour of pulling off her shoes. Messalina, well pleased to see a man of his quality and parts proud of that office, granted him his request; and Vitellius, the first time he discharged his honourable employment, carried away one of her shoes, and wore it constantly in his bosom, not being ashamed to pull it out in public and often kiss it. The golden images of Pallas and Narcissus, the emperor's reigning freedmen, he worshipped amongst his household gods. When Claudius entertained the people with the secular games, so called, because they were exhibited but once in a century, his compliment to him was, Sape facias; May you many times exhibit these sports. Not only Claudius, who was a weak prince, but his wives and freedmen, were so taken with the gross and fulsome flattery of this fawning slave, that they not only raised him to the first employments in the empire, but likewise his two sons, whom he had the satisfaction to see consuls in the same year, the one succeeding the other (31). His elder son was afterwards raised to the empire.

a to take care that their wine-vessels were well pitched, since there was that year great plenty of grapes; by another he acquainted them, that the juice of the yew-tree was the best remedy of all against the sting of a viper. When he came to inquire into the manners of the Roman knights, he dismissed a young man most notoriously vicious, without any punishment, because his father gave him a good character, telling him, You have a censor at home. Another, infamous for debauching both married and unmarried women, he only admonished, *either to live chaste, or to be lewd more warily; for why must I know, said he, with what women you keep company?*¹ This year was remarkable for the deaths of several persons of great distinction, whom Claudius, at the instigation of Messalina, caused to be executed. Cn. Pompeius Magnus, who had married Antonia, the emperor's eldest daughter, fell the first. He was of an illustrious family, but not descended from Pompey the Great, being the son of Crassus Frugi, who likewise bore the surname of Great. His credit with the prince, his great nobility, and extraordinary parts, by giving umbrage to Messalina, occasioned his ruin. He was condemned and had his head cut off by a soldier sent to him for that purpose, without so much as knowing that he was accused^k: so great and absolute was the sway, which Messalina had obtained over her weak, timorous, and credulous husband. At the same time, Crassus, the father of Pompeius, and his mother Scribonia were by the order of Claudius put to death, though the former intirely resembled him, being, to use the expression of Seneca, as great a monster as himself, and therefore no less qualified to be emperor^l. Several other persons of this ancient and illustrious family were at the same time sacrificed to the jealousy of Messalina and the fears of Claudius^m. Upon the death of Pompeius, the emperor married his daughter Antonia to *Cornelius Sylla Faustus*ⁿ, brother to Messalina; if Zonaras is to be credited^o, who had a son by her, upon whose birth Claudius would not suffer any public demonstrations of joy. Many knights and senators of rank were after the death of Pompeius accused of conspiring against the prince, some of whom Claudius pardoned, that is, such as he did not fear; but Valerius Asiaticus (G) was prosecuted without mercy for no other crime, but because he possessed, and had embellished with extraordinary magnificence, the fine gardens of Lucullus, which Messalina coveted. He was charged with a design of withdrawing into Gaul, to stir up his countrymen to a revolt; for he was a native of Vienne in that province, and supported there by numerous and powerful families, all his own relations. He was accused by Sofibius, preceptor to Britannicus (H), who easily prevailed upon the weak and timorous prince to secure his life and empire, by the destruction of his pretended enemy and rival. Crispinus, commander of the prætorian guards, was immediately dispatched with a body of soldiers to seize him at Baiæ; which he did accordingly, and hurried him to Rome in chains. He was tried, not in the senate, but in the emperor's chamber, in the presence of Messalina. However, he pleaded his cause with such eloquence and energy, that he forced tears both from Claudius and Messalina.

(G) Valerius Asiaticus was a native of Vienne in Gaul, and very powerful in that province on account of his wealth and numerous dependents. He had been one of Caius's most intimate friends; but that prince having first debauched his wife, and afterwards bragged of it in a public assembly in his presence, the brave Gaul, who had too much spirit to put up such an affront, resolved to be revenged on the outrageous tyrant; and accordingly with great readiness entered into the conspiracy, nay, became, according to Tacitus, the principal director in the plot; though he had no share, as we are told by Josephus and Dion Cassius, in the execution of it. When the senate, after the assassination, were for punishing the conspirators, Valerius rising up, commended the action, owned himself privy to it, and publicly wished he had had the glory of dispatching the tyrant with his own hand. The senators, animated by his firmness and resolution, took courage; granted impunity to the conspirators, and were even for decreeing them rewards (32). Valerius had been consul, the year before, the second time, having been once honoured with that dignity in the preceding reign.

(H) This is probably the Sofibius, whose writings are quoted by Arnobius, Clemens of Alexandria, and Suidas. He was instructed by Messalina to warn Claudius under the mask of zeal, that great wealth in the hands of private men proved always dangerous to princes; that Valerius was, on account of his immense riches and powerful alliances in Gaul, capable of disputing the empire with him; that he was not only highly esteemed by his countrymen the Gauls, but in mighty favour with the Roman people; that it was already a prevailing rumour through all the provinces, that he designed to put himself at the head of the armies, &c. (33). These malicious and groundless insinuations were sufficient to put the timorous Claudius upon the most cruel and bloody precautions.

Messalina herself. But the empress, fearing pity and tenderness should get the better of her other passions, left the room, and in going out, whispered L. Vitellius in the ear not to let the accused escape^p. As Valerius declared that he had never before seen any of the witnesses, who were produced against him, Sosibius at last brought in one, who, he said, was well acquainted with him. He had beforehand informed his evidence, that Valerius was bald; and therefore upon his entering the room he desired him in the first place to tell them which was Valerius Asiaticus: I have been long acquainted with him, and that is he, said the witness, pointing at another bald person, who happened to be present. This convinced Claudius, that Asiaticus was free from all guilt; but while he was deliberating about clearing him, the treacherous Vitellius, throwing himself at his feet, and putting him in mind of the good services of Asiaticus to the commonwealth, of his attachment to Antonia, the prince's mother, of his gallant behaviour in the late British expedition, &c. begged him in the end with many tears to display his mercy, by granting to so worthy and deserving a citizen the free choice of his own death. Claudius, without further consideration, complied with his request; which was in effect condemning Asiaticus, who thereupon opened his veins and bled to death^q (I). Messalina, not satisfied with the ruin of Asiaticus, suborned persons, who urged Poppæa, with whom he was supposed to carry on a criminal conversation, to lay violent hands on herself, to avoid the disgrace of a shameful imprisonment, with which they threatened her. The emperor was so utterly unapprised of her unhappy end, that her husband Scipio being a few days after at table with him, he asked him why he came without his wife? Scipio answered, that she was dead; but dared not mention the particulars of her death. Afterwards two illustrious Roman knights, surnamed Petræ, were accused and condemned, because one of them had had a dream, which was supposed to portend some misfortune, either to Claudius or the empire (K).

As the pleaders at this time exacted exorbitant fees from their clients, and often of both parties, a complaint of this grievance being begun by Caius Silius, consul elect, the whole senate concurred, and demanded, that the Cincian law might be revived, injoining that no man should, for pleading a cause, accept of any gift or payment. The demand of the senate was with great vehemence promoted by Silius, and with equal ardor opposed by the pleaders (L). Claudius favoured the latter, and

(I) He behaved with great firmness and intrepidity both at his trial and after his condemnation; besides the charge of treason, he was accused of winking at the licentiousness of the soldiery, of neglecting military discipline, of carrying on an adulterous amour with Poppæa, the mother of that Poppæa, who became so infamous in the reign of Nero, and lastly with surrendering his person, like an harlot, to unnatural lust. This last article Asiaticus could not brook; but interrupting the accuser, by name Suilius, a person, it seems, of some rank, Ask thy own sons, Suilius, said he, they will satisfy thee that I am a man. After his condemnation, he continued his usual exercises, walking, bathing, and even supping cheerfully, telling his friends, that it would have been more to his credit to have fallen by the craft of Tiberius, or the fury of Claudius, than thus to perish by the dark devices of a woman, and the treachery of such a base and prostitute sycophant as Vitellius. After supper he viewed his funeral pile, and ordered it to be removed to another place, lest the heat and smoke should hurt his trees, and lessen their cool shade: After this he opened his veins without betraying the least concern, and bled to death (34).

(K) Some writers say, that he saw Claudius in a dream crowned with a garland of the ears of corn, their beards downwards, which was interpreted to foretel a public famine: others have wrote, that the chaplet he saw was of vine-branches with white leaves, which he construed to portend the death of the prince at the close of autumn. But whatever he dreamt, both he and his brother were sacrificed, partly for a dream, and partly for accommodating, as was pretended, Asiaticus and Poppæa with the use of their house for their private assignations.

(L) Silius urged the examples of the ancient orators who had required no other reward for pleading, but present applause and the praises of posterity. By allowing orators to take fees, we put them upon the level with mechanics, said he, and debase eloquence, of all accomplishments the most glorious and honourable, to sordid lucre: besides, if eloquence once becomes venal, orators will, upon the prospect of greater gain, be tempted to betray those whom they have undertaken to defend; they will promote enmities, accusations, mutual hatred, quarrels, &c. as a sure means of enriching themselves: if no man finds his advantage in defending suits; there will be few suits to defend: as diseases are the market of physicians, so will our quarrels and animosities prove the revenue of the pleaders, who will therefore take care to inflame us against each other, and keep us always at variance. They might remember Caius Asinius, M. Messala, and more lately Arruntius, and Esernius, who were raised to the highest dignities of the state by an unblemished life and an eloquence never exposed to sale. Thus spoke Silius. In answer to him, the pleaders owned, that fame was indeed the greatest reward a man could wish for, but uncertain, and therefore not to be depended upon; that the practice of pleading was intended for the good of mankind, was a common refuge for all men, and prevented the powerful and mighty from oppressand therefore the senate, instead of subjecting them; as they designed, to the penalties of the law against extortion, if they took any fee at all, or even present for; pleading; contented themselves with settling their fees, which were not to exceed two hundred and fifty crowns, and declaring those who were not satisfied with that sum, guilty of extortion. The same year the Cherusci, who inhabited the present duchy of Brunswick, had recourse to Claudius for a king; who sent them Italicus, son to Tilavius the brother of the famous Arminius. Italicus was born at Rome, and brought up there after the Roman manner; which induced the Cherusci, though they received him at first with great joy to take arms against him, and drive him from the throne. He was afterwards restored by the Longobards, and; being supported by them, oppressed in a most tyrannical manner the Cherustan state. At the same time, Sanguinius, governor of Lower Germany, being dead, the Chauci made incursions into that province; but Gn. Domitius Corbulo, the greatest commander of his age, who was sent to succeed Sanguinius, obliged them to retire, pursued them into their own country, and would have forced them to submit to the Roman yoke, had not Claudius, who feared Corbulo more than he did the Germans, put a stop to his conquests, and ordered him to lead back all the Roman forces over the Rhine. Corbulo obeyed without uttering more than that happy were the Roman commanders in former times. As he had taken great pains to restore the antient discipline amongst the legions, whom he found utter strangers to military toils, that they might not relapse into a habit of idleness, he employed them in digging a canal three-and-twenty miles long between the Meuse and the Rhine, to receive the high tides, and prevent inundations. A modern writer takes this to be the canal known at present by the name of Fliet, which extends from Skys on the Meuse to Leyden on the Rhine. The emperor granted to Corbulo triumphal ornaments, though he would not allow him to prosecute the war. He was succeeded by Curtius Rufus, who, though of a mean extraction, arrived at the consular dignity, commanded armies, and died proconsul of Africa (M)^u. Towards the end of the year, Aulus Plautius, returning from Britain, was received by Claudius with great marks of distinction, and honoured with an ovation, the emperor himself attending him in that ceremony, and yielding to him the most honourable place^w. P. Ostorius Scapula succeeded Plautius in the government of Britain, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter. About this time, a Roman knight, by name Cneius Novius, was discovered armed with a dagger, among those who were paying their court to the prince. When put to the rack, he confessed his design of murdering the emperor; but, though cruelly tortured, would never discover his accomplices, nor even the motives, which had put him upon that attempt^x.

pressing those who were not by themselves in a condition to withstand them; neither was eloquence acquired without pains and expence; since they who professed it, neglected their domestic concerns to apply themselves to the business of others. Many followed the profession of war, many that of husbandry, and by both professions a livelihood was acquired; nay, nothing was pursued by any man, but with a view to the advantages it produced. As for Afinius, Messala, &c. they were either enriched by the civil wars, or heirs of wealthy houses; and therefore might well be above gain, and plead only for glory; but equally obvious were the examples of P. Clodius and Caius Curio, who never pleaded but for extravagant fees; for themselves, as the study of eloquence had proved very chargeable to them, they thought it but reasonable that they should reap some advantage from it. These considerations appearing of no small force to Claudius, the revival of the Cincian law was dropt (35). This law was enacted by M. Cincius, tribune of the people in the year of Rome 549, and revived by Augustus, who caused it to be confirmed by a decree of the senate (36).

(M) He was, according to some writers, the son of a gladiator. When he grew to a man, he attended a Roman quæstor into Africa, where while he was walking at Adrumetum, in the middle of the day, under a porch, a woman above human size appeared before him, and accosted him with these words; Thou, Rufus, shalt one day govern this province with proconsular power. Animated with hopes from this presage, he returned to Rome, where, by the liberality of his friends and his own qualifications, he gained the quæstorship, and afterwards standing for the office of prætor in competition with several persons of great distinction, carried it by the interest of Tiberius, who gave him this encomium: To me Curtius Rufus seems to be descended from himself. He was, says Tacitus, a servile flatterer of those above him, but arrogant to his inferiors: he lived to a great age, arrived at the consulate, obtained triumphal ornaments, was in the end proconsul of Africa, and dying there, fulfilled the presage. This, according to some authors, is the Quintus Curtius, whose history of the exploits of Alexander the Great has reached us. Vossius indeed is of opinion, that this history was wrote in the reign of Vespasian, and not of Claudius; but the arguments, with which he supports his opinion, are of no force (37).

Gauls admitted into the senate.

THE following year, Aulus Vitellius, who was afterwards emperor; and Lucius Vipfanius Poplicola being consuls, Claudius in quality of censor created several new patrician families, most of those which had been raised to that dignity by Romulus, L. Brutus, Julius Cæsar, and Augustus, being extinct. He likewise supplied the vacancies in the senate, introducing into that body some Æduans, that is, natives of Autun in Gaul, and promoting a decree of the senate, qualifying such of the Gaulish nobility as were Roman citizens to be admitted to the senatorial dignity. Such senators as were of infamous characters he degraded; but proceeded therein with great tenderness, advising them to resign their dignity, that their voluntary abdication might soften and hide the infamy of their expulsion. For these regulations, the consul Vipfanius proposed, that Claudius should be styled The father of the senate; but he modestly declined that title. He then numbered the citizens, who in that survey amounted to six millions nine hundred thousand¹. This year Claudius was at length acquainted with the disorders of his wife Messalina. She was the daughter of Valerius Messala Barbatus the emperor's cousin, and of Domitia Lepida, the grand-daughter of M. Antony and Octavia, Augustus's sister; so that she was Augustus's great niece, as Claudius was his great nephew². We have related several instances of her cruelty, which, however great, fell short of her monstrous lewdness. Her chief favourite was Caius Silius, the most comely young man in Rome, with whose graceful person she was so enchanted, that she obliged him to divorce his wife Silana, that she might ingross him wholly to herself. Silius was not unapprised of the blackness of his crime, and the doom which threatened him; but to withstand Messalina was present destruction. He therefore complied with her vicious inclination, and the empress, far from pursuing her amours privately and by stealth, openly frequented his house with a numerous train, accompanied him incessantly abroad, loaded him with wealth and honours, &c. After some time, Silius, apprehensive of the dangers that hung over him, and judging they were only to be averted by dangerous remedies, told the empress, without disguise, that they were gone too far to wait for the prince's death; that desperate attempts were the only security in glaring guilt; that he had accomplices at hand, and was ready to marry her, and adopt Britannicus. This proposal, bold beyond all example and almost all belief, Messalina applauded, and a few days after, the emperor being gone to Ostia to assist at a sacrifice, she married Silius with all the usual solemnities in the face of the senate, of the equestrian order, of the whole people and soldiery. Tacitus, Suetonius, and Dion Cassius, who relate this memorable incident, being well apprised how fabulous it would appear, that the emperor's wife should in his life-time dare to espouse another husband in form, and celebrate with him in the face of the city the nuptial feasts, declare, that how wonderful soever and incredible it may seem, they frame no fiction; but only recount what is unquestionably true, and what they had learnt from the living or written testimony of their fathers. Suetonius tells us, that Messalina induced Claudius himself to sign the marriage-contract, as if it were only dissembled to avert the calamities which certain prodigies portended to hang over his head³. Horror seized the prince's family, especially those who bore the chief way in it. It was no riddle whither such a marriage tended, and they dreaded nothing so much as a revolution, which would put an end to their power. On the other hand, when they recollected the stupidity of Claudius, his blind attachment to his wife, and the many eminent persons sacrificed to her fury, their own apprehensions deterred them from acquainting him with his public ignominy. Calistus and Pallas, the reigning favourites, were still for dissembling the empress's enormities, and frightening her by secret menaces from keeping company with her adulterer. Narcissus thought the emperor should by some means or other be immediately acquainted with the monstrous conduct of his wife; and persisting in his opinion, he prevailed by gifts and promises upon Calpurnia and Cleopatra, two courtesans in high favour with Claudius, to undertake the discovery; which they did the more willingly, as by the fall of Messalina they apprehended, that their own authority would be thoroughly established. Calpurnia therefore, while the emperor was still at Ostia, upon the first occasion of her being with him in private, falling at his feet, cried out, Messalina has married Silius; and at the same time asked Cleopatra, who purposely attended to attest it, whether she had not found it to be true? Cleopatra confirming it, Claudius, struck with amazement, ordered Narcissus to be called, who

a who, begging pardon for having concealed from him the disorders of his wife, told him, that he was in a state of divorce; that it was what all men knew; that the nuptials had been celebrated in the face of the city, and that Messalina's new husband, if he made not dispatch, would be sovereign of Rome. He then sent for his most trusty friends, particularly for Turranius, who was charged with the care of providing the city with corn, and next for Lusius Geta, commander of the prætorian guards, and inquired of them. As they avouched it, all who were about Claudius, insisted upon his proceeding without delay to the camp, and, by securing the prætorian cohorts, consult his preservation before his revenge. Claudius was so confounded and dismayed, that he often asked whether he was still emperor? whether Silius was yet

 b a private man? In the mean time, Messalina was indulging herself without the least apprehension in all manner of diversions, not imagining, that any one would dare to disclose her disorders to the emperor, over whom she had so mighty a sway. As it was then the middle of autumn, she exhibited in her house a representation of the vintage, in which her new husband Silius personated Bacchus, being attended by a c choir of mock-priests and priestesses, among whom was Messalina herself with a thyrsus in her hand, and her hair loose and flowing. But in the midst of their jollity and revels, messengers unexpectedly arrived with tidings, that Claudius was apprised of all, and approached bent upon sudden vengeance. Hereupon the company immediately dispersed in the utmost consternation; Messalina betook herself to the d gardens of Lucullus; and Silius, who was then prætor and consul elect, to dissemble his fear, resumed the offices of the forum. Messalina, finding no other resource, resolved to quit her retirement, and boldly to meet her husband, not doubting but she should be able to avert the storm, if she only obtained to be heard. But in the e first place, she ordered her son Britannicus and her daughter Octavia, to go forth, and embracing their father, to implore his mercy for his injured wife: she besought Vibidia, the oldest vestal, of whom Claudius entertained a high opinion, to do the same. She herself passed through the city on foot, attended only by three persons, no one shewing the least compassion for her in her disgrace. When she was without

 f the walls, not being able to pursue her journey on foot, and finding no other convenience, she was glad to be taken up by a gardener in his dung-cart, in which, quite forsaken by all her train, she took the road to Ostia. The emperor was not yet recovered from his fright, but was still incessantly asking, whether Silius was yet acknowledged emperor: he likewise betrayed no small distrust of Geta, commander of his guards, of which Narcissus, who entertained the same distrust, being apprised, he suggested to the emperor, that there was no other expedient to preserve him, than the transferring of the command of his guards upon one of his freedmen for that day only, and offered to undertake it himself. Claudius came readily into his proposal, and Narcissus, now commander of the prætorian cohorts, took his place as such in the emperor's coach, in order to prevent L. Vitellius and P. Largus Cæcina, who were in the same coach, from interceding in favour of Messalina. Upon the road, Claudius sometimes broke out into bitter invectives against Messalina; at other times shewed compassion for her and their common children. Vitellius uttered nothing, but, O heinous! Oh the iniquity! which words might be interpreted equally against Messalina and her accusers. Narcissus urged him to speak plain; but gained nothing: Vitellius still answered indirectly, and in terms that might be differently construed; and his example was followed by Largus Cæcina. As they drew near the city, Messalina unexpectedly appeared in the road, crying aloud with many tears to Claudius, that he would hear the mother of Octavia and Britannicus. Narcissus no sooner saw her, than, to drown her cries, he began to exclaim and storm with great noise against the impudent and bold conduct of Silius, and the abominations of Messalina. At the same time, to divert the prince from seeing her, he delivered to him a writing, containing a detail of her prostitutions. As the emperor was entering Rome, some attempted to present to him his children by her; but Narcissus ordered them to be conveyed away: he could not, however, remove Vibidia, who insisted with great vehemence, that the emperor's wife might not be condemned without being heard; so that Narcissus was obliged to assure her, that Messalina should be heard, and should have full opportunity of clearing herself. He then advised the vestal to withdraw, and attend the sacred functions of her office. As for Claudius, he kept the whole time a wonderful silence, and Vitellius pretended to be amazed; so that Narcissus controuled all things. By his command the house of the adulterer was opened, and the emperor carried thither. As he entered the porch, Narcissus shewed him the statue of Silius the father standing there, though the senate had by a decree ordered it to be broken; for he had been arraigned under Tiberius of treason, as we have related in his reign: in the house he shewed him the rich furniture of the imperial palace, the monuments of his wife's prostitution and his own disgrace. Having thus worked him up to threats and fury, he led him without delay to the camp, where by Narcissus's direction he made a short speech to the soldiery, who with a general clamour demanded that the criminals might be immediately executed. Hereupon Silius and several others, whom Narcissus had caused to be arrested, were brought before the imperial tribunal; and, being convicted as accomplices of Messalina's prostitutions, were all dragged to execution. Silius, without offering any thing in his defence, only begged they would dispatch him soon. Mneſter, the player, who had been likewise one of Messalina's gallants, created some hesitation. He tore off his garments, and desired the emperor to behold the marks of the stripes he had endured, before he could be brought to comply with Messalina's impure solicitations; he reminded him at the same time of his own commands, obliging him to gratify Messalina without reserve (N), adding, that others had been tempted to offend by great presents, or mighty promises; but his offence was owing only to compulsion. These considerations biased Claudius to mercy; but his freedmen dissuading him from saving a player after so many illustrious sacrifices, Mneſter was condemned and executed with Traulus Montanus, a young knight of extraordinary modesty and comeliness, whom Messalina had forced to pass only one night with her, and afterwards cast off, her passion being, as Tacitus observes, with equal wantonness inflamed and surfeited^a.

WHEN these executions were over, Claudius returned to the palace, where he passed the best part of the night in feasting and revelling with his freedmen. Being warm with wine, for he usually drank very plentifully, he ordered one of his attendants to go and acquaint the unhappy woman, for these terms he is said to have used, that she should attend the next day and plead her cause. She was then in the gardens of Lucullus, whither she had retired, finding she could have no access to Claudius, and was there busy in composing a memorial, which she designed to present to the prince, not without hopes of moving him to compassion. But Narcissus, alarmed at the message he sent her, and observing that his resentment visibly abated, and his usual affection began to return, ran hastily forth, and directed the tribunes and centurions then upon duty to dispatch Messalina; for such was the emperor's express command. With them he sent one Evodus a freed-man, in whom he could confide, charging him to see his orders strictly fulfilled; for he apprehended, and indeed not without reason, since Claudius began to relent, that the doom which he had prepared for Messalina, would, if she lived to the next day, rebound upon his own head. Evodus flew in a moment to the gardens, where he found her lying upon the ground, and her mother Lepida sitting by her. He immediately acquainted her with her doom, and at the same time abused her with all the brutal invectives of a slave. Her mother encouraged her not to wait the blow of the executioner; but, since she could not prolong her life, to die with renown. Hereupon, laying hold of a dagger, she aimed, with a trembling hand, first at her throat, and then at her breast; but had not courage and resolution enough for such an attempt. The tribune therefore who stood before her, without ever opening his mouth, observing her timidity and irresolution,

(N) Messalina finding she could neither by threats nor promises induce Mneſter to comply with her impure solicitations, had at length recourse to stripes, and caused him to be inhumanly scourged; but to no effect, Mneſter dreading to incur the displeasure of the emperor, which, he apprehended, would sooner or later prove fatal to him, if he granted Messalina her request; for her abominations were now so public, that he imagined Claudius could not be much longer unapprised of them. Hereupon the lewd prostitute, bent upon satisfying at all events the passion she had conceived for the player; What if the emperor himself, said she, should command you to gratify me in what I require? I should, without hesitation, replied Mneſter, obey the emperor's commands. Messalina flew to the emperor, and complained to him of the player, who, she said, had unmannerly refused her a small favour. Claudius immediately sent for Mneſter, reprimanded him with great severity, and commanded him to gratify his wife without reserve. He obeyed, and now alleges this command as a powerful motive to induce Claudius to grant him his life (38). But Narcissus urging, that his crime was of such enormous malignity, that it availed not how he had committed it, he was executed upon the spot.

^a solution, delivered her from her anxiety and fears, by running her through with his sword. Thus just vengeance overtook her at last, in the very gardens for which she had sacrificed, as we have related above, the brave Valerius Asiaticus. She was of all women recorded in history, if not the most lewd, the most amazingly bold in the pursuit of her lewdness ^b. Claudius was still at table, when word was brought him, that Messalina was dead; but without any particulars, whether she had suffered by her own, or by the executioner's hand. Neither did he make any inquiries, but, calling for a bowl of wine, continued the banquet with his usual gaiety, without betraying either then, or in the following days, any symptoms of hatred, joy, anger, sorrow, or any other human passion or affection, tho' he beheld the enemies of his wife triumphing over her death, and his children bewailing with many tears the violent end of their mother ^c. Nay, Suetonius assures us, that as he was a few days after supping with some of his friends, he asked, why his wife Messalina came not to supper? Many other instances of the like almost incredible forgetfulness, or rather stupidity, are related by the same writer and by Dion Cassius ^d.

UPON the death of Messalina, Claudius publicly declared, that since he had been so unfortunate in his marriages, he would live a single life for the future; nay, he gave every Roman leave to put him to death, if he continued not in that resolution. But, notwithstanding these protestations, he soon changed his mind, and, not remembering what he had said, declared his intention of marrying. Hereupon great strife and emulation arose among the imperial freedmen, which of them should chuse a wife for one, who had been ever governed by his wives. Callistus proposed to him Lollia Paulina, daughter to M. Lollius, a consular. Pallas recommended Julia Agrippina, the daughter of Germanicus; and Narcissus employed all his interest in behalf of Ælia Petina, whom he had divorced before upon a slight and trivial occasion. Claudius himself was now bent upon one, then upon another, and always led by his last adviser. Being thus undetermined and perplexed, he at length called together his counsellors, ordering them to declare and defend in his presence their different opinions (O). Claudius heard them all with great attention; but was most affected with the arguments of Pallas, enforced by the caresses and allurements of Agrippina, who, under colour of consanguinity, was assiduous in her visits to her uncle. This princess, so famous in history for her ambition and misfortunes, was the daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina the elder, whose courage and chastity we have often had occasion to celebrate. Tiberius married her, in the fourteenth year of his reign, to Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, by whom she had a son named L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, who succeeded Claudius, and is known by the name of Nero. Upon the death of her husband, she abandoned herself to all manner of lewdness, and was on that score banished by her brother Caligula. Claudius recalled her, when she married to her second husband Crispus Passienus, one of an illustrious family, and soon after murdered him, to enjoy the rich inheritance to which he had named her in his will. She was in high favour with Claudius, even in Messalina's time; and therefore would have been sacrificed, as well as her sister Julia, to her jealousy, had not the empress been diverted from it by other pursuits ^e. Claudius no sooner shewed himself inclined to marry his niece, but she began, as if already married, to exercise the power and authority of a wife. Her first purpose was, to concert a match between her son Domitianus and Octavia, the emperor's daughter; but Octavia had some time since been by her father betrothed to Lucius Silanus, a youth of great quality, and no less beloved

(O) Narcissus alledged in favour of Ælia Petina the emperor's former marriage with her, and their common daughter, for by her he had Antonia; and that by recalling one who had already been his wife, he would introduce no innovation into his family, but a wife, who would not exercise the hatred of a step-mother towards Britannicus and Octavia, since they were so nearly allied to her own children. Callistus urged, that to recall her after so long a divorce and dislike, would be the very means to heighten her indignation and pride; that Lollia was a much more eligible match, for having no issue of her own, she was void of every motive of emulation to his, and consequently would use her step-children with the tenderness of a real mother. Pallas recommended Agrippina from the following considerations; that with her she would bring the grandson of Germanicus, and was herself worthy of imperial fortune, noble in her descent, of tried fruitfulness, and in the prime of her age; that by this match would be prevented her carrying into another house the illustrious blood of the Cæsars (39).

loved and esteemed by Claudius. However, as the weak prince had no judgment, nor choice, nor aversion or affection, but such as were inspired by others, Vitellius, foreseeing into whose hands the sovereignty was hastening, in order to purchase the favour of Agrippina, began to devise crimes against Silanus. That young nobleman had a sister, by name Junia Silana, a lady of extraordinary beauty, and no less gaiety; and hence Vitellius, then censor, took the accusation, wresting to a charge of incest the mutual affection of brother and sister; an affection no-ways incestuous, but somewhat too free and unguarded; for while Junia was by others styled Venus on account of her beauty, Silanus chose, we know not why, to call her Juno, who was both sister and wife to Jupiter. This the infamous sycophant Vitellius laid hold of; and having first prejudiced the undiscerning emperor against the innocent youth, quite unapprised of any plots against him, he soon after, in quality of censor, degraded him from the rank of a senator, tho' the senate had been already reviewed, and the number of senators fixed a good while before; nay, he obliged him by an edict to renounce his prætorship, though it was of course to expire the next day, conferring it for that day upon Eprius Marcellus. Silanus being thus marked with infamy, Claudius broke off the match between him and Octavia^f.

THE next consuls were C. Pompeius Longinus Gallus and Q. Veranius Nepos. Tho' Claudius and Agrippina lived publicly together, yet they durst not celebrate their nuptials, there being no instance among the Romans of a marriage between an uncle and a niece; but that scruple was removed by Vitellius, who having first prevailed, without much trouble, upon Claudius to promise, that he would submit to the authority of the senate and the unanimous voice of the people, easily persuaded both orders to approve of the marriage; nay, some of the senators declared, that, if the emperor delayed longer, they would compel him. Claudius then yielded; but nevertheless did not celebrate the nuptials, till the senate passed a decree, declaring for ever lawful marriages between uncles and their brothers daughters. But notwithstanding this general law, no one followed the example of Claudius, except one Roman knight, by name Titus Alledius Severus, and he only, as was believed, to court the favour of Agrippina. This law was afterwards revoked by the emperor Nerva, as was that legitimating the inter-marriage of cousin-germans, long unknown to the Romans, by Theodosius the Great. The day after the decree of the senate was published, Claudius celebrated his nuptials with the usual solemnity: and on the same day Silanus slew himself, whether by choice or constraint, is uncertain. His sister Junia was banished Italy; and to her sentence Claudius added an order to the pontiffs, in-joining them to offer expiatory sacrifices in the grove of Diana; a source of mockery to all men, says Tacitus, that penalties and lustrations should be appointed for a pretended incest, while real incest was established by law^g. From this time the city assumed a different face, all men tamely obeying a woman, who did not, like Messalina, render the Roman state subservient only to her wanton and lewd amours, but to her insatiable avarice, unbounded ambition, and unparallelled cruelty. She governed all, and the emperor himself, without controul; appeared with him in the senate; placed herself by him on the same tribunal in all public ceremonies; gave, together with him, audience to foreign princes and ambassadors; and did not even abandon him in the courts of justice, which to the Romans was a sight altogether new^h.

Seneca recalled from exile.

To signalize the beginning, we may say, of her reign, with some plausible action, she prevailed upon Claudius, not only to recal from exile, but to honour with the prætorship, L. Annæus Seneca, a man by all greatly esteemed on account of his eloquence and accomplishments. But in this she had also her private views, which were the education of her son Domitius under such a master, and the use of his counsels in the pursuit of her ambitious designs; for she did not doubt, but Seneca would, out of gratitude, continue faithfully attached to her, and maintain, for all his philosophy, an irreconcilable hatred to Claudius, by whom he had been banished^k; and truly his hatred appears but too plainly in his writings. Not long after, Agrippina, pursuing her ambitious designs, gained by vast promises Memmius Pollio, consul elect, to move the senate, that they would unanimously beseech Claudius to betroth Octavia to Domitius. To this, which was a great step towards the sovereignty, the senate readily agreed; and Claudius not apprised of his wife's aspiring views, with the same readiness consented. Thus was Domitius, by the efforts and devices of his mother, mother, raised almost to an equality with Britannicus. He was born on the fifteenth of December in the thirty-seventh year of the christian æra; so that he was in the beginning of this, the forty-ninth; entered into the twelfth year of his age¹. In the next place, Agrippina, no less implacable in her hatred, than ambitious in her views, being enraged at Lollia Paulina, for having aspired to the emperor's bed, framed crimes against her, and suborned an accuser, who charged her with consulting the magicians and Chaldeans about the match. Claudius, without hearing her, represented her supposed guilt to the senate, and required, that her estate might be confiscated, and she banished Italy^m. But Agrippina, not satisfied with this punishment, sent privately a tribune, with orders to cut off her head, and bring it to her. The tribune obeyed; and Agrippina is said to have with her own hands opened the mouth of the deceased, that from her teeth, which had something, we know not what, very singular, she might be well assured it was her headⁿ (P). Calpurnia, another woman of great distinction, was likewise doomed to ruin, because the prince had praised her beauty; but as this was from no passion for her person, but only in occasional discourse, her life was spared. This year to the senators of Narbonne Gaul was granted the same privilege with those of Sicily, of visiting their estates there, without asking leave of the prince. The same year the countries of Iturea and Judæa were, upon the death of their kings, Sobemus and Agrippa, annexed to the government of Syria. About the end of the year, Claudius widened the circumference of Rome, inclosing, according to Onuphrius^o, mount Aventine. We are told, that such only as had extended the limits of the empire, were, in virtue of an ancient institution, impowered to enlarge also the bounds of the city^p. This power Claudius probably claimed, in regard of his having conquered part of Britain. As for the troubles which happened this year in the kingdoms of Parthia and Bosphorus, we refer our readers to the account we have given of them in our history of those countries (Q).

Rome enlarged.

The following year, C. Antistius Vetus and M. Suius Nervilianus being consuls, the freed-man Pallas, who had conducted the late marriage of Agrippina, and was now engaged in a criminal correspondence with her, and thence wholly addicted to her interest, persuaded Claudius to adopt, in preference to his own son, Domitius for his eldest, because he was three years older than Britannicus (R). (P) Lollia Paulina was first married to Memmius Regulus, governor of Greece and Macedon, from whom she was forced by Caligula, who took her to himself. She was grand-daughter to M. Lollius, appointed by Augustus governor to Caius Cæsar, when he was sent into the east. Claudius, in representing her pretended guilt to the senate, touched upon her noble descent, telling the senators, that by her mother she was neice to Lucius Volusius; that Cotta Messalinus was her great-uncle; that she herself was once the wife of Memmius Regulus, &c. but of her marriage with Caligula he said nothing. He added, that she pursued pernicious designs, and must be divested of the means and opportunities of putting them in execution. Upon this her immense wealth was confiscated, and only about thirty-thousand pounds of our money left her. Tacitus tells us, that the tribune dispatched by Agrippina had orders to compel her to lay violent hands on herself (40).

(Q) Phlegon, of whom we shall have occasion to speak hereafter, tells us, that this year, the ninth of Claudius's reign, a woman was delivered at Rome of an ape (41).

(R) Tacitus tells us, that it was observed by persons skilled in antiquity, that never was any adoption made before this into the patrician family of the Claudii; which, from Attus Clausus, called afterwards Appius Claudius, the first who settled at Rome, had subsisted upon its own stock. Lipsius is not at all pleased with this observation; but urges against it the adoption of Germanicus. However, being prompted by his good nature to excuse the mistake, he acquaints us, that Tiberius, when he adopted Germanicus, was not himself of the Claudian, but of the Julian family; a poor quibble indeed, and altogether unworthy of so learned a critic! It is surprising, that a writer of such penetration should thus mistake the meaning of Tacitus, tho' conveyed to him in the plainest terms. Some observed, says the historian, that never was any adoption made before this into the patrician family of the Claudii. &c. Could Lipsius possibly suppose Germanicus to have been adopted by Tiberius into the Claudian family? We cannot think him capable of entertaining a notion so notoriously absurd, since Germanicus, Tiberius's own brother's son, was, as is manifest, by birth, and without any adoption, of the Claudian family. On the other hand, if he does not suppose him to have been adopted by Tiberius into the Claudian family, but only for his son, as he truly was, to what purpose alledge such an adoption against those who observed, to the glory of the Claudian family, that it had subsisted upon its own stock since its first settling at Rome, to the adoption of Domitius Ahenobarbus? Besides, if Tiberius was himself no longer of the Claudian, but of the Julian, family, how could he adopt Germanicus into the former? That Tacitus meant not such an adoption as that of Germanicus, but an adoption into the family, is evident both from the context in that writer, and from Suetonius, who tells us that Claudius, when he adopted young Domitius, publicly declared, that no one had ever before been adopted into the Claudian family (42). But quandoque bonus dormit at Homerus.

treatment of Britannicus.

Agrippinensis.

Nero takes the manly

Domitius was named Nero Claudius Cæsar Drusus Germanicus (S). This adoption was applauded by the senate, and a decree passed confirming it, and conferring upon Agrippina the sublime title of Augusta. However, there was no Roman so void of compassion, as not to be affected with the hard lot of the unhappy Britannicus, whom Agrippina, under colour of tenderness for him, kept locked up in a nursery, tho' now nine years old. By degrees she removed from him his former attendants, and even caused some of them to be put to death; among the rest his preceptor Sossius, putting in their room persons who were intirely at her devotion. She would never allow him to appear abroad, nor even to wait upon his father, giving out, that he was disordered in his senses, and troubled with the falling-sickness. Not long after the adoption of Nero, Britannicus having saluted him, as he was used to do before, by the name of Abenobarbus, Nero resented it to such a degree, that he endeavoured to persuade the emperor, that he was a supposititious child. This year Agrippina, to display her power at Rome in foreign countries, procured a colony of veterans to be sent to the capital of the Ubii, a town in which she had been born, and which she called by her own name Colonia Agrippinensis. This city is now known by the name of Cologne. About the same time the Catti, of whom we have had frequent occasion to speak in the reign of Tiberius, made incursions into the Roman territories; but were repulsed with great slaughter by Pomponius Secundus, commander of the legions in Upper Germany, who, on that occasion, released from bondage some Romans who had continued in it ever since the massacre of Varus and his legions. His vigilance and gallant conduct seemed to the senate worthy of triumphal ornaments, which were decreed him accordingly; but he did not derive so much glory from them, as from his elegant poems, which are greatly cried up by the best judges of antiquity. It was at this time too, that Vannius, whom Drusus the son of Tiberius had thirty years before created king of the Suevians, was driven out by the Hermundurians and Ligians. Claudius, tho' he had declined engaging in a quarrel among the barbarians, yet granted a safe refuge to the deposed king, and lands in Pannonia both to him and his followers. Vangio and Sido, his own sister's sons, parted his kingdom between them, and ever continued faithful to the Romans.

THE following year, Claudius being the fifth time consul with Servius Cornelius Orfitus (T), Nero, tho' not yet fourteen, was presented with the manly robe, which qualified him for honours and employments. At the same time, the senate, with the concurrence of Claudius decreed, that in his twentieth year he should discharge the consulship, and in the mean time, as consul designed, be invested with proconsular authority out of Rome, and be styled prince of the Roman youth. Claudius moreover bestowed, in Nero's name, a largess upon the soldiery, and another upon the people; and to draw the eyes and affections of the people upon him, made him appear at the circensian games, which were then solemnized, in a triumphal robe, the mark and ornament of the imperial state, while Britannicus was carried about in his prætexta, the usual habit of children. Some of the tribunes and centurions could not help pitying the unhappy youth; but they were all, under various pretences, soon removed from the palace; even such of the young prince's freed-men, as were found inviolably attached to his person and interest, were partly discharged, and partly put to death, as if they had inspired their patron with hatred and emulation against Nero, which might in the end flame out into war and public ruin. Upon their removal, Britannicus was committed to the government of others, chosen by his step-mother. The next step which Agrippina took towards the accomplishment of her great design was, the removing of Lusius Geta and Rufus Crispinus from the command of the prætorian cohorts.

(S) Suetonius tells us, that, when Domitius was born, Caligula being desired by his sister Agrippina to give the child what name he thought proper, the emperor, fixing his eyes upon Claudius, gave him, by way of raillery, his name; which Agrippina took much amiss, Claudius being at that time the laughing-stock of the court; but now she esteems both herself and her son highly honoured with a name which she then despised (43).

(T) Claudius held this his last consulship six months (44). Onuphrius adds to his colleague's other names that of Scipio (45); and truly the Orfiti seem to have been of the family of the Scipios (46). C. Minucius or Minicius Fundanus, and C. Verbenius Sacerdos, were substituted in the consulship to Claudius and Orfitus (47). Vespasian, who was afterwards emperor, was consul for the two last months of this year, as we read in Suetonius (48).

a cohorts. She imagined them grateful to the memory of Messalina, and thence zealously devoted to her children. She therefore alledged to the emperor, that, by the cabals and emulation of two commanders, the guards were rent into factions; whereas by the authority of one, they would be more easily kept to their duty. Hereupon Claudius, without any further inquiry, transferred the command of the prætorian bands on Burrhus Afranius, whom she recommended, an officer highly esteemed by the soldiery, but well apprised to whom he owed his preferment. And now Agrippina began to assume a more haughty deportment than ever; she entered the capitol in a chariot, a distinction granted to none but priests. This, however, heightened the reverence of the people towards one, who was, without example, the daughter of a b Cæsar, the mother of one, sister to the late emperor, and wife to the present. But, in the mean time, her chief companion, L. Vitellius, was by a senator, named Junius Lupus, accused of high-treason; and Claudius, ever timorous, would have hearkened to the charge, had not Agrippina, by menaces rather than intreaties, turned his resentment against the accuser, who was banished, Vitellius desiring no further punishment. This year, a great famine raged in Rome, and the populace, not confining their complaints to houses and corners, gathered in tumultuous crouds round the prince, while he was publicly administering justice, and drove him to the extremity of the forum; insomuch, that with the utmost difficulty he escaped their violence, his guards opening him a way through the outrageous multitude. Suetonius tells us, that he was not only reviled with opprobrious language by the enraged populace, but so pelted with crusts of bread, that he narrowly escaped being killed. However, instead of resenting such base treatment, he took such effectual care to have the city supplied with corn, that in less than fifteen days no one had occasion to complain, that winter happening to prove exceeding mild and favourable. That the city might not again be reduced to such distress, he gave all possible encouragement to merchants, granted ample privileges to such as built trading vessels, and took upon himself to make good all the losses they should suffer.

c THIS year, the tenth of Claudius's reign, the proprætor, P. Ostorius Scapula, landing in Britain (U), was obliged, soon after his arrival, though the season was already far advanced, to take the field against the Britons, who broke into the territories of the friends and allies of Rome with so much the more violence and confidence, as they supposed that a new general, not yet acquainted with his army, would not in the beginning of winter dare to take the field and make head against them. But Ostorius, who was an officer of great experience, being well apprised, that by the first events of war confidence or consternation was raised in an enemy, led forth such cohorts as were next at hand, fell unexpectedly upon the unwary Britons with great slaughter, and pursued such as were broken so close as to prevent their rejoining. Then, as he could not depend upon a peace made by constraint, and therefore not sincere, he deprived of their arms those whom he suspected, and by means of several forts on the Severn and the two Avons, one of which is also called the Nen, he endeavoured to restrain the enemy from making any farther inroads into the territories of the Roman allies. This the Iceni, that is, the inhabitants of the present counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon could not brook. They were a powerful people, and not weakened by any wars or invasions; for they had of their own accord entered into an alliance with the Romans. Being therefore joined by the bordering nations, they soon raised a considerable army, and incamped in a place defended by a ditch, and narrow lanes, not passable by the horse. Ostorius, though not yet joined by his legions, resolved to attack them; and accordingly, having drawn up his auxiliaries and dismounted his cavalry, he advanced in good order to attack the enemy's rustic fortifications. The ditch was soon forced, and the Britons put in disorder, being hampered and entangled with their own inclosures. However, as they were cooped in on all sides, and no way was left for them to escape, being animated with despair, they performed many feats of bravery. In this battle M. Ostorius, the son of the general, acquired the civic crown, by saving the life of a Roman citizen.

Farther conquests in Britain.

(U) Aulus Plautius left Britain, and returned to Rome, according to Dion Cassius, in the sixth year of Claudius's reign: whereas Ostorius did not arrive in that island, as is evident from Tacitus, till three years after. Hence it is plain, that between Plautius and Ostorius was another governor of this country, whom authors have not mentioned, probably because he performed nothing worthy of notice.

They submit. The Iceni being thus overcome, and those unsettled spirits, who had hitherto wavered between peace and war, calmed by their overthrow, Ostorius, advanced into the country of the Cangi, probably the present counties of Shropshire and Cheshire, laying waste their territories, and committing general spoil, till he approached the Irish sea, when commotions begun among the Brigantes, the inhabitants of Lancashire, Yorkshire, the bishopric of Durham, and the counties of Cumberland and Westmorland, drew him back; for the Brigantes had submitted to him before, probably by their deputies, after the overthrow of the Iceni; and the Roman general was determined to prosecute no new enterprize, till his former ones were completed and secure. The chief authors of the disturbance were executed, and the rest pardoned, which put a stop to any farther attempts of the Brigantes. But the Silures, the inhabitants of South-Wales, would hearken to no terms. Ostorius therefore resolved to lead his legions against them; but first conveyed a numerous colony of veterans to Camalodunum, in order to keep the conquered countries in awe, and inure the Roman allies to the laws and jurisdiction of Rome. To Gogidunus, a British king, and a great friend to the Romans, certain cities were given, to attach him still more to their interest; for it was a custom, as Tacitus observes*, practised in the earliest ages by the Roman people, to employ even kings as their instruments in establishing bondage on nations. After these precautions, Ostorius marched with all his forces against the Silures, a people resolute and fierce by nature, and moreover confiding in the valour and conduct of Caractacus, whom many prosperous, and many doubtful, successes had rendered famous, and raised in renown above all the other British commanders. As he was better acquainted with the country than the Romans, but inferior to them in the number of his troops, he wisely removed the seat of the war into the territories of the Ordovices, now North-Wales. There he chose a place, against which it was difficult to advance, and from which it was no less difficult to retire; every way incommodious to the Romans, and every way favourable to his own men; for it was upon the ridges of exceeding steep mountains, the sides of which, where approachable, he fortified with walls of stone; at the foot of the mountains flowed a river, dangerous to be forded, and the walls, which he had reared, were defended by numerous bodies of his bravest men. The place, as Camden conjectures, had thence the name of Caer Caradoc, which is a steep hill on the west borders of Shropshire, at the foot of which runs the river Clun: Caradoc in the British tongue is supposed to be the same with Caractacus in Latin. Ostorius having drawn hither all his forces, since the British commander was resolved to put the whole to the decision of the sword, began to advance in battle-array towards the enemy. At his approach the leaders of the several confederate nations, who had joined Caractacus, ran from rank to rank, animating their followers with representations proper to dispel fear, and rouse in their breasts a martial ardor. As for Caractacus, he flew through the whole army, proclaiming, where-ever he passed, that from this day, from this battle, they must date their liberty completely recovered, or their slavery eternally established: he put them in mind of the glorious feats of their ancestors, who had driven out Cæsar the dictator, and by whose valour they yet lived free from tribute and the Roman axes, yet preserved the persons of their wives and children from dishonour. His harangue was answered by loud shouts and acclamations, which were echoed and doubled by the neighbouring woods and mountains. In the end, every one bound himself by the most sacred oath amongst them, never to yield to force or wounds. The resolute alacrity of the enemy startled the Roman general, especially when he discovered the river before him, the ramparts raised upon its banks, the steepness of the mountains filled with men hanging almost over their heads, and in short the most dismal and threatening scene of war he had ever beheld. But the soldiers pressed for the attack, crying out, All difficulties are surmountable by courage. Ostorius therefore, having carefully surveyed the ground, and tried where the river was fordable, and where not, ordered the trumpets to sound, and his legionaries to advance. They gained without much difficulty the opposite bank; but as they approached the rampart, they were galled with incessant showers of darts, which did great execution, till forming themselves into a testudo, they demolished the wall, which covered the enemy, and encountered them hand to hand upon ground equal to both. Then the Britons, not able to stand the shock of the legions, betook themselves to the ridges of the mountains, a tains, where they made a stand against the Romans, who pursued them; but as they covered themselves with no armour, and only fought with discharges of arrows, the Romans closing with them, easily broke their ranks, put them to flight, and gained a complete victory. The wife and daughter of Caratacus were taken prisoners, and his brothers surrendered at discretion. He himself had recourse to the protection of Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantes; but as all things conspire against the unfortunate, he was by her delivered in bonds to the conquerors, according to Tacitus in the ninth, but by a more exact computation in the seventh, year after the commencement of the war in Britain; so long had he sustained it; and hence his renown, says Tacitus, had reached all the islands, spread over the neighbouring countries, and was celebrated even in Italy, and at Rome, where all longed to behold the brave commander, who had for so many years defied the arms, and baffled all the attempts, of the Romans. He was immediately sent to Claudius, who received him in a kind of triumph. As he drew near the city, the people were summoned, as to some solemn spectacle, to see the illustrious captive; as he passed by, the prætorian guards stood under arms in the field before their camp. Before the British king marched his servants and followers, carrying the gold chains and military ornaments, which he had taken in the wars with his neighbours; next his brothers, his wife, and daughters; and lastly himself exposed to view. All but he appeared dejected, and descended to supplications unworthy of their rank and character. The king himself, without betraying the least fear, or uttering a word that implored mercy, being brought before the emperor, who was seated on his tribunal, addressed him thus:

"If my moderation in prosperity and success had been equal to my quality and fortune, I should have arrived in this city under another character, that of a friend, and not a captive; nor would you have disdained to receive into terms of alliance a prince, descended from illustrious ancestors, and ruling over so many nations. But different is my present lot, a lot, which reflects no less glory upon you, than disgrace and reproach upon me. I was lately master of men and arms, horses and treasures; and where is the wonder, that I was unwilling to lose them, that I strove to retain them? Though you, Romans, aim at extending your dominion over all mankind, it does not thence follow, that all men will readily and voluntarily submit to the yoke. Had I immediately yielded, my misfortune would have been less remarkable, your conquest less renowned: even now, if I am to suffer death, the fame of my resistance and your victory will die with me; but if you preserve my life, I shall be a living monument of your clemency". Claudius, compassionating the misfortunes of so brave a man, and admiring the constancy with which he bore them, generously granted to him, to his wife, his daughter, and brothers both their lives and liberty. Being released from their chains, they first paid their duty and acknowledgement to the prince, and next to Agrippina, who was seated upon another tribunal close to the emperor's*. We are told, that Caratacus being asked, after he had viewed the city of Rome, which was then in the height of its beauty and grandeur, what he thought of that stately metropolis? returned the following judicious answer: I am amazed, that men, who have such magnificent habitations of their own, should leave them, and come so far to bereave us Britons of our poor cottages†. In the senate many pompous encomiums were pronounced upon the taking of Caratacus, some of the senators extolling it as an event no less illustrious, than the taking of Syphax by P. Scipio, or of Perfes by Lucius Paulus. To Ostorius, who continued in Britain, triumphal ornaments were decreed.

Thus far the administration of Ostorius had proved successful; but now his fortune began to change; whether it was, that upon the captivity of Caratacus the Romans thought the war concluded, and thence grew less vigilant, or that the Britons enraged, rather than disheartened, at the loss of their king, strove more vehemently to revenge it. However that be, the Silures fell by surprise upon the præfect of the camp and some legionary cohorts, whom Ostorius had left to rear forts in their country; and would have cut them all in pieces, had they not received timely assistance from the neighbouring garisons: as it was, the præfect himself, eight centurions, and a great number of the most resolute soldiers were slain. Soon after they routed the Roman foragers and the troops sent to support them. Hereupon Ostorius dispatched to their relief some cohorts lightly armed; but they not being able to put a stop to the flight, the

the legions were drawn out. Their arrival encouraged the fugitives; the fight was renewed, and the success, after having been long doubtful, proved in the end favourable to the Romans; the enemy fled, but, as night approached, with small loss. Thenceforward scarce a day passed without some encounter or skirmish, sometimes in the woods, sometimes in the marshes; at times by command of their officers, and often without their knowledge, as design or chance gave them an opportunity. What most exasperated the Silures was, a saying of the Roman general current among them, that their name must be utterly extinguished, as was that of the Sicambri, who had been partly cut off, and partly transplanted into Gaul. Being thus animated, they surprised and carried off two auxiliary cohorts, as they were without due circumspection pillaging the country, to satiate the avarice of their commanders. The spoil and captives they distributed among the neighbouring nations; with a view to draw them too into the revolt. In the mean time, Ostorius, sinking under the weight of his cares and anxieties, ended his days to the great joy of the enemy; that so renowned a commander had perished in the war. Claudius was no sooner apprised of the death of his lieutenant, than he appointed Aulus Didius Gallus to succeed him; who, notwithstanding his expeditious arrival, found affairs in a much worse condition than they had been at the death of Ostorius. For the Silures, finding the Romans destitute of a general, had attacked and defeated a legion commanded by Manlius Valens, a disaster magnified both by the enemy and the new general; by the enemy, to terrify and discourage him; by Didius, to gain the greater glory, if he put an end to the war, or to have the juster excuse, if it continued. In the mean time, the Silures made frequent and wide incursions into the territories of the Roman allies, committing everywhere dreadful devastations, till Didius, taking the field, set upon them, repulsed them, and restrained them within more narrow bounds.

Other advantages gained by the Silures.

The queen of the Brigantes driven out in spite of the Romans.

NEXT to Caracellacus in merit and valour was Venutius, or Venusius, once long faithful to the Romans, and protected by them, during his marriage with Cartismandua, queen of the Brigantes. That princess was amply rewarded by the Romans, and in high favour with them, for having seized and delivered up into their hands king Caracellacus. Wherefore, presuming upon their protection, she wantonly deserted her husband Venutius, and married his armour-bearer Vellocatus, on whom with her person she conferred her crown. This action, generally abhorred by the Britons, occasioned great disturbances in the state, and kindled a civil war among the Brigantes. The queen, by craft and subtil stratagems, got the brother and other relations of Venutius into her power. But Venutius, on the other hand, being supported by the Brigantes themselves, who were offended at their queen's reproachful conduct and scorned to be governed by a woman, and receiving powerful succours from the neighbouring nations, reduced the unfaithful princess to the utmost distress. She then had recourse to her fast friends the Romans, who immediately dispatched some cohorts and squadrons to her aid. Hereupon a bloody battle ensued, which was long doubtful; but in the end proved successful to the Romans, who rescued the queen from impending danger. Venutius, however, maintained himself in the kingdom, in spite of the utmost efforts of the Roman general. Many battles were fought with doubtful success, and no great advantages gained on either side. At length Didius, who was stricken in years, and already satiated with a long train of honours, gave over all thoughts of restoring the queen, and contented himself with acting only defensively, and restraining the enemy by his lieutenants. In this posture continued affairs here till the seventh year of Nero's reign, Didius and his successor Veranius thinking it sufficient just to maintain what acquisitions their predecessors had made, or only to raise some forts further in the island, and very few they were, purely for the name and reputation of having enlarged their government. Veranius indeed died in less than a year, and was succeeded by Suetonius Paulinus, whose feats in this island we shall relate in the reign of Nero; when the order of time will oblige us to resume the detail, which it now causes us to interrupt.

A decree against women who married slaves.

THE following year, Faustus Sylla and Salvius Otho Titianus being consuls, the senate passed a rigorous decree for expelling the astrologers out of Italy, which, however, was never put in execution. Another decree issued against women of rank, who married slaves, ordaining, that she, who thus debased herself, without the consent of the master of the slave, should herself be reduced to a state of slavery; but a but where he consented, he should be held for a slave manumitted. Claudius declared in the senate, that Pallas was the deviser of this scheme; whereupon Bareas Soranus, consul elect, moved, that he might be rewarded with the ornaments of prætor, and a present of about a hundred thousand pounds of our money. Cornelius Scipio added, that public thanks should be returned him for deigning, though descended from the ancient kings of Arcadia, to be reckoned among the emperor's ministers, and postponing this his ancient nobility to the service of the state. The haughty slave accepted the ornaments of the prætorship, and also the privilege of wearing a gold ring; but despised the present, and prevailed with Claudius to acquaint the senate in his name, that he was satisfied with the honours, and chose to live still in his ancient poverty. Hereupon a decree passed, was engraven in brass, and publicly hung up, in which a manumitted slave, lately redeemed from the infamy of whips and fetters, but now worth near seven millions, was extolled for observing the venerable parsimony of the primitive ages. This in truth was a compliment, as Pliny the younger observes, made to a slave by a body of slaves. Thus was dignity debased, infamy exalted, the awful authority of the senate prostituted, and the ornaments of magistracy ignominiously defiled. It was not enough for the once great and venerable Roman senate to heap honours upon the emperor; they must likewise court, adore, and exalt his slaves and freedmen, creatures brought from the chain and oar, insects naturally doomed to the vilest offices of the kitchen, stable, and privies. This year Claudius finished at an immense charge the aqueduct, which Caligula had begun fourteen years before, and consecrated it, to use the expression of the ancient writers, on the first of August, his birth day. It was a work of extraordinary magnificence, as appears from its stately ruins, which are still to be seen with an inscription, in which Claudius is styled emperor the twenty-seventh time. Four hundred and sixty persons were appointed to keep it in repair, and large salaries assigned them out of the public treasury. The same year the great canal being finished, which was designed for the draining of the lake Fucinus, and had kept thirty thousand men constantly employed for eleven years together, being at length finished, before the waters were let out, Claudius exhibited a naval fight, in which nineteen thousand condemned criminals engaged on board an hundred large gallies, representing the Sicilian and Rhodian fleets. The lake was surrounded with an inclosure of huge rafts to obstruct all means of flight or escape. Upon the rafts stood the emperor's guards; the lake was covered with gallies; the shore, the adjacent hills, and the tops of the mountains, were crowded with a mighty multitude; many from the neighbouring towns, others from Rome itself, either from a passion to behold the spectacle, or in compliment to the prince: the whole represented a vast theatre, and that greater numbers of spectators might be the better accommodated, a mountain between the lake and the river Liris was levelled. The emperor presided in a coat of mail, and with him Agrippina in a mantle of cloth of gold. When the two fleets were drawn up and ready to engage, a Triton of silver, springing by an ingenious contrivance out of the midst of the lake, sounded the charge, and the combat began, which, though between malefactors, was fought with all the courage and gallantry of brave soldiers; so that after a most obstinate contest, after many wounds and much blood, Claudius granted such of them as remained, their lives, and redeemed them from slaughter (W). When the shew was over, the earth between the lake and the canal was removed; but the canal was found not to be sunk sufficiently low to receive the water in the centre of the lake. Its bed therefore was dug deeper; and when this work was ended, which happened this year, to draw the multitude once more together, a shew of gladiators was exhibited upon bridges laid over it. After the shew, the emperor made a great banquet just at the fall from the lake; but the water, breaking out unexpectedly with incredible violence, bore down with it whatever was near it, and shook

(W) Suetonius tells us, that the combatants, when upon the point of engaging, cried out to Claudius Farewell, good emperor; we, who are going to die, salute you: the emperor returned the compliment, bidding them farewell too; which words they construed as if he had excused them from the combat, and therefore refused to engage, standing still, till Claudius, transported with rage, leapt down from his seat, and running in a most unbecoming manner about the banks of the lake, threatened to destroy them with fire and sword, if they did not immediately engage (48).

shook the ground to a great distance and by its impetuosity and roaring, terrified and dismayed Claudius, his guests, and the spectators, who all betook themselves to flight, and narrowly escaped being carried away with the stream. Agrippina, taking advantage of the emperor's fright, charged Narcissus, the director of the work, with avarice, as if he had not laid out, but imbezzled the vast treasures allotted for it: on the other hand, Narcissus did not spare Agrippina, but reproached her with aspiring and boundless views^c. Dion Cassius writes, that Narcissus let out the waters on purpose to cover another fault, which the desire of saving for his own use the immense sums allowed him for the work, prompted him to commit^d; but what fault that was, he does not tell us: we only learn from Tacitus, that when the water was discharged, the negligence of the workmen and the insufficiency of the work manifestly appeared. Suetonius seems to insinuate, that Claudius accomplished this vast undertaking, and drained the lake. Pliny likewise reckons the draining of the lake Fucinus amongst the most remarkable works of Claudius; but it was neglected, says he, thro' envy, by his successor Nero. On the other hand, Dion Cassius calls the immense sums, laid out on this stupendous work, useless expences; and Seneca writes, that the lake Fucinus was in his time still full, though the workmen had in Claudius's time with immense labour finished the canal, which if Suetonius is to be credited, they hewed through a rocky mountain for three miles together^e. Spartianus says, that Adrian drained this lake^f. However, it is still to be seen in the Farther Abruzzo, and is known by the name of the lake of Celano. Towards the end of the year the Bitbynians sent deputies to Rome to accuse Junius Cilo, their governor, of extortion. He had indeed oppressed them in a most cruel and barbarous manner; but the emperor, when they were admitted to his presence, not well understanding what they said, desired Narcissus, when they withdrew, to acquaint him with the end of their embassy. They are come, answered frankly Narcissus, to return you thanks for your kindness, in appointing over them a man of such integrity, moderation, and disinterestedness, as Cilo. Hereupon Claudius relying intirely upon the faith of his freedman, commanded, that Cilo, since he had given such satisfaction, should be continued in his government two years longer, during which time he completed the ruin of that unhappy people^h: a remarkable instance this of the prince's weakness, and the impudent boldness of his freedmen!

Octavia.

THE following consuls were Decimus Junius Silanus Torquatus, and Q. Haterius Antoninus, during whose administration, Nero, who had entered the sixteenth year of his age on the fifteenth of December, married Octavia the daughter of Claudius, to whom he had been contracted three years before. Soon after, to acquire the glory of eloquence, he undertook the cause of the Ilians, and obtained for them, as the ancestors of the Romans, an intire immunity from all taxes and tributes whatsoever. He likewise made an oration in favour of the Rhodians, and prevailed with Claudius to restore them to their ancient liberty, which had been often taken from them, and often re-established: a third oration he pronounced in favour of the inhabitants of Bononia, a Roman colony, which had been utterly consumed by fire; and they were at his suit relieved with a large bountyⁱ. The two first orations he uttered in Greek, and the third in Latin. At the same time the inhabitants of Apamea, Byzantium, and Coos, having recourse to the young prince, obtained by his mediation signal favours; the Coans a general immunity from impositions (X), and the inhabitants of Apamea and Byzantium, a discharge from all tribute for the space of five years, the latter latter having suffered much by the late wars of Thrace and Bosphorus, of which we have spoken in the histories of those kingdoms; and the former by an earthquake. All this thro' the policy of Agrippina, to gain for her son the reputation of a compassionate and humane prince. On the contrary, she pushed Claudius upon all the most detested measures of cruelty. As she was desirous of possessing the fine gardens of Statilius Taurus, a senator of great distinction, who had been proconsul of Africa, she suborned Tarquitius Priscus, formerly his lieutenant, to charge him with having consulted the magicians concerning the term of the emperor's life. Taurus, finding Agrippina bent upon his destruction, laid violent hands on himself. The senate were to such a degree grieved for the loss of so worthy a citizen, and provoked against the accuser, that exerting themselves on this occasion, they expelled him the senate in spite of the protection and intrigues of Agrippina. Suetonius pretends, that Taurus, entering into a conspiracy with Gallus Asinius, corrupted several of the emperor's freedmen and domestics with a design to make an insurrection, whereas Tacitus, whom we have followed, tells us, he was prosecuted merely on account of his fine gardens, which upon his death Agrippina seized, as Messalina had done those of Valerius Asiaticus. Claudius had often declared, that the same force should be allowed to the decisions of his procurators, or receivers, as to his own; and now to shew that this was no declaration at random, he caused it to be confirmed and established by a decree of the senate. These receivers of the emperors were their stewards, persons intrusted with their domestic concerns, for the most part franchised slaves; and nevertheless to such sons of earth the weak prince, intirely controuled by them, was not ashamed to assert by a solemn decree of the senate, a power equal to his own, and to that of the laws. At the same time he conferred universal jurisdiction upon the equestrian order, the same jurisdiction, for which so many seditions had been formerly raised, and so much blood shed! Augustus had ordained, that the knights, who governed Egypt, should act judicially; soon after their jurisdiction was extended to other provinces; and even in Rome itself many things formerly determined by the prætors, were referred to the tribunal of the knights. Claudius now invested them with the same unbounded jurisdiction, which had been hitherto enjoyed by the senatorial order, and was looked upon by them as their peculiar prerogative.

(X) When Claudius proposed in the senate a general immunity from all manner of taxes and tributes in behalf of the Coans, he made a long descant upon their antiquity; how the Argives, or at least Ceus the father of Latona, first cultivated that island; how Æsculapius arrived thither soon after, and with him the art of medicine, an art which had long flourished amongst his descendants, whose names he rehearsed, and marked the several ages, in which they lived. He added, that Xenophon, his own physician, was descended from the same family; and that at his request an intire discharge for ever from all tributes ought to be granted to his countrymen, that they might attend only the cultivation of an island sacred to that deity. Tacitus observes, that he might have alledged many good offices of theirs towards the Roman people, nay, and victories gained by their aid; but had not judgment enough to colour under some public consideration his personal partiality to his physician (49). We shall soon see what return Xenophon made him for his kindness.

THE following year, M. Asinius Marcellus and M. Acilius Aviola being consuls, a change of affairs was portended, if the ancients are to be credited, by many prodigies (Y). But Agrippina was not so much alarmed by them, as by a saying of Claudius, uttered heedlessly in his wine; That it was his fate to bear the iniquities of his wives for some time, and at last to punish them. About the same time, having condemned a woman for adultery, he answered one of his freedmen, who applauded the justice of his sentence, It is my lot to be unfortunate in my marriages, and to punish adulteries; which plainly shewed, that he was not unapprised of the intrigues and amours of his wife. He likewise betrayed evident tokens of his repenting his marriage with Agrippina, and the adoption of Nero; for his son Britannicus presenting himself to him, he embraced him with more than ordinary kindness, bidding him grow up, for he would give him an account of his whole conduct; adding in Greek, It is love that prompts me; he declared at the same time his intention of giving him soon the manly robe, That the people of Rome, said he, may have at last a true Cæsar. As the emperor let no word drop, which was not immediately carried to Agrippina, she resolved to be before-hand with him; but first to destroy by his means Domitia Lepida, who gave her no small umbrage. She was daughter to Antonia the younger, great niece to Augustus,

(Y) The ensigns of the soldiers and their tents were scorched with fire from heaven; a swarm of bees settled upon the summit of the capitol; children were born of different forms; a pig was farrowed with the talons of a hawk (50). A blazing star appeared; the monument of his father Drusus was struck and split with lightning; the number of every order of magistrates was lessened that year; for one of the quæstors, one of the ædiles, a tribune, a prætor, and a consul, died within a few months.

In his designation of consuls he named none for that dignity beyond the month of October, in which he died, as if he had been apprised of his approaching end. The last time he came to the senate, having with great earnestness exhorted his natural and adopted son to live in unity and concord, he recommended them both to the care and protection of the fathers. The last time he administered justice in public, he is said to have told the people from his tribunal, that his course was ended (51).

Domitia Lepida accused and condemned.

Claudius is taken ill.

Is poisoned by the contrivance of Agrippina.

Augustus, cousin-german to Agrippina the elder, and sister to Cneius Domitius, the present Agrippina's former husband; so that she accounted herself no ways inferior to Agrippina in nobility, to whom she was equal in beauty, age, and wealth. They were, according to Tacitus, both prostitutes in their persons, infamous in their manners, violent in their tempers, and no less rivals in vices, than in the lustre of their families and the advantages of their fortunes. But their chief contention and struggle was, which of them, the aunt, or the mother, should acquire the sway over Nero. Lepida endeavoured to gain him with caresses and presents, while the imperious Agrippina treated him with severity and threats, like one, who was desirous indeed to raise him to the sovereignty, but seemed determined not to allow him to exercise his sovereign authority over her. To get rid of her troublesome rival, she accused Lepida of having sought by charms and imprecations to destroy the emperor's wife, and of disturbing the public peace of Italy by neglecting to restrain the tumultuous bands of her slaves in Calabria. For these imputations she was by the servile senate doomed to die, and executed in spite of the opposition and interest of Narcissus, who grew daily more and more distrustful of Agrippina, and therefore strove to save Lepida. We are told by Suetonius, that Nero himself was obliged by his mother to appear as a witness against his aunt, though he had a particular kindness and value for her. In the mean time, Claudius being taken ill, for the recovery of his health, had recourse to the soft air and wholesome waters of Sinuessa; and this occasion was greedily seized by Agrippina long since bent upon his destruction, and for that purpose well furnished with wicked agents. She thought it would be safest to procure his death by poison; but she was at a loss what sort to use; if it were powerful and sudden in its operation, her crime might thence be betrayed; if slow and consuming by degrees, there was danger, that Claudius, when his end approached, might suspect her, and thence annul the adoption of Nero. At length she adjudged a subtle poison the best, such as would disorder his senses, and not suddenly put an end to his life. An experienced artist in such preparations was chosen, by name Locusta, a woman who had been lately condemned for poisoning. By her the poison was prepared, and Halotus, an eunuch and the emperor's taster (Z), was charged to administer it; which he did accordingly in a dish of mushrooms, of which Claudius was a great lover. But whether it was from his natural stupidity, or because he was drunk, he did not seem to feel the virulence of the dose; at the same time a looseness seemed to relieve him, and to defeat the operation and force of the poison. Agrippina therefore, terribly dismayed, as one who knew that her own life lay at stake, had recourse to Xenophon, the emperor's physician, who being already engaged in her wicked designs, under pretence of assisting Claudius in his efforts to vomit, thrust down his throat a feather dipt in most potent poison, which soon put an end to his life (A). Thus died the emperor Caius Tiberius Claudius Nero, on the thirteenth of October, in the sixty-fourth year of his age, after having reigned thirteen years, eight months, and twenty days, reckoning from the day of Caius's death. He was a weak prince, almost a change-

* Idem, c. 65. * Suet. in Ner. c. 7. * Tacit. c. 69. Dio, p. 688. * Idem ibid. Dio, p. 689.

(Z) The office of taster, utterly unknown in the times of the republic, was probably established by Augustus, as we conjecture from the following epitaph still to be seen at Rome: Genio. Cæli. Herodian. Prægustator. Divi. Augusti. Idem. Postea. Villicus. In. Hortis. Sallustianis. Decessit. Nonis. Augustis. M. Cocceio. Nerva. C. Vibio. Rufino. Coss. Tiberius too had his taster, as appears from the following inscription: Ti. Claudius. Flamma. Clausus. Ti. Aug. Prægustator. Their example was, no doubt, followed by all the other emperors. This custom obtained among the Persians, as we read in Xenophon (52), and of them in all likelihood the Roman emperors borrowed it.

(A) Tacitus tells us, that all the particulars of Claudius's death were soon after so thoroughly known, that the writers of those times were able to relate the most minute circumstances of this black deed. But Suetonius writes, that though it is agreed on all hands, that he died by poison, yet authors are not unanimous either as to the place where, or the person by whom it was given. Some, says that writer, tell us, that the eunuch Halotus, his taster, poisoned him, while he was banquetting among the priests in the capitol. Others will have it, that in a feast at his own house Agrippina, knowing he was a great lover of mushrooms, presented him with one that was poisoned. Neither are the other circumstances of his death better known, continues the same writer; some relate, that he expired soon after he had taken the poison, others, that he continued all night in great agony, and died about break of day. Some affirm, that he fell asleep as soon as he had taken the dose, and was afterwards relieved with vomiting, whereupon the dose was doubled, &c. We have followed Tacitus, who seems to have been better acquainted with the circumstances of Claudius's death than any other writer, since he relates them without the least doubt or hesitation, as publicly known in his time.

a a changeling; had no discernment or passions of his own, but was intirely governed by his wives and freedmen. However, Tacitus seems to allow him a share of sense His character. at intervals. Suetonius reproaches him with cruelty; and tells us; that thirty-five senators; and above three hundred Roman knights, were by his orders put to death. But it is certain, that the prince himself was altogether a stranger to most of these executions; for a centurion bringing him one day word, that, pursuant to his orders, he had executed such a consular; the emperor, with no small surprise, answered, that he had given no such order; but one of his freedmen saying, that the officer had done well in revenging of his own accord injuries offered to the person of the emperor; he acquiesced, and without further inquiry approved of the execution ^w. Seneca in the bitter satyr he wrote against him says, among other things, that he no more scrupled the killing of a man, than the killing of a fly ^z. But his hatred to Claudius, by whom he had been banished to the island of Corfica and kept there for the space of eight years; prompted him to charge the prince with those crimes, which other writers, free from passion and prejudice, lay at the door of his wives and freed-men. He had, according to Tacitus, Dion Cassius, and Suetonius, many good qualities, was an utter enemy to all pride and ostentation, a stranger to revenge, free from the imputation of avarice, a great lover of justice; and when he acted of himself, and was not by fear bereft of his senses, inclined to mercy and compassion. But Seneca paints him as a monster, in whom centred all vices, without allowing him one single virtue, one good quality; whence it is but too manifest, that his passion got the better of his philosophy.

WHILE Claudius lay dead in his apartment, the senate; the consuls, and pontiffs, were offering vows for his recovery; nay, restoratives were still applied, and every thing else performed, as if they were not without hopes of his recovery, till matters were disposed for securing the empire to Nero. With this view Agrippina, as soon as the prince expired, personating inconsolable grief, and pretending to seek on all hands some allay to her sorrow, clasped Britannicus fast in her arms, styled him the true image of his father, and by various devices kept him in the chamber, and likewise his two sisters, Octavia and Antonia. At the same time, she posted guards in all the avenues, shut up all the passages, and from time to time gave out; that the prince was recovering. At last, when she had taken all possible precautions to prevent any disturbance, at noon the gates of the palace were unexpectedly thrown open, and Nero, accompanied by Burrhus, captain of the prætorian guards, walked forth to the cohort which was then upon duty. There, by the command of Burrhus, he was received with shouts of joy, and instantly put into a litter. Some indeed hesitated; frequently looking and asking, where was Britannicus? but as he was detained in the chamber of the deceased emperor, and no one appeared to propose him, they presently joined the others, and embraced the choice which was offered them. Thus Nero was carried to the camp, where, after a speech suitable to the exigency and the promise of a largess equal to that of the late prince, he was saluted emperor. Agrippina personates great sorrow. Procures Nero to be declared emperor. The declaration of the soldiers was followed and confirmed by the decrees of the senate, which were, without reluctance, accepted by the people both at Rome and in the provinces. To Claudius was decreed a solemn and pompous funeral, the same as had been ordained for Augustus, Agrippina emulating the magnificence of her great-grand-mother Livia Augusta. His last will, however; though attested by the hands and seals of all the magistrates, was not read in public, lest his preferring there the son of his wife to his own son might be resented by the people ^y.

Nero had scarce been saluted emperor, when the imperious and revengeful Agrippina made what haste she could to dispatch Narcissus, who had spoken reproachfully of her, and betrayed no small affection for Britannicus. She caused him to be immediately arrested; and dragged to prison, where he was, through fear of a more ignominious and cruel death, constrained to lay violent hands on himself, sore against the will of Nero. He is said to have been at once profuse and rapacious, to have surpassed in wealth Cræsus, the kings of Persia, and Claudius himself, and at the same time to have excelled all the prodigals of his age. As he bore an absolute sway under Claudius, his friendship was courted by foreign kings, cities, and provinces, all striving who should make him the most magnificent presents. We have seen in the course of Claudius's reign, by how many crimes he deserved the doom that overtook him him at last. But after all, he was faithful to his master, preserved his life with great care, and was ready, as Tacitus informs us, to lay down his own for his service.^a Agrippina would never have attempted to poison Claudius, if Dion Cassius is to be credited; had she not first removed Narcissus, by persuading him to try the baths of Campania for the recovery of his health. Before he laid violent hands on himself, he consigned to the flames several letters and secret papers against Agrippina, which, as the prince's secretary, he had in his custody, that her accusers might not be exposed to the fury of a woman, whose tempestuous spirit, to use his expression, and violent lust of dominion, if not restrained, would soon drown Rome in blood.^b Zonarus tells us, upon what authority we know not, that Narcissus put an end to his life upon the tomb of Messalina.^c About the same time, another victim, far more illustrious, was sacrificed, and indeed unknown to Nero, by the deadly fraud of Agrippina. This was Junius Silanus, proconsul of Asia, a man of great wealth and equal quality, but of a quiet disposition, and so little inclined to raise any disturbances in the state, that he had, during the late reigns, spent his life in slothful indolence, and even in scorn; in so much, that Caligula used to call him the golden sheep. However, as upon the death of Claudius, it was whispered among the populace, that as Nero was scarce out of his childhood, and had by iniquity acquired the empire, such a man as Silanus ought to be preferred to him, one of ripe years, of an unblemished character, and, what was then highly esteemed, descended from the Cæsars; for he too was the great grandson of Augustus; this was enough for Agrippina to dispatch him; and accordingly she sent orders, without her son's consent or knowledge, to P. Celer, a Roman knight, and to Helius, a freedman, both the emperor's receivers in Asia, to murder Silanus. Her orders were obeyed, and poison was given him at a banquet by the two assassins, so openly, as if they were neither ashamed nor afraid to own the murder. A torrent of slaughters would have followed, had not Afranius Burrhus and Annaeus Seneca prevented it. These were the young prince's governors, who was now only in the seventeenth year of his age. Though partners in power, yet, by a rare instance, they lived free from all jealousy and emulation, and were of equal weight and authority, though different in their accomplishments. Burrhus was his instructor in the military art, and Seneca in the precepts of eloquence. In these different offices they assisted and supported each other, the easier to manage between them the dangerous age of the prince, neither of them having any thing in view, any thing at heart, but the service of their illustrious pupil and the welfare of the public. They had both one constant struggle to maintain against the turbulent spirit of Agrippina, who, transported with the lust of ruling without controul and supported by Pallas, was for sacrificing, even before the obsequies of her husband were performed, to her rage and jealousy, all those who gave her the least umbrage. But Burrhus and Seneca, unanimously exerting their authority, restrained her blind rage, and kept her within bounds. Nero indeed heaped all kinds of honours upon her, and to the tribune, who came to attend him, the first day of his government, for the word, he gave that of optima mater, excellent mother: the senate too, the first time they assembled, decreed her two lictors, and several other marks of distinction; but the emperor's governors, bearing a greater sway than she over his youthful mind, prevented her from committing such excesses, as she had been guilty of during the late reign.^d

Nero's first care after his accession to the empire was, to perform, with all possible pomp and magnificence, the obsequies of the deceased emperor: he pronounced himself his funeral oration, in which he displayed the antiquity of his lineage, the many consulships, the many triumphs of his ancestors; he likewise touched upon his personal accomplishments, especially his eloquence, and thorough knowledge of the Greek tongue; all which was heard with attention and pleasure. But when he began to cry up the wisdom, foresight, and providence of Claudius, the whole audience broke into a loud laughter; though the speech was of Seneca's composing, and discovered much accuracy and elegance; for he had, says Tacitus, a fine genius and a style well adapted to the taste of that time. On this occasion it was observed, that Nero was the first Roman emperor who stood in need of another man's eloquence; Cæsar the dictator stood in rank with the most distinguished orators, and none of his successors wanted eloquence, address, and energy in speaking. But Nero having from his early childhood applied himself to graving, painting, singing, and manageing of chariots, was obliged to employ the pen of Seneca, where-ever he had occasion to speak in public, or even to write letters concerning affairs of any importance. Seneca had one under him, named Beryllus, who is styled by Josephus^c, Nero's preceptor, but was only his Greek secretary.

WHEN the obsequies were over, the young prince repaired to the senate, where, after an introduction, in which he acknowledged himself indebted for the empire to the authority of the senate and the concurrence of the soldiery, he declared in what manner he designed to govern; that he claimed not the judgment and decision of affairs; that the whole power and authority should not be confined to a few persons, but every magistrate should have their peculiar jurisdiction; that nothing should be saleable within his walls, nor any access there to informers; that between his family and the republic a just distinction should ever be maintained; that the senate should preserve their ancient jurisdiction; that Italy and the provinces belonging to the people should apply only to the consuls, and by them procure access to the fathers; that to himself he reserved what was especially committed to his care, the direction of the armies: he concluded with assuring them, that he designed to govern his people according to the model of the deified Augustus. The senate ordered this speech, which was likewise composed by Seneca, to be engraved on a plate of silver, and to be annually read in the senate by the new consuls^f. At the same time, they accumulated all kinds of honours upon him, which he accepted, without refusing any, except that of Father of his country, in consideration of his youth^e, which, however, he assumed before the second year of his reign expired, as appears from some ancient medals^k. He seemed at first inclined to perform the mighty promises he had made to the senate; for this year he gave innumerable instances of clemency, moderation, and good-nature: to the people he distributed four hundred sesterces a man; to such of the senators as were descended from illustrious families, but reduced to poverty, he allowed annual salaries, to some five hundred thousand sesterces, besides a certain quantity of corn, which he likewise allowed monthly to his guards: many impositions he utterly suppressed, and retrenched others to a fourth: he redressed several disorders; restrained the profuse luxury of feasts and banquets, which had obtained during the late reign, Claudius himself being greatly addicted to feasting; with the approbation of the senate he published an edict, forbidding the selling of any thing boiled in public houses, except pulse and greens; he suppressed a kind of sports, in which certain persons, running up and down the city, pretended to have by custom acquired a right of robbing, as it were in jest, all they met, and carrying off whatever they could seizeⁱ. The senate likewise, depending upon the prince's declaration began to exercise their ancient jurisdiction: and made various regulations, among the rest the two following; that no orator or pleader should receive any fee, payment, or present, for defending a cause; and that those, who were designed quæstors, should be no longer obliged to exhibit public shews of gladiators. All this was opposed by Agrippina as annulling the acts of Claudius; but Nero preferred the counsels of Burrhus and Seneca to those of his mother; and the fathers prevailed. However, out of respect to her, he caused her late husband Claudius to be ranked among the gods, with all the solemnity and pomp of priests, altars, and sacrifices: which gave occasion to the pleasantry of Gallio the brother of Seneca, who hearing of the deification of Claudius, could not help saying, that he had been drawn up to heaven with a hook, as the criminals were dragged to the Tiber^k. Towards the end of this year, Nero bestowed the Lesser Armenia on Aristobulus the son of Herod, king of Chalcis; to Sobemus he gave, with the ensigns of royalty and title of king, the country of Sophene, lying between Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Comagene, and added some towns of Galilee to the territories which Claudius had given to Agrippa, the son of Agrippa, king of Judea^l. Before the year expired, ambassadors arrived from Armenia to plead before Nero a cause of their nation; and while the emperor was hearing them, seated on the imperial throne, Agrippina appeared all on a sudden, and was advancing to sit in joint judgment with the prince. The whole assembly was struck with amazement; but no one daring to restrain her, Seneca suggested to him, to descend and meet his mother; and thus, under the disguise of filial reverence, that public disgrace was prevented; for the Romans thought it highly ignominious, that foreign nations should believe believe them to be governed by a woman¹. The audience was put off to another day, when Seneca and Burrhus took effectual care to prevent her disturbing it. As her son was but a youth, and wholly indebted to her for the sovereignty, she claimed an equal share in it with him, and therefore pretended to answer foreign ambassadors jointly with him, to write letters to princes and kings, to dispatch orders to the governors of provinces and commanders of armies; to preside among the Roman eagles, and in short, to be called and acknowledged a partner in the empire, which her ancestors had acquired, and she had conferred on her son. She always accompanied him in the same litter, was attended by the same guards, and at first prevailed upon the young prince to assemble the senate in the palace, that, posted by a door behind a curtain, she might over-hear the debates without being seen². Seneca and Burrhus, well apprised what dreadful disorders she would raise, if she once got the ascendant over the prince, left no stone unturned to lessen her power; and their attempts were not without success, as we shall find anon. The same year, Nero applied to the senate for a statue to his father, and for the consular ornaments to Asconius Labeo, who had been his tutor. The senate not only complied with his request, but at the same time decreed statues to himself of solid silver and gold, which he absolutely refused, and checked those who proposed them. The senate likewise decreed, that the year should for the future begin on December, the month in which Nero was born; but, notwithstanding the ordinance of the senate, he preserved the ancient custom of beginning the year with the first of January. Neither would he admit a criminal prosecution against Corinas Celer, a senator, upon the accusation of a slave; nor against Julius Densus, a Roman knight, who was charged with his devotion to Britannicus, as a great crime³.

Nero's modesty.

Nero's first consulship.

Begins to slight the authority of his mother.

He is indulged by his governors in his passion for Acte.

THE following year, Nero, who was, by a decree of the senate, to exercise the consulship in the twentieth year of his age, tho' he was now but in his eighteenth, took possession of that dignity, agreeable to the custom of other emperors, who never failed to assume the fasces the year after their accession to the empire. He chose for his colleague L. Antistius Vetus; but would not suffer him to swear, as was usual, upon his acts, an action mightily cried up by the fathers, with a design to animate his youthful mind to the pursuit of glory resulting from things of greater moment. At the same time, he gave a signal instance of his mercy towards Plautius Lateranus, whom, formerly degraded from the order of senator for adultery with Messalina, he now restored to his ancient rank. Tacitus observes, that he made great professions of clemency in the frequent speeches, which Seneca, the composer, uttered in public by his mouth, either to manifest what good counsels he gave him, or to display his own wit⁴. After two months he resigned the fasces; but to whom we are no-where told. This year, Nero first began to slight the authority of his mother, which was no-ways displeasing to Seneca and Burrhus, who dreaded her violent spirit, and expected to see the calamities of the late reign renewed, if she came to bear the chief sway in the administration. The young prince conceived a violent passion for a franchised slave, by name Acte, and at the same time assumed as confidants in his amour Otho and Claudius Senecio; the first of a consular family, the same who arrived afterwards at the empire, and the other the son of one of the emperor's freedmen. They were both youths of graceful persons, but utterly abandoned to all manner of lewdness and debauchery, and on that score admitted by Nero to an intire intimacy. Seneca and Burrhus were soon informed of their pupil's intrigue; but, upon mature deliberation thought it adviseable not to thwart him in his amour, since with a woman of low condition, to the injury of no man, the prince satisfied his youthful inclinations; whereas, if he were restrained from that gallantry, there was room to dread that he would outrageously insult women of the greatest distinction; for he had already conceived an utter aversion to his wife Oetavia, however illustrious in her birth, however celebrated for her virtue. Thus reasoned Burrhus and Seneca, men, without all doubt, of great penetration, experience, and discernment⁵. But Dion Cassius ascribes to their unseasonable condescension and indulgence the many horrible excesses, which will render the name of Nero execrable to the latest posterity. Crimes, says that judicious writer, are linked together, and a passion, when once let loose, is scarce ever again restrained within due bounds. The prince's governors meant well; but the prince, finding they did not check the first sallies of his passion, took by degrees greater a greater liberties, and at length, impatient of all controul, gave a loose to his irregular appetites. Thus Dion Cassius ^r. But, however that be, Agrippina could not dissemble the irregular conduct of her son, not from any motive of virtue; as will soon appear, but because she dreaded the extravagant power of a concubine. She left no stone unturned to check his growing passion; she filled the city with the angry invectives of an incensed woman; complained, fretted, and stormed; that a manumitted slave was become her rival; a hand-maid her daughter-in-law. But the fouler her reproaches were; the more they fired his passion; so that, being at length overcome by its force, he shook off all respect to his mother, and threw himself; without reserve; into the arms of Seneca, with whom he knew Annaeus Serenus (B) lived in close confidence; one who had hitherto cloaked the prince's passion for Acte, by pretending to be in love with her himself, and had openly presented to her in his own name whatever Nero in secret bestowed upon her. Agrippina was no sooner apprised of this, than she changed her arts and address; attempting to regain the confidence of her son by soft and alluring speeches; she even offered him her own chamber, that there, and, if he pleased, within her own arms; he might more privately indulge his passion, a passion pardonable in one of his youthful years and sovereign fortune. She even acknowledged her unseasonable severity, and made him a tender of all her wealth, which was not much short of the imperial treasures. Thus from being over-strict in checking her son, she became all at once beyond all measure submissive and fawning. This sudden change deceived not Nero; and his intimate friends, dreading it, besought him to be upon his guard against the snares of an implacable and deceitful woman ^r.

his mother.

Who endeavours afterwards to be-mour him.

It happened about this time, that as Nero was surveying the rich ornaments, in which the emperors wives and mothers used to appear on solemn days, he chose out the most pompous and stately, and sent them as presents to his mother. This the young prince did to convince her, that though he would not be controuled by her, yet he bore her no rancour or ill-will; but Agrippina, transported with rage, uttered bitter complaints against her son, who, she said, by sending her such trifles, did not so much intend to make her a present, as to exclude her from all the rest, and to divide with her what he had wholly received from her. These words, as slanderers and tale-bearers are never wanting in courts, were immediately carried to Nero with aggravations; who thereupon provoked with Pallas, by whom chiefly Agrippina was upheld in her ambitious designs; dismissed him from his employment, the management of the finances, which he had received from Claudius, and in which he had acted more like the sovereign director of the empire, than a minister. We are told, that as he left the palace, attended by a great throng of followers, Nero said, not unpleasantly, Pallas is going to abdicate the sovereignty. The emperor, however, assured him upon his word, that he should not be questioned for his past behaviour, and that as to his accounts, the public should have no more demands upon him, than he upon the public. Thus Pallas forfeited his power, but preserved immense wealth, amounting to seven millions of our money, to the hour of his death, which happened in the eighth year of Nero's reign, as we shall relate in its proper place. The disgrace of Pallas provoked Agrippina to such a degree, that, not able to refrain her rage, she abandoned herself to it without controul, uttering dreadful threats and curses even in the emperor's hearing. Britannicus, said she, is now grown up, the true and worthy son of Claudius; he is now fit to assume the empire of his father, an empire, which one, who is a son only by adoption, holds to the prejudice of the lawful heir, and exerts his ill-acquired power chiefly by abusing and insulting his mother: she threatened to lay open to the world all her infamous practices, all the steps she had taken to secure the empire to the ungrateful monster her son, the surreptitious adoption, her own guilt in poisoning her husband, the crying calamities she had brought upon her own family, the unhappy house of Germanicus, &c. She added, that only one comfort

(B) He was commander of the city guards, and generally esteemed, notwithstanding his thus cloaking Nero's passion for Acte. To him Seneca inscribed his book de tranquillitate, and was to such a degree grieved for the loss of so dear and worthy a friend, as he himself owns in one of his letters (38), that he deserved to be ranked among those who had suffered themselves to be overcome by an unmanly grief.

fort by the providence of the gods remained to her, that her step-son was yet alive ; with him she would repair to the camp, and there leave it to the decision of the soldiery, whether the prating pedagogue Seneca and the maimed Burrhus, or the son of the deified Claudius and the daughter of the renowned Germanicus, should have the sovereign rule of mankind. At the same time, she shook her fist at the emperor himself, tossed her hands, uttered all manner of reproaches, curses, imprecations ; devoted the monster, so she called her son, and his governors to the infernal furies ; invoked the manes of her husband Claudius, of the Silani, and many others, whom she had murdered to no purpose. This alarmed Nero, and as Britannicus the next day ended the fourteenth year of his age, when he was to take the manly robe, the emperor began seriously to reflect with himself, now on the violent temper of his mother, then upon the promising genius of the youth, of which he had given in the late feasts of Saturn a glaring proof, and gained by it the favour and esteem of all. Besides many other innocent diversions practised on that occasion by the Roman youth of the like age and condition, it was an ancient custom among them to chuse a king, whose commands, whatever they were, the whole company was bound to obey. The king was chosen by lot, and in the palace, where the emperor, who was himself but a youth, Britannicus, and other children of the first quality, diverted themselves with this pastime, the lot fell upon Nero, who thereupon gave to all the rest different commands, yet such as exposed them to no ridicule ; but that to Britannicus was to stand up in the middle of the company, and there sing a song. He hoped the boy, unaccustomed as he was to company, and quite ignorant how to behave himself in public, would become an object of laughter. But Britannicus, to the great surprise of all, with a becoming modesty, and an undisturbed address, though the eyes of the whole court were upon him, raised his voice, and sung a few verses, importing, that he was bereft of his natural inheritance, and unjustly deprived of the authority to which he was born. The modest and comely aspect of the youth, the deep concern which he betrayed in every note, and the reflections which all, who were present, made within themselves, drew sighs and tears from the whole company. Nero, struck with the address of the youth, but more with the verses he sung, immediately withdrew, as did all the rest in silence, to give free vent to their grief in private, and let their tears flow unrestrained. From that time Nero conceived an irreconcilable hatred to the innocent youth, and being now alarmed at the threats of his mother, he resolved to rid himself of one, whom he no longer looked upon as a brother, but as a competitor. But not daring openly to command the execution of a person of his rank, whom he could reproach with no crime, he ordered poison to be privately prepared, employing as his agent Julius Pollio, tribune of a prætorian cohort, in whose custody was kept under condemnation for poisoning the famous Locusta, who had administered poison to Claudius. As for those who were about the person of Britannicus, Agrippina had long since taken care, that they should be such as had no sense of honour or honesty. The dose was therefore hastily prepared by Locusta, and administered to the young prince by the hands of his governors ; but whether it was not powerful enough in itself, or, to prevent a discovery by its sudden operation, it had been qualified, it was without effect, being voided by a looseness. Hereupon Nero threatened the tribune with immediate death, and would have ordered Locusta to be executed, pursuant to her former sentence, for preferring her own safety to the security of the prince, had she not undertaken to prepare a dose, which, she engaged, should dispatch him as suddenly as a dagger. Accordingly the deadly potion, compounded of several poisons, all of experienced energy and quickness, was prepared in a chamber next to the emperor's, and in his presence. The opportunity to give it him was taken while he was dining with the emperor ; but at a separate table, and more sparingly served, as it was the manner of the children of the reigning family, who were never admitted to the emperor's table, but took their meals apart with other young noblemen, not in a lying, but sitting, posture. Whatever the princes of the imperial family eat or drank, was first tried by a special officer of theirs, a taster. To the end therefore, that neither this custom might be omitted, nor the iniquity be discovered, by the death of both, the matter was thus concerted. To Britannicus drink was presented without poison, and tried by the taster, but scalding hot, and for that reason returned. It was then tempered with cold water, into which poison had been poured before-hand, of such force and quickness in its operation, that Britannicus had scarce drunk it when he fell to the ground, bereft at once of speech and life. Fear and trembling a trembling seized his companions; some instantly made off, but others, who comprehended the mystery, remained with their eyes fixed stedfastly upon Nero, who with the air of one utterly ignorant, declared, that it was only an usual fit of the falling sickness, to which Britannicus had been subject from his early childhood, and that by degrees his sight and understanding would return. Agrippina and the young prince's sister Octavia were both present, but strove to conceal their grief and surprise; wherein Octavia indeed topped her part, having learnt, however raw in years, artfully to dissemble every symptom of grief and tenderness, and every other affection of her soul. But Agrippina, sensible that her last refuge was snatched from her, could not help betraying manifest tokens of dread and consternation. However, with disguised looks, she endeavoured to smother her concern; so that after a short silence the gaiety of the entertainment was resumed. ^b Suetonius tells us, that Titus, afterwards emperor, being among the other young noblemen at table with Britannicus; when he drank the baneful potion, tasted it, but recovered after a lingering and dangerous illness. This is no-ways consistent, as every reader must perceive, with the detail, which Tacitus, of all the antient writers the most accurate, gives us of that remarkable incident.

UPON one and the same day were seen the untimely fate of Britannicus and his funeral pile, to which his corpse was conveyed in the evening, all things belonging to his funeral having been prepared beforehand. His remains were reposed in the field of Mars without any pomp, solemnity, or even a funeral oration; though he was the last branch of the Claudian family, which had subsisted in great splendor, and upon its own stock, without adoptions, ever since the time of Romulus, that is, for the space of eight hundred and three years. During the funeral a violent and tempestuous shower of rain fell, which the populace looked upon as a declaration of the wrath of the gods for such a crying iniquity, while others, reflecting on the eternal dissensions of rival brothers; and the unfociable genius of sovereignty, called it a pardonable crime. ^w Nero by an edict justified the hasty dispatch of the obsequies, complained, that in Britannicus he had lost the support of a brother; and exhorted the fathers to cherish with the greater tenderness a prince, who alone survived of a family, born to sustain the sovereign power. He then distributed the possessions of Britannicus, his palaces in Rome, his manors and villas throughout Italy, like spoils taken in war, among the chief persons of his court, to purchase by such donations their approbation, or at least their silence. Tacitus tells us, that some were severely censured for sharing in these distributions, notwithstanding the severity and uprightness they professed. He means, no doubt, Burrhus and Seneca; but endeavours to excuse them, by adding, that they were perhaps constrained to accept the presents by the authority of the emperor, who, being stung with the guilt of his own conscience, hoped, that his crimes would be overlooked, if by largesses he could engage, as it were, in the same guilt, persons of such credit and reputation. In this distribution Nero did not forget his mother, but could by no liberalities calm her tempestuous spirit. She caressed Octavia, the deceased prince's sister and the emperor's wife; held frequently secret cabals with her confidants; and was on all hands amassing treasure; as if she had some great design to support with it: she paid great court to the tribunes and centurions, and received in the most obliging manner such of the nobility as came to wait upon her. These measures were known to Nero, who thereupon withdrew the prætorian guards, which attended her, as consort to the late emperor and mother to this, and also the band of Germans, which, as a farther honour, had been added to the former: at the same time, he commanded her to quit the palace, and retire to the house, which had belonged to her grandmother Antonia. He repaired thither now and then to visit her, but always surrounded with a crowd of officers, and withdrew after a short compliment. Agrippina was immediately deserted in her new habitation; the throng of courtiers, who daily frequented her levee while she lived in the palace, instantly vanished; no one appeared to comfort her in her disgrace; no one to visit her, except a small number of ladies, and these not from any friendship or affection, to which insects, who frequent courts; are commonly no less strangers than to virtue and honesty, but to watch all the words and actions of the disgraced princess, and carry them with the usual aggravations of tale-bearers to the emperor. Among these was Julia Silana, whom Caius Silius had divorced; as we have have related above, to marry Messalina. She was no less infamous for her lewdness, than renowned on account of her high birth and extraordinary beauty; had been long dear to Agrippina, and had for a considerable while lived with her in great intimacy; but being afterwards disgusted with her for diverting Sextius Africanus, a noble youth, from marrying her, she resolved now to make Agrippina pay dear for the wrong done her. With this view she instructed two of her own creatures, Iturius and Calvisius, to accuse her, as if she designed to marry Rubellius Plautus, great-grandson to Augustus, with a view to raise disturbances in the state. This was by Iturius and Calvisius imparted to Atimetus, the freedman of Domitia, Nero's aunt; and by him to Paris, the celebrated player, who was also Domitia's freedman. Paris hastened to the emperor, laid before him a minute detail of the pretended conspiracy, and so terrified him, that, without any further inquiries, he resolved not only to put his mother and Plautus to death, but to remove Burrhus, the captain of his guards, as one who owed his promotion to Agrippina. Some authors write, that a commission was already dispatched to Cæcina Thuscus, intrusting him with the command of the prætorian bands; but that Burrhus retained his dignity by the interest and mediation of Seneca: others write, that no jealousy was entertained of that officer's fidelity. However that be, Nero could not be diverted from the cruel purpose of killing his mother, till Burrhus took upon him to see her executed, in case she were convicted of the crimes laid to her charge; but every one, he said, ought to be heard before condemnation, and much more a mother. Early next morning, Burrhus and Seneca, attended by some of the emperor's freedmen to watch their discourse, went to wait on Agrippina, and notify to her the charge brought against her, and give her the names of her accusers. She received them with great haughtiness, and when her crimes were explained to her, defended herself with her wonted fierceness, but at the same time with such energy, that Seneca and Burrhus, fully convinced of her innocence, not only declared her free from all guilt, but at her request prevailed with the emperor to grant her an interview, during which she took not the least notice of the crimes laid to her charge, as if her innocence were sufficiently known, nor of the obligations he owed her, lest she should seem to reproach him with ingratitude; but confidently demanded, that vengeance should be taken of her accusers and suitable rewards conferred on her friends, and obtained both. Among her friends Fenius Rufus was honoured with the charge of supplying the city with corn; to Aruntius Stella was given the direction of certain public shews; to Caius Balbilius was assigned the government of Egypt, and that of Syria to Publius Anteius, who was nevertheless under various pretences detained at Rome. Of her accusers, Silana, Calvisius, and Iturius were sent into exile; against Atimetus sentence of death was pronounced and executed; but Paris, the emperor's inseparable companion in his debauches, was dismissed without any punishment*. This year Pallas and Burrhus were charged with a design of raising to the empire Cornelius Sylla, who had married Antonia, the late emperor's daughter; but the charge appearing evidently forged, they were both declared innocent. The arrogance of Pallas, however innocent, gave on this occasion no small offence; for the accuser naming to him some of his freedmen, whom he pretended to have been his accomplices, the franchised slave had the impudence to answer, that he never condescended to speak to any of his domestics, but constantly signified his pleasure to them by a nod, a motion of his hand, or, if his commands consisted of many particulars, in writing, that they might thus learn to keep their distance. Burrhus, though accused, sat and voted with the other judges, by whom the accuser Petus was condemned to banishment. Towards the close of the year, the emperor caused the cohort to be removed, which used to attend, as a guard, at the public sports, to exhibit thereby a plausible appearance of popular liberty, and also to prevent the soldiery from tainting their discipline with the licentiousness of the theatre†. Such was Nero, during the first year of his reign, when he gloried in not having shed one drop of blood, as we learn from the books of clemency, which Seneca inscribed to him some time after he had entered the nineteenth year of his age; that is, about the fifty-fifth of the Christian æra. The chief aim of that excellent writer throughout the whole work is to imprint deeply in the mind of his pupil, that a general and extensive beneficence is the genuine characteristic of a good prince; that those who are intrusted with the sovereign power, are not only bound to protect the innocent innocent and guiltless; but often extend their mercy and good-nature to those who may seem unworthy of their favour and protection. This he insinuates to have hitherto been practised by Nero; and relates a celebrated saying of the young prince, who being desired by Burrhus to sign a warrant for the execution of two public robbers, put it off from time to time; but Burrhus pressing him to dispatch that affair, he at last set his hand to the warrant with the utmost reluctance, which he expressed with the following words mightily extolled by Seneca: Oh had I never learnt to write! A signal instance of Nero's clemency.

THE following year, Quintus Volusius Saturninus and P. Cornelius Scipio being consuls, Nero began to indulge with more liberty his youthful inclinations, his debauched companions, especially Otho and Senecio, of whom we have spoken above, incessantly repeating in his ears, that he was no longer a child, to be awed by a Burrhus or a Seneca; that they ought to tremble before him, as their sovereign, and not he before them, as his tutors and masters, &c. As youth are more susceptible of bad than good counsels, the young prince, in spite of the wholesome advice of his governors, abandoned himself to unseasonable revellings, and filled Rome with innumerable disorders. Nero abandons himself to revelling and debauchery. For, unmindful of his rank and disguised in the habit of a slave, he scoured in the night the streets, the public inns, and the stews, followed by his debauched companions, who seized as a lawful prey whatever they found exposed to sale, and assaulted whomsoever they met. In these frolics he often ran great dangers, and once was so wounded in the face, that he ever afterwards bore the scar, no one imagining it was the emperor who thus roamed and rioted about the streets. But when that came to be known, his name was falsely assumed as a cloak by others, who in separate gangs practised the same excesses; so that such combustions happened almost every night in the city, as if it had been stormed by an enemy. The prince having one night offered some affront to a woman of distinction, as she was returning home in the dark, her husband, by name Julius Montanus, a senator, who attended her, not only repulsed the aggressor, but handled him so roughly, that he was for several days obliged to keep his room: Suetonius says, he was almost killed. However, he dissembled this treatment so long as it remained unknown to whom it had been offered; but Montanus having at last discovered it was the emperor, and thereupon implored by a letter his forgiveness, Nero, thinking he reproached him by owning he knew him, obliged him by threats and menaces to lay violent hands on himself. Thenceforth the emperor became more cautious, and was constantly attended in his nocturnal rambles by a party of his guards, and a numerous train of gladiators following him at some distance, who, however, were ordered not to interpose, till the prince's party was quite overcome. He likewise took great delight in stirring up and inflaming the different factions in the play-house, that favoured particular players; and when they were engaged, as it were, in battle, it was a great diversion to him to throw stones and pieces of broken benches among them, with which he once dangerously wounded a prætor in the head. These tumults rent the whole city into parties and factions, some favouring one player, and some another; insomuch, that greater and more dangerous commotions being apprehended, no other remedy was found, Players driven out of but that of driving the players out of Italy, and recalling the soldiers to guard the Italy theatre at the celebration of the public shews^a. Under the same consuls, Vipsanius Lenas was accused of extortion in his government of Sardinia, and condemned to banishment: Cestius Proculus, charged with the same crime, was acquitted: Clodius Quirinalis, commander of the fleet which rode at Ravenna, being convicted of several acts of cruelty, prevented by poison his impending condemnation: Caninius Rebilus, one of the ablest civilians and richest citizens in Rome, redeemed himself from the uneasiness of an old age broken with infirmities, by opening his veins, which was thought the more surprising, as he had ever been infamous for his effeminacy and lasciviousness. The same year, died Lucius Volusius Saturninus, in the ninety-third year of his age, a man of great integrity, wealth, and interest, and nevertheless, what to Tacitus seems a kind of prodigy, never obnoxious to, or disturbed by, any of the bloody emperors under whom he lived^b. He was father to Quintus Volusius, this year's consul, who was born to him in the sixty-second year of his age: he was governor of Rome when he died^c.

Several instances of Nero's generosity, goodness, &c.

THE next consuls were Nero, the second time, and L. Calpurnius Piso, who, after six months, resigned the fasces to Ducennius Geminius and Pompeius Paulinus. This year, Nero remitted the duty upon the sale of slaves, distributed to the populace a largess of four hundred small sesterces a man; and issued an edict, forbidding all governors of provinces to exhibit any public shews, being well apprised, that such acts of munificence were only designed to stop the mouths of the people; who in the end bore the whole charge; so that the liberality of their governors and their avarice concurred equally to undo them. He likewise consented, with great readiness, to a decree of the senate, enacting, that if any one was killed by his slaves, those who had been manumitted, if they still continued under the same roof, should be executed with his other slaves. Lucius Varius, who had been consul, but formerly degraded for extortion; he restored to his rank; and referred Pomponia Græcina, a lady of great distinction, but accused of having embraced a foreign superstition, says Tacitus, meaning probably the christian religion, pursuant to the ancient custom, to the inquisition of her husband. She was married to Aulus Plautius, the same who, by his conquests in Britain in the reign of Claudius, had deserved an ovation. Plautius assembled his relations, took together with them cognizance of the behaviour and reputation of his wife, and declared her innocent. P. Celer was accused of many crimes by the province of Asia; but as he had dispatched by poison the proconsul Silanus, as we have related above, that crime covered all his other enormities; so that Nero, ashamed to discharge him and unwilling to condemn him, lengthened out the process, till he died of old age. Eprius Marcellus was accused by the Lycians of extortion; but absolved, though evidently guilty; nay, so powerful a faction was formed in his favour, that some of his accusers were punished with exile, as if they had conspired the ruin of an innocent man. The Cicilians had better success in the prosecution of Cossutianus Capito, who, for his extortions, was condemned to banishment.

Relieves poor senators.

THE following year, Nero entered upon his third consulship; but held it only four months. His colleague was Valerius Messala, to whom, as he was of an illustrious family but by misfortunes reduced to poverty, Nero generously presented a yearly pension of five hundred great sesterces. At the same time, he assigned annual appointments to other senators, who did not deserve them, having wasted their paternal wealth in voluptuousness and riotous living. This year Publius Suius, an abandoned accuser, who had made a great figure during the reign of Claudius, and with his venal eloquence procured the ruin of many illustrious citizens, was arraigned of various crimes. He was charged with the death of Poppæa Sabina, of Julia the daughter of Drusus, of Valerius Asiaticus, of Lucius Saturninus, of Cornelius Lupus, and of whole bands of Roman knights condemned at his instigation; in short, all the cruelties committed in the late reign were imputed to Suius. In his defence he urged, that he had engaged in none of these accusations of his own accord, but purely in obedience to the prince. But Nero checked this plea, by declaring, that from the memoirs of Claudius it evidently appeared, that no accusation whatsoever had been undertaken by his orders. The accused then pleaded the commands of Messalina: but this too was reckoned a weak defence; for why, it was said, had no other advocate but Suius been singled out to accomplish the bloody purposes of that prostitute? Seneca seems to have been the chief and most sanguine promoter of this prosecution; for against him chiefly Suius inveighed, reproaching him with contaminating the beds of princesses, meaning Julia, Germanicus's daughter; with hunting after inheritances, and catching the rich and childless, as it were, in his net; with his exhausting all Italy and the provinces by his excessive usury; with amassing, by what precepts of wisdom, by what principles of philosophy, he said, he knew not, a treasure of more than seven millions, in the short space of four years. These reproaches, says Tacitus, did not a little taint the reputation and character of his antagonist Seneca. Suius, however, was condemned, and banished to the Balearic islands on the coast of Spain. In hatred to him his son Nerulinus was also arraigned; but Nero interposed, alledging, that public vengeance was sufficiently satiated by the doom of the father^d. This year was first kindled Nero's passion for the celebrated Poppæa Sabina; a passion which proved the source of heavy calamities to the Roman state. She was the daughter of another Poppæa Sabina, put to death by Messalina's orders.

orders, as we have related above, and of Titus Ollius, a senator. As Poppæus Sabina, her mother's father, had shone in the republic, borne the consular dignity, and been honoured with triumphal ornaments, she borrowed his name, and called herself Poppæa Sabina; for to her own father the friendship of Sejanus had proved fatal, before he had attained to any dignity. She possessed every ornament becoming her sex, except that of virtue; in beauty she excelled all the women of her time; her wit, engaging address, and sprightly conversation charmed all who conversed with her. But her lewdness knew no bounds; nor was she controuled in the pursuit of it by the awe of fame. Between husband and adulterer she made no distinction, says Tacitus, but was ever ready to gratify her own inclinations, without regarding any ties, however binding. Hence, tho' she was married to Rufus Crispinus, a Roman knight, and by him had a son, she was not ashamed to leave him; and live publicly with Otho, a gay youth and the emperor's reigning favourite. This commerce of adultery was soon followed by their marriage, Crispinus readily consenting to a divorce. Otho, now her husband, was continually extolling to Nero the beauty and charms of his wife, being prompted thereunto either by the indiscreet warmth of a lover, or by a desire of kindling in the young prince's breast the like passion, and procuring, from their common enjoyment of the same woman, an additional support to his present authority. Nero's passion was easily inflamed; he desired to see Poppæa, an interview was appointed, and the emperor, in his first conversation with her, was so taken with her soft arts, with her address and caresses, that he carried her to the palace and there detained her. But the artful Poppæa, after a night or two, when she had worked up the prince's affection to the highest pitch, changed her former behaviour into haughtiness, importuning the emperor to let her return to her husband, whom of all men she thought the most deserving, the most worthy of her affection. Hereupon Otho was immediately forbidden the palace, debarred of all intercourse, and even access to the emperor, and soon after, to prevent his having any communication with Poppæa, preferred to the government of Lusitania; a government which he administered for the space of ten years with eminent uprightness and honour, having acquired no less reputation in authority, by his gravity and regular conduct, than he had deserved infamy in a private station, by a most voluptuous and dissolute life (C). Thus Nero enjoyed Poppæa without a rival, and was for some time intirely governed by her pernicious and destructive counsels, as we shall relate anon. This year Cornelius Sylla, who had married Antonia the daughter of Claudius, being falsely accused of forming a conspiracy against the emperor, was banished his country, as if he had been a traitor fully convicted, and confined within the walls of Marseilles (D). The same year, as the people complained loudly

(C) Suetonius tells us, that Nero, conceiving a passion for Poppæa, took her from her husband, and sent her to Otho, who, receiving her into his house under colour of marriage, who so taken with her charms, that he pretended to ingross her wholly to himself, and not only refused to admit such as were sent to her from Nero, but once shut out the emperor himself, tho' he earnestly intreated him to deliver her up to him, and added menaces to his intreaties. Upon this Nero, to deliver himself from so troublesome a rival, preferred him to the government of Lusitania, now Portugal, fearing that a more severe punishment might discover the whole intrigue; yet so far it was known, that the following lampoon was made and dispersed;

*Cur Otho mentito sit, quæritis, exul honore?
Uxoris mæchus caperat esse suæ.*

That is, Why was Otho banished under colour of an honourable preferment? Because he became the adulterer of his own wife. Plutarch, in the life of Galba, tells us, that Nero would not have been satisfied with so slight a punishment; had not Seneca, who had a great friendship for Otho, prevailed upon the emperor to condemn him only to an honourable exile,

(D) Sylla was accused by one Graptus, Nero's freedman, an old, subtle, and wicked courtier, well practised, ever since the reign of Tiberius, in the dark devices of the emperors. He, upon this occasion, forged the following plot. The Milvian bridge was then the scene of nocturnal revellings; and thither Nero frequently resorted, that he might there the more licentious riot without the city. Graptus therefore pretended, that a plot was laid for him, as he should return from thence by the Flaminian way; but he had, by the providence of the gods escaped it, in coming home through the gardens of Sallust; and that Sylla was at the head of this conspiracy. The only foundation of all this was, that certain debauched youths had in sport filled with groundless fears some of the emperor's attendants, as they were repairing back to the palace. But Sylla was, by his marriage with Antonia, Claudius's daughter, nearly allied to the family of the Cæsars; and Nero mistook his natural heaviness and indolence, which rendered him unequal to any attempt of treason, for deep artifice and dissimulation; and hence his ruin (40).

Nero designs to suppress all taxes. loudly of the arbitrary exactions of the publicans, Nero was for intirely suppressing all taxes and duties, thinking that the greatest bounty he could bestow upon mankind; but the senate, after many high encomiums on the greatness of his soul, restrained him, by remonstrating, that the suppression of all taxes must necessarily be attended with the dissolution of the empire. The prince therefore contented himself with ordaining by an edict, that all the regulations relating to the revenues, which till then had been kept secret, should be hung up in public, to the end every one might know the precise sum he was to contribute; that the publicans should exact no claims for above a year backward; that all causes against them should be immediately heard and determined by the prætor at Rome, and in the provinces by the proprætors and proconsuls for the time being, with other the like intirely equitable injunctions, which, however, grew soon obsolete, tho' the suppression of the quadragesima or fortieth penny, and of the quingagesima or fiftieth, as also of some other impositions, continued in force at least till the reign of Adrian. At the same time, to encourage the transportation of grain from the transmarine provinces, it was ordained, that no duty should be paid for the same ^f.

The state of affairs on the Rhine.

In Germany, affairs having continued in a state of tranquillity till this time, the commanders of the Roman armies, having no enemy to contend with, kept their troops employed in various works. Paulinus Pompeius, who commanded in Lower Germany, perfected a dam, which Drusus had begun threescore and three years before, to restrain the overflowing of the Rhine. A modern writer places it in the neighbourhood of Duerstede or Wick above Utrecht ^a. Lucius Vetus, who commanded in Upper Germany, undertook a work truly great, stupendous, and worthy of the Roman grandeur, which was to dig a canal of communication between the Sône and the Moselle, that the armies from Italy, sailing by sea into the Rhone, and then into the Sône, might fall through this canal into the Moselle, thence through the Rhine into the ocean; so that a communication might be opened between the Mediterranean and the said sea. But Ælius Gracilis, governor of Belgic Gaul, through which the Moselle flowed, jealous of the glory which Vetus would have acquired by so great and useful an undertaking, warned him not to bring his troops into another man's province, and at the same time threatened him with the displeasure of the emperor, who would be alarmed at such an enterprize, imagining it undertaken with a private view to court the affections of the Gauls. Thus was that glorious project dropped ^b. These things seem to have happened in the first year of Nero's reign; for our historian relates in this place the transactions of several years. Afterwards, that is, according to Onuphrius, in the third year of the same prince's reign, Paulinus being succeeded by Dubius Avitus, and Vetus by T. Curulius Mancias, the Frisians, under the conduct of Verritus and Malarigis, possessed themselves of certain lands, which, being void of inhabitants, had been applied to the use of the Roman soldiers, who were wont to send their horses and cattle to graze there. They had already founded their dwellings and sown the fields, when Avitus threatened to drive them from thence, unless they first obtained from the emperor a grant of those territories. Hereupon the two chiefs proceeded to Rome, where, while they waited for access to Nero, among the several sights which were usually exhibited to strangers, they were conducted to Pompey's theatre, to assist at a public shew. There, while they were gazing round them, surveying with astonishment the multitudes of people, and informing themselves which were the Roman knights, where sat the senators, &c. they spied certain persons in a foreign dress sitting among the latter, and asked who they were? This is a distinction, answered the interpreter, conferred by the Roman people on the ambassadors of such nations, as have signalized their bravery in war and fidelity towards us. If so, replied the two chiefs, we claim a right to sit there too; for amongst men there is not a nation, which in fidelity and feats of arms surpasses the Germans; and thus leaving their seats, they placed themselves amongst the senators; a proceeding highly applauded by the numerous assembly, as the effect of an honest emulation. Nero honoured them both with the rights of Roman citizens; but commanded them to abandon their new possessions: which their countrymen refusing to do, Avitus, by a sudden irruption, put many of them to the sword, and forced the rest to comply with the emperor's orders ^c. Some time after, the Ansibarii, being driven out of their own country by the Chauci, took possession of the same lands, being a being supported by the neighbouring nations, who pitied their forlorn condition, and led by a man of great renown and of known fidelity towards the Romans, his name Boiocalus. He alledged to Avitus, in behalf of himself and his people, that, upon the revolt of the Cherusci, when Varus and his legions were slaughtered, he had been thrown into bonds by Arminius; that he had afterwards served under Tiberius, then under Germanicus, and, to the merit of fifty years service, was ready to add that of submitting his people to the empire of Rome. He remonstrated, that the territory in dispute was large and lay waste; that he might allow to an unhappy people, driven from their own habitations, settlements in it, and at the same time retain wide tracts for the horses and cattle of the Roman soldiers to graze and range in; that it was inconsistent with humanity to furnish men in order to feed their beasts, and with religion to devote to dismal deserts and solitude any part of the earth, which was by the gods appropriated to the children of men; that such parts of it as none possessed, were free and common to all. Then lifting up his eyes to the sun and the other celestial luminaries, he asked them, how they could bear to behold a desolate soil? and would they not more justly let loose the sea to swallow up usurpers who thus engrossed the earth? Avitus, provoked at this language, made no other reply, than that the weakest must submit to the more powerful; and that since the gods, to whom they appealed, had left the sovereign judgement to the Romans, other judges than themselves they would suffer none. This answer he gave in public; but to Boiocalus in private he offered lands, as an acknowledgement of his long attachment to the Romans. But this offer the brave German looked upon as a price proposed for betraying his people, and rejected it with indignation, adding, A place to live in we may want, but a place to die in we cannot. Thus they parted with mutual animosity. The Anfibarii invited into a confederacy the bordering nations; but Curtilius Mancias, who commanded in Upper Germany, passing the Rhine at the head of his legions, threatened them with desolation and slaughter, if they lent any assistance to the enemies of Rome. On the other hand, they were awed by Avitus, who likewise appeared with his legions on the banks of the Rhine; so that the unhappy Anfibarii, deserted by all, had recourse to the Usipites, the Tubantes, the Catti, the Cherusci, begging leave to settle in their territories; but being every-where driven out as enemies and intruders, in these long and various wanderings the people perished^k. This year, the Jubones, a people in alliance with Rome, who are supposed to have inhabited the counties of Nassau and Isenburg, were afflicted with the sudden eruption of a subterraneous fire, which consumed their farms, towns, and dwellings, and was advancing with great fury to the walls of Cologne, when certain boors, after having in vain attempted to extinguish it with the throwing of water and other usual expedients, transported with rage, vented their wrath by attacking it at a distance with volleys of stones. This, to their great surprize, allayed its fury; which no sooner began to abate, than they proceeded to a closer attack with clubs and blows, as in an encounter with an enemy, and at length, which was still more surprizing, they quite got the better of the devouring conflagration, by throwing their garments upon it^l. This year, Domitius Corbulo, the greatest general of his age, completed the reduction of Armenia, by driving from thence Tiridates, brother to Vologeses king of the Parthians, and making himself master of Artaxata, the most important place of the whole kingdom. Of the glorious exploits of this brave officer, we have given a distinct account in our history of Armenia; and therefore, not to trespass upon the reader's patience with tedious repetitions, we shall only add here, that for the success which had attended Corbulo's arms, Nero was proclaimed emperor, and by a decree of the senate days of public thanksgiving were appointed, with statues of victory to the prince, triumphal arches, and perpetuity of the consulship. It was moreover decreed, that the day when the city of Artaxata was taken, the day when the news arrived at Rome, and the day which produced that decree, should all be for ever kept as festivals. This motion was opposed by Caius Cassius, who argued, that were every instance of public prosperity to be attended with public thanksgiving, the whole year would not afford days enough for days of devotion; a just distribution ought therefore to be made between days of devotion and days of business, that the worship of the gods might not interfere with the occupations of men^m.

HITHERTO Nero's administration was universally applauded, and is generally cried up by historians; nay, Trajan, an excellent prince, is said to have proposed to himself the five first years of Nero's reign as the most accomplished model of an equitable government. This, if true, must, no doubt, be understood under several restrictions. But however that be, this year, the sixth of his reign, when Caius Vipsanius Apronianus and Caius Fonteius Capito were consuls, produced an instance of the blackest and most unnatural iniquity recorded in history, that of a mother murdered by a son, who was indebted to her not only for his life, but for the empire, and that very power, which, by an apostacy from nature, he impiously employed against her. This horrid attempt, which will render the name of Nero execrable to the latest posterity, we shall relate, as it has been transmitted to us by the most unexceptionable historians of antiquity. Agrippina had, after the late groundless charge brought against her, in some degree regained the emperor's favour, and continued to bear no small sway at court, till Poppæa was introduced there. That ambitious prostitute aimed at nothing less than solemnly marrying the emperor; but as she could never hope to see Octavia divorced, nor herself honoured with imperial wedlock during the life of Agrippina, she made it her whole study to inflame Nero against her, sometimes jeering him by the sarcastical name of pupil, one blindly subject to the capricious humour of a woman, and so far from being suffered to sway the empire, that he was not allowed that liberty, which every private Roman enjoyed as his birth-right. As for herself, she desired to be restored to the conjugal embraces of Otho, that she might in any corner of the earth rather hear of the emperor's abasement and reproach, than stay to behold it. She added atrocious calumnies against Agrippina, as if she designed to attempt upon his life; and threatened to abandon him, that she might not be with him exposed to the dangers that surrounded him. Her complaints and expostulations, enforced with sighs, tears, and all the soft artifices, which the deceitful adulterers possessed in an eminent degree, pierced the soul of Nero, and in behalf of Agrippina no one interposed, all at court being overjoyed to see her authority crushed, and no one imagining the son would ever be hardened to such a pitch of iniquity, as inhumanly to spill the blood of his mother.

Poppæa inflames Nero against his mother.

By what impious means Agrippina strove to retain her power

IN the mean time, Agrippina, well apprised of the views and artifices of Poppæa, left nothing unattempted, which thirst of power could suggest to retain her wonted dominion. Authors, who lived in those times, and to whose authority Tacitus pays great deference, tell us, that the lust of ruling transported her to such extravagant and almost incredible lengths, that while Nero was well heated with wine and banqueting, she accosted him gayly attired; and, without any regard to fame or modesty, prompted him, we relate it with horror! to a crime no less repugnant to nature, than that which he soon after committed. Seneca, who was present, observing the prince, while he was thus drunk, inclined to yield to the solicitations of his mother, for an antidote against the inticements of one woman, had recourse to another, and introduced Acte. By this means the unnatural abomination was prevented; but the reputation of Seneca somewhat tarnished, who might, by some other expedient more worthy of a philosopher, have diverted the prince from so monstrous an impurity. Fabius Rusticus, a writer of those times, ascribes this unheard-of passion, not to Agrippina, but to Nero, and adds, that he was rescued from so great an infamy by Acte. But in the detail we have given, all other authors agree, and it was more over confirmed in Tacitus's time by the testimony of popular fame. Be that as it will, Nero dreading the infamy, which the bare suspicion of such a detestable iniquity would reflect on his character, and being told, that the soldiery would never bear the rule of a prince thus contaminated, began thenceforth to avoid all private conferences with his mother; which gave Poppæa a favourable opportunity of inflaming him more and more against her, till at length she worked him to a resolution of delivering himself by a parricide from one, who, she said, was his dread and his torment. He was now therefore only in suspense about the means of dispatching her, whether by poison, by the sword, or by any other effectual method. That of poison was preferred at first; but to administer it was thought difficult; for if it were done at the prince's table, her death would never be believed sudden and accidental, since in the like manner Britannicus had already perished. To apply to her own domestics appeared dangerous. As she was a woman long acquainted with frauds and blood, she was upon her guard against all snares, and armed by counter-poisons against the operation of poison. How to dispatch her with the sword and cover the execution, no one could contrive. It was feared too, that none could be found sufficiently hardened for the execution of such iniquitous orders. In this perplexity, Anicetus proffered his service, and his dexterity. He was a franchised slave, had been tutor to Nero in his infancy; but was now commander of the fleet which rode at Misenum. As he was an implacable enemy to Agrippina, and Agrippina to him, he undertook to contrive a vessel so, that, by a sudden and artificial bursting in the open sea, it should overwhelm and drown her, without the least warning or apprehension. If she were thus dispatched by shipwreck, no one, he said, could ascribe her death to the malice and contrivance of men. Nero was pleased with this device the more, because he had a favourable opportunity to put it in execution, as he was then celebrating at Baiae the solemn festival of Minerva called Quinquatrus, which began on the nineteenth of March, and lasted five days. In order to intice his mother thither, he pretended a desire to be reconciled to her, declaring, that children ought to bear with the humours of their parents; and that, for himself, it behoved him to forget all past provocations, and be sincerely reconciled to a tender mother, whose gift was the power and empire which he swayed. A general rumour of this pretended disposition was immediately spread abroad, reached Agrippina, and found credit with her, women being naturally prone to believe what feeds their wishes, and promises matter of joy. At the same time, he wrote a letter to her, filled with the most tender expressions of filial affection and duty, inviting her to pass the festival with him at Baiae. Agrippina, not suspecting any treachery, tho' well practised in the dark devices of the court, deferred no longer her departure; but imbarquing at Antium, where she then was, sailed to Bauli (E), an imperial villa between the cape of Misenum and the gulf of Baiae. Thither Nero hastened to receive her, met her upon the shore, presented her his hand, embraced her, and conducted her to the castle. Not far from the shore, amongst several other vessels belonging to the emperor and the noblemen of his court, rode that which had been contrived by Anicetus, more pompous and gaudy than the rest, as if Nero by that distinction intended fresh honour to his mother. But she having had some intimation of the plot, tho' doubtful whether she should believe it or not, when invited on board, declared she chose to go to Baiae by land; and accordingly was carried thither in a sedan. Upon her arrival, the behaviour of Nero, obliging beyond expression and free from all manner of affectation, allayed her fears; for Nero, during her stay there, treated her with the utmost magnificence, yielded to her at table the most honourable place, entertained her with great variety of diversions, granted her all the favours she asked in behalf of herself or her friends, and, in conversing with her, broke sometimes out into sallies of youthful gaitety, discoursing at other times with a composed and grave air of weighty affairs, as if he reposed in her an intire confidence and sought her counsel. Having, with these insinuating caresses and hollow fondness, removed all her suspicions, he drew out the last banquet till the night was far spent; and in the mean time gave private orders to the commander of one of his galleys, to run foul of that which had conveyed Agrippina to Bauli and disable it, that she might be obliged to imbarque on the fatal vessel. When the banquet was over, Nero acquainted her with the misfortune which had happened to her own vessel, begged her to accept of the other, and ordered the admiral himself, Anicetus, to attend her to Antium. The emperor attended her in person to the shore, and at parting hung upon her neck, kissing her eyes, kissing her bosom with such tenderness, that he left it uncertain, as our historian observes, whether he meant by that passionate behaviour to cloak his horrid design, or whether his spirit, however fierce and savage, could not withstand the more powerful efforts of nature, at the last sight of a mother just going to perish.

He pretends kindness for her.

His prodigious falsehood and shew of filial tenderness.

(41) Plin. l. ix. c. 55.

THE sea proved smooth and calm, the night clear, and the stars shone in full lustre, as if all this, says our historian, had been concerted by the providence of the gods, that so black a murder might not remain undiscovered, by being ascribed to the malignity of winds and waves. Agrippina, when she imbarqued, was attended only by two persons, Crepercius Gallus, who stood in the steerage, and a lady named Aceronia Polla, who lay at her feet, and was entertaining her with the pleasing discourse of the remorse of her son and his sincere reconciliation, when all on a sudden, upon a signal given, the deck over that quarter was loosened; and being purposely loaded with a great quantity of lead, sunk violently down, and crushed Crepercius to death. Agrippina and Aceronia were defended by the posts of the bed where they lay, which happened to be too strong to yield to the weight; neither did the vessel open as had been concerted, such of the mariners as not had been intrusted with the plot, obstructing the measures of those who were. The latter, finding this expedient defeated, strove to bear the vessel down on one side, and so sink her; but the other mariners, not privy to the design, at the same time struggling to preserve her, by ballancing the contrary way, she was not at once swallowed up, but sunk by degrees; so that Agrippina and Aceronia fell softly into the sea. The latter screaming out, for the more speedy relief, that she was Agrippina, and passionately calling upon the mariners to succour the prince's mother, was by them pursued with their poles and oars, and so slain. Agrippina never opened her mouth, and being therefore less known, escaped, with one wound only on her shoulder; and, what with swimming, what with the timely assistance of some fisher-boats which rowed out to succour her, reached the lake Lucrinus, and was thence conveyed to her own villa. There reflecting upon the danger which she had escaped, the fate of Aceronia, mistaken for herself and designedly slain, the manner in which the vessel, under the shelter of the shore, not tossed by winds, nor striking upon rocks, had yielded in its upper part and been purposely overset, she concluded, that for this very end she had been inticed by the fraudulent letters of her son, and for this treated by him with such extraordinary marks of honour. However, she thought it adviseable to dissemble the whole, and however well apprised of these black devices, to act as if she saw them not. With this view she dispatched Agerinus her freed-man, to acquaint the emperor with the danger she had escaped by the providence of the gods and his imperial fortune, and to intreat him, that, however alarmed at the misfortune which had threatened his mother, he would postpone the trouble of visiting her; for what she only stood in need of at present was rest. In the mean time, disguising her fear and counterfeiting perfect security, she caused her wound to be dressed; and calling for the last will of Aceronia, ordered all her effects to be registered and sealed up^a.

Anicetus undertakes to finish the murder.

As to Nero, he had passed the night in great uneasiness and anxiety, attending the success of his design; and while he was hourly expecting expresses to apprise him, that the parricide was executed, tidings arrived, that his mother had escaped only with a slight wound. At this he was struck with terror and dismay, not doubting, but her fierce spirit, bent upon hasty revenge, would either arm the slaves, stir up the rage of the soldiery against him, or recur with a tragical representation of the whole plot to the senate and people. Thus terrified and dismayed, he immediately sent for Burrhus and Seneca, who perhaps had not before, says Tacitus, been acquainted with the conspiracy. To them he notified his disappointment, and told them, that in the present emergency, he had no resource, no protection, no one to advise with, but them. They both kept long silence, either because they thought it was in vain to dissuade him from a design on which they saw him bent, or because they believed matters already pushed so far, that unless Agrippina soon perished, Nero certainly must. At length Seneca, who used always to speak the first, looked at Burrhus, as if he asked him, whether orders for the dispatching of Agrippina might not be trusted to the soldiery under his command? Burrhus understood him, and answered, that the prætorian guards were so zealously attached to the name of the Cæsars, so fond of the family and memory of Germanicus, that they would never engage in any cruel or bloody attempt against their descendants. He added, that Anicetus ought to accomplish what he had begun. Anicetus undertook without hesitation to acquit himself of his engagement; and Nero crying out, that Anicetus presented him that day with the empire, urged him to use dispatch, taking with him whom he pleased to assist him. In the mean time, Agerinus arriving from Agrippina, with the news of her disaster and escape, was immediately admitted to the emperor, by whose orders, as he was delivering his message, a dagger was dropped between his legs; and then, as if he had been sent to murder the prince, he was immediately loaded with irons, and dragged to prison. This fable was forged to support another; for Nero intended to give out, that his destruction had been concerted by his mother, and that she, upon the discovery of her treason, had put an end to her own life, to avoid the punishment she deserved ^b.

In the mean time, the danger which threatened Agrippina at sea, and was looked upon as the effect of chance, flying abroad, the people from all quarters flocked to the shore to assist her; some crowded into barques and skiffs; others entered the sea, and waded as deep as their height would permit; nay, some stretched out their arms, as it were to catch and receive her: so that the whole coast resounded with lamentations for her misfortune, vows for her deliverance, and the indistinct clamour of a multitude, solicitous about her safety. When they understood, that she was out of danger, they all hastened to congratulate her upon her escape. But, in the mean time, Anicetus arriving with an armed band of mariners, they all dispersed; and the franchised slave, having beset the villa with a guard, burst open the gates, secured such of her slaves as offered to stop him, and advanced to the very door of her chamber, which he found guarded by a small number of her friends, who, at the sight of so many armed men, betook themselves to flight, and left her with one maid only, who lay in the room with her. She was already very anxious and uneasy, that no soul had yet arrived from her son, nor had even Agerinus returned, when she heard a sudden noise and tumult at the door of her chamber; which so terrified her maid, that starting up, she too was about to depart; which Agrippina perceiving, Thou likewise, said he, art going to abandon me: and that moment Anicetus, having forced open the door, entered her chamber, accompanied by Herculeus, captain of a galley, and Oloaritus, a centurion of the navy. The princess, tho' well apprised of their design, yet addressing them with great intrepidity, If you are come, said she, from the emperor, to be informed of my health, I can acquaint him, that I am well refreshed and recovered; if upon any bloody design, I will never believe you commissioned by my son; my son cannot command a parricide. But the assassins, without returning her any answer, placed themselves round her bed; for in her chamber was a small light, and Herculeus the first discharged a blow upon her head with a great club. Oloaritus the centurion instantly drew his sword to dispatch her; but she, notwithstanding the blow she had received, starting up, presented her belly, crying with a loud voice, Strike me here; this carried and brought forth such a monster as Nero. In uttering these words, she was pierced with a multitude of wounds, and expired ^c. In these particulars all authors agree; some add, that Nero afterwards surveyed the naked body of his mangled mother, viewed her limbs, and extolled their symmetry and beauty; but this is denied by others, and seems inconsistent with the concern which he afterwards shewed. That very night her corpse was burnt without any pomp or solemnity, being carried to the pile upon no other bed, than that which she lay upon at her meals. Her bones were interred by her domestics, who, after the death of Nero, raised her a vulgar tomb upon the road to cape Misenum, adjoining to a villa which formerly belonged to Cæsar the dictator. Mnester, one of her freed-men, as soon as her funeral pile was lighted, run himself thro' with a sword, whether from grief and affection for her, or from dread of some terrible doom, which he apprehended hanging over his head, was never known. Thus died the celebrated Agrippina, daughter to Germanicus, grand-daughter to Agrippa, and great grand-daughter to Augustus, sister to one emperor, wife to another, and mother to a third. This doom she had deserved by a long train of crying iniquities, long before it overtook her; nay, we are told, that she was warned of it many years before by the Chaldeans, who being consulted by her concerning the fortune of Nero, and answering, that he would certainly reign and kill his mother; Let him kill me, said she, so he do but reign ^k.

dreadful agonies, now dumb, motionless, with his eyes fixed, then starting up amazed and trembling. Thus wild and ghastly, he waited the return of day, which, he apprehended, would bring upon him some dreadful and final doom. Burrhus was the first who afforded him some comfort in the midst of these horrors, by persuading the tribunes and centurions under his command to congratulate the prince upon his thus happily escaping the enormous treason devised by his mother. Their example was followed first by the emperor's friends, and next by the neighbouring communities of Campania, who testified their joy by sacrifices to the gods, and embassies to the prince. Nero himself, by a quite opposite dissimulation, pretended to be inconsolably grieved for the death of his mother, answering those who strove to comfort him, that he hated a life, which upon such terms had been saved. However, as the face and aspect of places cannot change like the countenances of men, the sight of that coast and those shores, where the parricide had been perpetrated, filled him with continual horrors; besides, there were some, who imagined they heard horrid shrieks and wailings from Agrippina's tomb; and a mournful sound of trumpets from the neighbouring cliffs and hills. Nero therefore flying from such tragical places, which incessantly reproached him with the crying greatness and enormity of his crime, withdrew to Naples, whence he sent letters to the senate, acquainting them, that Agerinus, a freedman of Agrippina, had been sent by her to assassinate him; but had been timely apprehended, and that she had thereupon laid violent hands on herself, with the same guilty conscience which had prompted her to attempt upon the life of her son. To this he added a detail of her crimes traced a long way back; he even ascribed to her all the vile measures and black iniquities of the reign of Claudius, and concluded, that her death ought to be looked upon as a public blessing, and ascribed to the auspicious fortune of the Roman state. This letter was composed by Seneca, who thereupon was severely censured, and indeed not undeservedly, by all men of honour and virtue. No one believed the pretended conspiracy; but nevertheless the senators, with wonderful heat and competition, strove to surpass one another in decreeing new honours to Nero on this occasion. The following solemnities were therefore ordained, that at all the altars public devotions should be observed; that the feast of Minerva, during which the conspiracy was detected, should be celebrated with anniversary plays for ever; that the statue of that goddess in gold should be placed in the senate-house, and close by it that of the emperor; and lastly, that the anniversary of Agrippina should be inserted in the number of unlucky days. Tiberius Pætus, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the course of this reign, walked out of the senate as soon as the emperor's letter was read, chusing rather to provoke the vengeance of Nero, than give his assent to such servile, flattering, and iniquitous decrees; but there was not a man in the senate, who had so much honour and integrity as to follow his example. And now Nero, to heighten the public hatred towards his mother and blacken her memory, as if she had checked his natural inclination to mercy, restored to their native country and estates several persons of distinction, who had been formerly by her doomed to exile. He likewise pardoned Iturius and Calvisius, of whom we have spoken above, and suffered the body of Lollia Paulina, who had ended her course at Tarentum, to be brought home, and reposed in the tomb of her illustrious ancestors. Notwithstanding these acts of clemency, the emperor could not prevail upon himself to return to Rome, dreading to appear, after his parricide, before the senate and people. But the abandoned profligates of his court, and no court upon earth, says Tacitus, ever abounded with more, assured him, that the very name of Agrippina was generally abhorred; inso-much, that by her death he had secured for ever the affections both of the people and senate. Hereupon he proceeded to Rome, where he was received with a more forward and officious zeal, than even his flattering courtiers had promised him. The several tribes in distinct bodies came forth to meet him, and likewise the senate in their robes, with mighty crouds of women and children, ranged into separate classes according to their sex and age. Where-ever he passed, plays and shews were exhibited with all the pomp and parade of a solemn triumph. Elated with pride upon such a reception, he repaired, like a triumphant victor, to the capitol, and there paid his vows and oblations¹. But all these tokens of joy and approbation could could not smother the reproaches of his own conscience; the horrors of his guilt never forsook him; he owned, that the furies pursued him with stripes, and rage, and burning torches; his dread was sometimes so great, that every joint of him trembled; he applied to the magicians, and endeavoured, by one of their sacrifices, to call up the ghost of his mother, and intreat her to forgive him; nay, some time after, when he travelled into Greece, tho' he was mighty desirous of assisting at the Eleusine ceremonies, yet his heart failed him, and he withdrew as soon as he heard the crier commanding, with a loud voice, all impious and profane persons to depart^m.

As no one would take upon him to give the emperor wholesome advice; but, on the contrary, all conspired to deceive him with servile flattery, and to commend even his most enormous excesses, he abandoned himself without controul to all his extravagant passions. He was chiefly fond of two diversions, both highly unbecoming his rank and station, viz. of driving a chariot and singing to the harp in a theatrical habit. Seneca and Burrhus had thought it adviseable to indulge him from the beginning in the former, in order to divert him from the latter, which they thought a more shameful and unmanly employment. Thus a piece of ground in the Vatican was inclosed with a wall, that he might there exert his dexterity in driving, without being exposed to the view of a promiscuous croud of spectators; but now he was desirous of being publicly seen, and even invited to the sight the populace, who failed not to magnify him with encomiums and loud acclamations. As the emperor imagined, that by bringing many others under the same infamy he should lessen his own, he introduced, as actors, into the theatre, several noble Romans, descended from illustrious families, but decayed and through indigence become venal. He likewise engaged with great rewards several Roman knights to undertake the acting of parts in public representations. However, that he might not yet debase himself in the common theatre, he instituted a sort of plays called juvenales, which were exhibited in private houses or gardens, persons of the first quality, nay, many who had borne the chief offices in the state, acting in them, and degrading themselves to imitate the port and buffoonry of the Greek and Roman mimics, even in their most obscene gesticulations. The contagion even reached ladies of the greatest distinction, who, in imitation of the prince and his court, had their assemblies and representations too in a grove planted by Augustus, where booths were built, and in them sold whatever incited to sensuality and wantonness. Thus was even the outward appearance of virtue banished the city, and all manner of avowed lewdness, depravity, and dissoluteness introduced in its room, men and women being engaged in a contention to outvie each other in glaring vices and scenes of impurity. At length Nero could forbear no longer, but took the harp, and mounted the public stage, trying the strings with much attention and care, and studying his part. About him stood his companions and a cohort of the guards, with many tribunes and centurions, and Burrhus their commander, sad on this infamous occasion, but praising Nero while he grieved for him. At this time, he inrolled a body of Roman knights, intitled the knights of Augustus, young men distinguished by the bloom of their years and strength of body, but all professed profligates. As the emperor spent whole days and nights in singing and playing upon the harp, the whole business of these knights was to commend his person and voice, to extol the beauty of both by names and epithets peculiar to the gods, and to sing his airs about the streetsⁿ.

He diverts himself with chariot-driving.

He engages several noble Romans to debase themselves upon the stage.

THE next year, Nero entered upon his fourth consulship, having Cossus Cornelius Lentulus for his colleague, and held that dignity for six months. This year he instituted, for the improvement of wit and genius, contests of eloquence and poetry, with other games to be exhibited every fifth year; whence they were styled quinquennial games. On this occasion the players and pantomimes, who had often caused great animosities, were recalled and restored to the stage. During these sports a comet appeared, which, according to the persuasion of the vulgar, always portended a change of princes; hence, as if Nero had been already deposed, it became the topic of general inquiry, who should be chosen to succeed him, and the name of Rubellius Plautus was on this occasion in everyone's mouth. He was, by his mother Julia the daughter of Drusus, descended from the family of the Cæsars, and had acquired great reputation by the integrity of his life, and a strict adherence, notwithstanding the general corruption, to the venerable institutions and severe manners of the primitive Romans. At the same time, as Nero was sitting at an entertainment at a place called Sublaqueum, on the banks of the Simbruine lake, a flash of lightning darted upon the repast, scattered the dishes, overturned the table, and, while the emperor was drinking, struck the cup out of his hand. As this happened in the neighbourhood of Tibur, whence Plautus was originally sprung by his father's side, the people believed, that he was appointed and marked out by the gods to succeed Nero. All this alarmed Nero, who thereupon wrote to Plautus, that he would do well to consult the peace and tranquillity of Rome, by withdrawing to his possessions in Asia, where he might enjoy the bloom of his life free from intrigues of faction, fraught with ambiguity and danger. Upon this warning, Plautus, who had long since buried himself in retirement, shunning and dreading power, left Rome, and, with Antistia his wife and a few friends, hastened to Asia. This year, Nero appointed Tigranes (F) king of Armenia, which the brave Corbulo had reduced, and bestowed upon him a body of guards, viz. a thousand legionaries, three cohorts of confederates, and two wings of horse, to support him in maintaining his new realm. Corbulo, having thus completed the reduction of Armenia, left that country, and withdrew into Syria, a province assigned him upon the death of Numidius Quadratus the late governor. In the close of the year, Vibius Secundus, a Roman knight, was, upon the accusation of the Moors, condemned for extortion and expelled Italy.

Suetonius Paulinus sent into Britain.

THE following year, Cæsonius Pætus and Petronius Turpilianus being consuls, the Romans suffered a dreadful slaughter in Britain. A. Didius, who succeeded Ostorius, as we have related above, did no more than just maintain what his predecessors had conquered. His successor Veranius, having only in some incursions ravaged the territories of the Silures, was prevented by death from any further prosecution of the war. He was highly esteemed in his life-time for the severity of his manners; but in his last-will he betrayed a servile ambition and court to power: for after many expressions of flattery bestowed upon Nero, he added, that to his obedience he would have subjected all Britain, had he lived but two years longer. He was succeeded by Suetonius Paulinus, Corbulo's competitor in the science of war, and universally esteemed in all respects equal to that great commander. Paulinus therefore, hoping to reap as much renown from the intire reduction of Britain, as Corbulo had done from that of Armenia, bent his mind upon that enterprize, tho' Nero had then, as we are told, some thoughts of withdrawing the Roman forces and abandoning the island. During the first two years of his government, the Roman general commanded with no less success than he had done formerly in Africa, subdued fresh nations, reduced with indefatigable pains several castles, and established garisons to keep in awe the countries which he had brought under subjection. Trusting to these garisons, he left the country behind him exposed to the enemy, and went to attack the island Mona, now Anglesey, which supplied the revolted with succours, and was a common place of retreat to the fugitives. He built a great number of boats with broad and flat bottoms, the easier to approach a shore full of shallows. Upon these the foot were wafted over, and the horse followed, partly by fording, partly by swimming. On the opposite shore stood numerous bodies of men well armed, and amongst them appeared troops of women, running, like furies, to and fro, dismally clad in funeral apparel, with their hair flying about their shoulders, and torches in their hands. Round them were seen their priests, the Druids, uttering, with their hands lifted up to heaven, dreadful imprecations, and invoking vengeance. The amazing novelty of the scene struck the Roman soldiers with dismay; they stood motionless with their bodies exposed, like so many marks, to the darts of the enemy, till encouraged by the repeated exhortations of the general to shake off the scandalous terror inspired by His father was likewise named Alexander. He was nephew to another Tigranes, likewise king of Armenia, who was put to death under Tiberius, in the twenty-second year of that prince's reign, and thirty-sixth of the christian æra (42). Tacitus tells us, that as this prince had passed many years at Rome in the quality of a hostage, his spirit was miserably debased, even to a degree of abjectness and servitude (42).

a by a band of raving women and fanatic priests, they advanced the ensigns, put to the rout the disorderly rabble, and drove them into the fires they had kindled. He reduces the island of Anglesey. The island being thus easily reduced, a garison was established to bridle the vanquished, and the groves, dedicated to their bloody superstitions, cut down; for in them they sacrificed the captives taken in war, and consulted their intrails, in order to discover the will of the gods^p.

WHILE Suetonius was thus employed, tidings were brought him of the sudden revolt of the province, the occasion of which is thus related by Tacitus, who lived near those times: Prasutagus, the late king of the Icenians, a prince renowned for his opulence had grandeur, and by his last will left the emperor joint heir with his own two daughters, hoping by that signal instance of loyalty to secure his kingdom and family from all injury and violence. But this scheme produced a quite contrary effect; for, under colour of taking possession of the emperor's new inheritance, the kingdom became a prey to the centurions; the deceased prince's house was plundered by rapacious officers; his wife Boadicia, or Boudicea, ignominiously violated with stripes; his daughters dishonoured; all the principal Icenians stripped of their hereditary possessions, and the relations of the late king kept in bonds and treated like slaves. Inraged by these indignities and dreading oppressions still more severe, they took advantage of the absence of Paulinus, and began to deliberate about shaking off the yoke, which they could no longer bear. In their private assemblies they strove to inflame one another, by recounting their several grievances, exaggerating the series of bondage, and heightening the injuries they must expect, when reduced to a province. "Our patience, said they, avails us nothing, further than to encourage our tyrants to lay heavier burdens upon a people, who thus tamely bear any. To such height is our oppression grown, that nothing whatever is exempt from their avarice, nothing from their lust. They seize our houses, insult our wives, force away our children, and oblige our youth to fight; and to all this we tamely submit, tho' it be in our power to redeem ourselves from such contumelious tyranny; for what a small force would all the soldiers arrived in the island appear, would the Britons but compute their own numbers? It was from this consideration that Germany threw off the yoke, tho' defended only by a river, and not, like this, by the ocean. Our country, our wives, our parents and children, animate us to take arms, and behave like men; whereas our oppressors are only prompted by their sordid avarice and brutal sensuality. Let us but imitate the bravery of our forefathers; and not be dismayed with the issue of an encounter or two, and we shall see these robbers withdraw from the island, as their deified Julius did formerly." With these and the like speeches, they easily prevailed upon the Trinobantes, and several other nations, to join their forces, and attempt the recovery of their antient liberty, as the only means to redeem themselves from the oppressions they groaned under; for the Britons, even in those days, cheerfully complied, as Tacitus observes, with the imposition of taxes and all duties enjoined by their governors, provided they received no illegal treatment. This they could not brook, nor did the Romans, says the same historian, any further subdue them, than to bring them to obey just laws: they abhorred unjust encroachments, and would never submit to be slaves^q. The Trinobantes were moreover animated to take arms by their implacable hatred towards the veterans lately planted in the colony of Camalodunum, who, encroaching upon the inhabitants, thrust them out of their houses, spoiled them of their hereditary lands, and, adding scorn to oppression, treated them with the vile titles of captives and slaves. Another alarming grievance was a temple built and dedicated to the late emperor Claudius, which was a great eye-sore to them, and looked upon by all as a badge and bulwark of eternal slavery. Besides, the priests appointed to minister in the temple, under the cloak of religion, devoured the whole substance of the inhabitants, and reduced the most wealthy amongst them to beggary. Neither did it appear an arduous undertaking to destroy a colony no-wise secured by fortifications; for the Romans, not yet well acquainted with the temper of the Britons, had consulted only their accommodation and pleasure. To these grievances Dion Cassius adds, that Catus Decianus, the imperial procurator, exercised a tyranny no less cruel over their substance and fortunes, than the governor did over their bodies and lives: and that Seneca, having with fair promises inveigled the Britons to borrow vast sums of him, telling them, that that for repayment they should take their own time, all on a sudden demanded both principal and interest, which iniquitous demand reduced the injured Britons to despair. Thus provoked by the heaviest sufferings, and invited by the opportunity of the absence of Paulinus, the Icenians and Trinobantes, the former inhabiting the present counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Huntingdon, and the latter those of Essex and Middlesex, and all those who hated servitude, unanimously took arms under the conduct of Boudicea, a princess of royal descent. Tacitus tells us, that the ensuing troubles were foretold some time before by several signs and prodigies. At Camalodunum the statue of Victory fell down of itself with her face turned towards the enemy; certain women, transported with prophetic fury, terrified the people with denunciations of impending calamities; in the place, where the colony assembled for the business of the public, was heard a tumultuous noise and the accent of strangers; the theatre echoed with dismal howlings; in the river Thames dreadful appearances were seen; the ocean appeared all dyed with blood; and at the departure of the tide shapes of human bodies were left imprinted on the strand. The veterans in the colony, alarmed at these omens, sent to Catus Decianus, procurator of the province for succours, Suetonius being then at a great distance; but he could spare them only two hundred men, and those not completely armed; and in the colony itself was but a handful of soldiers. The veterans indeed were for securing themselves by a ditch and palisade against any sudden assault, and removing out of the colony their women and old men; but were diverted from these and all other measures tending to their safety by some Britons, in whose fidelity they reposed too much confidence. So that, while they were utterly unprepared, and as void of circumspection as if full peace had reigned, the Britons, to the number of a hundred and twenty thousand fighting men, flew unanimously to arms, assailed on every side the soldiers dispersed in the forts, and having stormed and sacked the several garisons, fell upon the colony itself as the seat and centre of public servitude, took it at the first assault, and after two days siege the temple, whither the Romans were retired in a body. The colony, with the temple, they razed, and put every Roman to the sword. After this, upon intelligence that Petilius Cerealis, commander of the ninth legion, was advancing to relieve his friends, they hastened to meet him, routed his legion, and cut the infantry, all to a man, in pieces; but Cerealis escaped with the horse to the camp, and there defended himself in his intrenchments. Catus Decianus, the procurator, who had by his rapacious avarice driven the province into despair, and was universally hated, upon the first notice of the revolt, fled, like a coward, over into Gaul. Suetonius, upon the first notice of the revolt, left the island of Anglesey, and with undaunted bravery marched through the heart of the enemy's country quite to London, a city not honoured indeed with the title of colony, but full of Roman inhabitants, and even then highly famed for the vast conflux of traders, and plenty of all commodities and provisions. Here he designed at first to settle his head quarters, and make this place the seat and centre of the war: but afterwards reflecting on the small number of his men, he resolved to abandon it, and retire to some more advantageous post. This resolution threw the inhabitants into the utmost consternation; but Suetonius, hoping by the loss of one town to save the whole province, was not, by the tears and wailing of multitudes imploring his protection, diverted from ordering the signal for departure to be given, taking with him all those who were able or willing to accompany him. He was no sooner gone, than the enemy made themselves masters of the place, and massacred, without distinction of sex or age, all who had staid behind. The like slaughter befel the municipal or free city of Verulamium, now St. Albans, and several other towns, in which seventy thousand souls perished, all Romans, or the confederates of Rome. For the provoked Britons gave no quarter, and neither took, nor sold, nor exchanged prisoners, nor observed any other law of war, but killed, burnt, or crucified all who had the misfortune to fall into their hands, being more inflamed with a desire of revenge, than of victory or booty. In short, no kind of cruelty was omitted, with which rage and victory could possibly inspire the hearts of an injured people. Suetonius, having in the mean time drawn together an army of about ten thousand men, viz. the fourteenth legion, with the veterans of the twentieth, and auxiliaries from the various garisons, resolved without further delay to put the whole, as he was distressed for want of provisions, to the issue of a battle.

a battle. With this view he chose a place accessible only by a narrow vale, and defended ^{Suetonius re-} behind by a wood, being well apprised that the enemy would attack him only in front, ^{solves to give} and that in the open vale no stratagems or ambushes were to be dreaded. He drew up ^{the Britons} the legionaries in thick ranks, placing round them the light-armed soldiers; and the ^{battle.} cavalry on each wing. The British army, which was drawn up in great separate bands, some of foot, some of horse, appeared an immense multitude. They amounted, according to Dion Cassius, to 230,000 men; and, according to Tacitus, exhibited the greatest multitude; that till then had been seen in arms, and withal, so confident of victory, that they had brought their wives with them to be spectators of it from their waggons; which they had placed round the borders of the field. Boudicea, b who had chiefly stirred up the Britons to this war, was carried about in a chariot with her two daughters sitting before her. As she traversed the field from nation to na- ^{Boudicea's} tion, she declared to all, that though it was usual for the Britons to war under the con- ^{speech to her} duct of a woman, yet upon this occasion she assumed not the authority of one de- ^{army.} scended from such illustrious ancestors; but appeared upon the same foot with one of the vulgar, seeking vengeance, not for the loss of her kingdom; but for the extirpation of public liberty; for the stripes inflicted upon her person; and the brutish affronts offered to her virgin daughters, since the Romans were arrived at such a pitch of unbridled violence, that no age nor sex could escape their fury and contamination:
 she enlarged on the evils of tyranny and servitude, and concluded, that in the impending battle the Britons must either remain utterly victorious, or utterly perish; that to do one of these was the firm purpose of her, who was a woman; for the men, they might, if they pleased, still live, and be doomed to slavery. Suetonius, though he confided in the bravery of his men; yet he failed not to join to it exhortations mixed with intreaties; that they would despise the savage clamours of the barbarians with all their impotent menaces, keep their ranks, and after having discharged their darts, close in with the enemy; and pursue the slaughter with their spears and swords, without any thought of the spoil, as well knowing, that after victory all must fall to their share. The general's speech was followed by such ardor in his men, long inured to all the arts and events of battles, that Suetonius, not doubting of the issue, d gave the signal for the onset. The legion kept their ground immovable, sheltering themselves within the streights of the place; till the enemy, advancing within arrow-shot, had spent all their darts: upon this advantage they rushed out upon them all at once in the form of a wedge; and being supported by the cavalry and auxiliaries, overthrew all who stood next to them: hereupon the rest turned their backs and fled, but found it difficult to escape, the inclosure, made by their own carriages, obstructing their retreat. The Romans gave no quarter, but put all to the sword, not sparing even the lives of women, nay they pierced with their darts the very beasts of burden, which helped to swell the mighty heaps of the dead: for we are told, that ^{The Britons} of the Britons were slain near eighty thousand; whereas the Romans lost only four ^{defeated with} hundred men. Boudicea, resolved not to outlive that fatal day, is said by some to ^{great slaugh-}
 e have ended her life by poison; but others write, that she died a few days after the ^{ter.} battle of a natural death. Poenius Posthumus, prefect of the camp to the second legion; upon tidings of the exploits and success of the fourteenth and twentieth legions struck with remorse for having defrauded his own of equal honour, and disobeyed, contrary to the laws of military duty, the orders of his general, ran himself through with his sword. Dion Cassius differs from Tacitus, whom we have followed in his account of this battle; for he tells us, that the victory continued long doubtful, that the Britons, though only a disorderly rabble, led on by a woman, stood their ground against the embattled legions with great intrepidity, and would have tried the fortune
 f of a second battle, had they not in the mean time been disheartened by the unexpected death of Boudicea. The Roman army, after a general review, kept the field under tents, to put an end to the war. Their forces were moreover increased by Nero, who ordered two thousand legionaries, eight cohorts of auxiliaries, and a thousand horse, to pass from Germany over into Britain. By their arrival the ninth legion was recruited, and thereupon the auxiliaries sent into different parts to destroy with fire and sword such nations as continued in arms, or appeared suspicious. But nothing afflicted the unhappy Britons so much as famine; for all their hands being employed in the war, they had utterly neglected to cultivate and sow the ground, reckoning

upon the stores and provisions of the Romans as their own. However, they continued still in arms, and became daily more backward in their inclinations to peace from the behaviour of Julius Classicianus, who succeeding Catus Decianus as procurator of the province, and being at variance with Suetonius, obstructed the public good to gratify his private pique, giving out, that a new governor would be sent, who, free from the arrogance of a conqueror, and unacquainted with the preceding conduct of the enemy, would treat such as submitted with more gentleness and mercy. And truly Suetonius, as Tacitus observes, though in other respects a signal commander, yet treated such as surrendered themselves in a very imperious manner, as one who likewise avenged his private injuries. At the same time, Classicianus wrote to Rome, that there would be no end of war and bloodshed, unless Suetonius was removed, ascribing all the disasters to his ill conduct, and the happy success to the auspicious fortune of the republic. Hereupon Polycletus, one of the emperor's freedmen, was dispatched to inspect the state of Britain, Nero conceiving great hopes, that by the authority of his domestic, not only a reconciliation would be brought about between the governor and procurator, but the minds of the discontented Britons would be calmed, and inclined to peace. Polycletus was not backward to assume the employment, but immediately set out with such an immense train, that he was a burden, as Tacitus tells us, even to the wealthy nations of Italy and Gaul, through which he passed: thence he crossed the channel, and travelled in Britain with such awful state and attendance, as struck even the Roman soldiers, accustomed to the grandeur of Rome, with amazement. But to the Britons, among whom reigned popular liberty, he proved an object of derision; as they were utter strangers to the power of the imperial freedmen, they were amazed, that a victorious general and army, who had fought such battles, should obey a manumised slave; his authority was therefore of no weight with men, who, being brought up in the noble principles of liberty, scorned to pay any deference or respect to such sons of earth, however distinguished and exalted by the favours of a court. Hereupon Polycletus, finding the Britons were not to be dazzled with outward appearances, returned to Rome, where he represented to the emperor the transactions and conduct of Suetonius in so favourable a light, that he was continued in the government. However, having some time after lost a few galleys on the shore with the men who rowed them, as if this accident had been a proof, that the war still continued, he was ordered to resign the government to Petronius Turpilianus, who had just ended his consulship. As this new governor neither provoked the Britons by any act of hostility, nor was provoked by them, he bestowed on this cowardly inaction the specious name of peace. This tranquillity continued till the time of Vespasian, the governors, who succeeded Turpilianus, following his example, and carefully avoiding to give any just cause of complaint to the Britons; nay, they did not even attempt to recover the island of Anglesey, which about this time shook off the yoke. We shall resume the detail of the British affairs in the history of the above-mentioned emperor's reign, when we shall see the Britons enter the lists with noble armies sent against them from Gaul and Italy, and conducted by generals of great renown.

DURING these transactions in Britain, several persons of great distinction at Rome were either degraded or banished for forging a will. Among these was Antonius Præmus, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the reign of Vespasian, and Asinius Marcellus, descended of an illustrious family, being the great grandson of the celebrated Asinius Pollio, and himself without any other blemish in his conduct and manners, save that he believed poverty to be the greatest of evils. The illustrious memory of his ancestors, and the intreaties of the emperor, procured him an exemption from the punishment due to his crime. With the others privy to these detestable practices was condemned and interdicted Italy one Valerius Ponticus, a pleader or lawyer, for endeavouring to save the criminals by the quibbles of the law; and it was decreed, that whoever should take a fee for such vile employment, should suffer the same punishment as one publicly condemned for calumny. Not long after the death of Pedanius Secundus, governor of Rome, murdered by a slave of his own, occasioned no small disturbances in the city. According to the ancient laws of Rome, all the slaves, who lived under the same roof, were to be involved in the same penalty with the criminal; but such was on this occasion the uproar of the populace, zealous to save so many innocent lives, that it proceeded even to sedition. The senate too

a was rent into parties, some rejecting with great warmth such excessive rigor, while others voted against any innovation. After a long and warm debate, it was carried, that, without compassion for the number of slaves, for the age of some, for the sex of others, for the undoubted innocence of most, they should be all condemned to death and executed. As they were no fewer than four hundred, the populace flocked tumultuously together to prevent the execution of so many innocent persons. But Nero reprimanded them by an edict, and with lines of soldiers secured the way, thro' which they were led to the place of execution. Cingonius Varro moved, that the freedmen too, who abode under the same roof, should be for ever expelled Italy; but Nero opposed that motion, urging, that since the rigor of the antient custom had not been softened by mercy, it ought not to be heightened by cruelty *.

All his slaves are executed.

b THE following year, P. Marius and L. Asinius were consuls; but resigned the fasces, according to Onuphrius, Goltzius, and others, in the month of July to Trebellius Maximus and Seneca. A decree in the digests, dated the 25th of August, seems to favour this opinion. However, some writers, and among the rest Ausonius, maintain, that Seneca never attained the dignity of consul. During the administration of these consuls, the prætor Antistius, having composed a poem full of contumelious invectives against the prince, and read it to a numerous assembly at a banquet in the house of Ostorius Scapula, was arraigned upon the law of majesty by Cossutianus Capito, a law, which after long disuse was upon this occasion first revived. Ostorius declared before the senate, when he was called upon to give his evidence, that he knew nothing of the imputed crime; but the contrary testimony of the other witnesses being credited, Julius Marullus, consul elect, voted, that the accused should be divested of his prætorship and put to death. But Thrasea Pætus, after high encomiums upon Nero, and many bitter invectives against Antistius, argued, that since under such an excellent prince the senate was in its decisions influenced by no bias or compulsion, and halts and executioners were long since banished, the only punishment they could inflict, without bringing themselves under the imputation of cruelty, and the times under that of infamy, was, to confiscate the estate of the criminal, and confine him to a solitary island. The generous freedom of Thrasea animated the other senators, so that they all went readily into his motion, except a small number of abandoned flatterers, among whom was the famous sycophant Vitellius. The consuls, however, before they gave the last sanction to the decree, thought it adviseable to acquaint the emperor with their unanimity, who, after having long struggled between shame and resentment, at last answered, that since Antistius had, without any provocation, uttered so many black invectives against the prince, it was the duty of the senate to decree a punishment suitable to the crime. However, as he would certainly have opposed any rigorous sentence, so he would now by no means defeat their mercy; they might therefore determine as they thought best, nay, from him they had full leave to discharge the criminal. From this answer it plainly appeared, that the emperor was piqued; but, notwithstanding his displeasure, neither Thrasea nor the others departed from the measures which they had approved. At the same time, Fabricius Veiento was expelled Italy for writing a satire against the senate, and making traffick of the prince's favour by selling the great offices of the state. His writings being doomed to the flames, were, as Tacitus observes, universally sought and read, while it was difficult to find them, and dangerous to keep them; but when every one was free to possess and peruse them, they sunk into contempt and oblivion †. This year died, to the unspeakable grief of all good men, the celebrated Burrhus, one of the chief friends and supports of the public; but whether by poison or a disease, is not certainly known: the latter was imagined, because a swelling in his throat gradually increased, till by a total stoppage of respiration he died suffocated. Suetonius * and Dion Cassius ‡ tell us, that Nero, having promised him a remedy against his distemper, sent him a venomous medicine. This, says Tacitus, was asserted by many; and it was likewise a common report, that Burrhus, being well apprised of it, when the prince came to visit him, turned his face another way, and to his repeated inquiries about his health, returned no other answer than this, I am well. The loss of so great and worthy a man was long regretted in Rome, as well from the memory of his own virtues, as from the different character of his joint successors; for Nero appointed two captains of the prætorian guards, Fenius Rufus and Sofonius Tigellinus. The former

The character of Tigellinus. former was a man of great integrity, but indolent, and an utter enemy to all trouble; the other infamous for lewdness, cruelty, avarice, and all the most flagrant iniquities; but in high favour with Nero, and by him assumed into power from a fellowship in all his secret debauches and revels^b.

Several charges brought against Seneca. AND now, one of the champions of virtue being removed, the many wicked and evil counsellors, who abounded in the emperor's court, attacked the other, viz. Seneca, with many criminal imputations; namely, that he had already accumulated wealth far above the condition of a citizen, and was insatiably accumulating more; that such was the magnificence of his gardens, such the splendor of his seats, that in these instances of grandeur he excelled even the emperor; that he was labouring to attach to his own person the veneration of the Roman people; that he disparaged his skill in managing horses, turned his voice into mockery whenever he sung, and to himself alone arrogated the praise and perfection of eloquence: they added, that Nero was no longer a child, and therefore ought now to begin to reign, to dismiss his pedagogue, and to be governed by more famous tutors, his glorious ancestors. Seneca was not unapprised of the efforts of his enemies, and therefore finding the emperor had withdrawn his usual affability, and shewed himself daily more and more reserved towards him, he begged an audience; and having obtained it, he besought the emperor to give him leave to retire, and apply himself wholly to the cultivation of his mind and the study of philosophy, intreating him at the same time to accept of his immense wealth, his stately seats and gardens, his ample possessions, &c. which were too great rewards for the small service he had rendered him, and administered fresh fuel to the raging envy of his enemies. Nero replied, that he still stood in great need of the wise rules, wholesome counsels, and useful precepts, with which he had cherished his infancy and youth, and therefore could not by any means grant him his request.

He begs leave to retire.

Nero's deceitful speech to him.

“As to your gardens, seats, and wealth, said he, there are many favourites, no-wise equal to you in worthy accomplishments, distinguished with larger possessions. I blush to quote freedmen, who are esteemed more wealthy than you; and am ashamed, that one, who is dear to me above all others, does not yet surpass all others in fortune. If you forsake your prince, and to him surrender your wealth, the treasure returned will be ascribed, not to your moderation, but to my rapaciousness, and your retreat to the dread of my cruelty. But suppose this disinterestedness of yours, this contempt of riches, be generally applauded, yet surely it will reflect no honour upon a wise man to seek glory from a proceeding, which must unavoidably bring infamy upon his friend.” To these words he added kisses and embraces, swearing several times in a most solemn manner, that he would rather perish himself a thousand times, than suffer him to be any ways injured. Seneca returned him thanks for his kindness and generosity; but nevertheless altered his former conduct, received few visits at home, avoided any train of attendance abroad, and appeared seldom in public, as if he were confined to his house by ill health, or the study of philosophy. The retreat of Seneca doubled the authority of Tigellinus, who diving curiously into the secret fears of the prince, and finding, that he chiefly dreaded Plautus and Sylla, the one removed lately into the east, the other into Gaul, persuaded him to put them both to death, hoping to bear a still greater sway with the emperor, by thus seeming to consult his defence and security. Sylla was dispatched while he was at table, without any apprehension of danger, by assassins, who in six days arrived express at Marseilles, to which city he had been confined. When his head was presented to Nero, its untimely hoariness is said to have moved him to unbecoming jests and derision. The sentence awarded against Plautus was not so successfully concealed. Lucius Antistius, his father-in-law, receiving private notice of it, dispatched to him a freedman of his own, who, outstriking the fatal centurion, brought him from his master the following advice; that he should be sure to shun a cowardly death; that he had yet leisure to escape, and could not fail of finding compassion from all worthy and generous men; that if he had once repulsed the sixty soldiers, for so many were sent to dispatch him, he might then, while the tidings were transmitting to Nero, prosecute many schemes, and lay the foundation of a war; at least he had nothing more dreadful to suffer after a brave resistance, than what he must suffer by a cowardly acquiescence. But Plautus, not moved by these considerations, chose rather a rather to die, than to preserve his life by kindling a civil war (G); so that the assassins, finding him quite unprepared for any resistance, murdered him in the middle of the day before Pelago the eunuch, who was by Nero set over the centurion and his band. When the head of the slain was carried to Rome, and shewn to the emperor, I knew not before, said he, by way of raillery, that Rubellius had so great a nose. Then turning to the confidants of his debauches, What can prevent me now, cried he from instantly solemnizing my nuptials with Poppæa, a solemnity hitherto deferred through fear of such men as this? Afterwards he wrote letters to the senate, in which he inveighed with great bitterness against Sylla and Plautus, but took no notice of their death. However, the senate, well apprised of what had happened, decreed professions, appointed thanks to be publicly returned to the gods, and degraded Sylla and Plautus from the dignity of senators. Nero, perceiving from the decree of the senate that his most flagrant iniquities passed for commendable actions, divorced Octavia without further delay, alledging that she was barren (H); and married Poppæa, Nero married who, to prevent his ever being reconciled to his former wife, suborned one of Octavia's domestics to accuse her of a criminal amour with a slave, named Eucerus, a native of Alexandria, and one who was famous for playing upon the flute. The maids of Octavia were all examined upon the rack, and, though some, overcome by the exquisite pain of the torture, favoured the forgery, yet most of them maintained, and with great firmness vindicated, the unspotted character of their lady (I). However, she was first removed from the palace, and afterwards banished into Campania, where a guard of soldiers was placed over her. But as the populace openly complained of this cruel treatment, Nero, dreading the resentment of the provoked multitude, recalled her soon after to the infinite satisfaction of the Roman people, who in transports of joy crowded to the temples with thanksgiving, overthrew the statues of Poppæa, crowned with flowers those of Octavia, and carrying her images, as it were, in triumph, placed them in the great forum and in the several temples. Hereupon Poppæa, fearing Nero might change his mind, and, to gratify the populace, recal Octavia to his bed, prevailed upon him, by a speech artfully framed to produce both terror and wrath, to resolve upon the ruin of the innocent Octavia. As the fiction of the unhappy princess's intrigue with Eucerus had been quite defeated by the testimony of her maids upon the rack, it was agreed to procure some one, who should own himself guilty with her, and against whom might be also feigned a plausible charge of meditating a revolution in the state: Anicetus, who had murdered Agrippina, was judged a proper man for this vile purpose. To him therefore Nero addressed himself, and what by promises, what by menaces, induced him to acknowledge that he had maintained a criminal conversation with Octavia; which he had no sooner done, than Nero issued an edict, declaring, that Octavia, in hopes of engaging the fleet in her conspiracy, had corrupted Anicetus the admiral: and forgetting that he had just before accused her of barrenness, he added, that she had concealed her secret lusts, and always defeated her pregnancy by abortion, and that these her crimes were by him fully detected. Hereupon the unfortunate princess was banished to the island of Pandataria, and after a few days doomed to die. Those who were charged with the execution of this cruel and unjust sentence, having tied her down with bonds, opened all the veins of her body; but as her blood was chilled through fear and issued slowly, they hastened her doom, by stifling her in the steam of a boiling bath. After her death her head was cut off by a centurion,

(G) He was perhaps chiefly influenced, says Tacitus, by tenderness for his wife and children, whom he imagined the prince would treat with more mildness, were he not incensed by any insurrection or alarms. Some write, that the advices he received from his father-in-law were of a quite different nature, importing, that his life was in no danger. Others tell us, that two philosophers, Ceranus a Greek and Musonius a Tuscan, encouraged him to wait for death with unshaken intrepidity, since it would deliver him from a life subject to eternal anxieties and fears.

(H) Octavia was, as Nero himself owned, an easy wife, modest in her conduct, of an unblemished character, &c. but still an eye-sore to him from the affection which the people shewed her; hence he would have divorced her soon after the death of her father Claudius, had not Burrhus opposed his design, telling him freely, that if he parted with Octavia, he must likewise part with what she had brought him, the empire (44). He seldom admitted her to his bed, answering his friends, who blamed him for thus neglecting a woman of her merit, that the jewels, ornaments, and title of empress were sufficient for her. Suetonius tells us, that he often attempted to strangle her (45).

(I) While Tigellinus was earnestly pressing Octavia's maids upon the rack to deliver themselves from their torments, by owning their lady's guilt, one of them, by name Pythias, returned him this answer; Castiora sunt muliebria Octaviæ, quam os tuum.

centurion, and carried to Rome, that Poppæa might have the satisfaction of seeing it, and diverting herself with so tragical a spectacle. Tacitus observes, that nothing ever filled the hearts of the people with more affecting compassion, than the cruel sufferings and untimely end of this innocent princess, inhumanly massacred in the twenty-second year of her age, under the imputation of a crime more barbarous and piercing than death itself, without having ever tasted any share of happiness or delight. But the senate, at this time under the emperors, an assembly of mean-spirited wretches, intirely devoted to corruption and servitude, for this execution, as for some notable deliverance, pompously decreed gifts and oblations to the gods. Such was the debasement of the once great and venerable Roman senate. Fear had stopped their mouths, or opened them only to the most scandalous strains of flattery. Our historian observes, here to their eternal infamy, that as often as any cruel sentence was pronounced by the prince, as often as murders or banishments were by him commanded, so often were acknowledgments and thanksgivings, by the authority of the senate, paid to the deities ^c. Octavia had been honoured, as appears from some medals ^d, with the title of Augusta. Nero killed himself six years after on the same day, if Suetonius is to be credited, on which Octavia was by his orders assassinated ^e, that is, on the eleventh of June. Anicetus, as one convicted by his own confession, was banished into Sardinia, where he lived in great plenty, and died at length by course of nature. This year died Doryphorus, Pallas, and Romanus, all three imperial freedmen of great note, and believed to have been poisoned by Nero's orders; Doryphorus, because he endeavoured to thwart the marriage with Poppæa; Pallas, because he lived too long, and prevented the prince from enjoying his immense wealth; and Romanus, because he brought a charge of treason against Seneca, which the accused retorted upon him ^f.

Poppæa is delivered of a daughter.

Senators, knights, and ladies enter the lists among the gladiators.

THE following year, when L. Virginus Rufus and C. Memmius Regulus were consuls, the city of Pompeii, which took its name from Pompey the Great, was in a great measure overturned by an earthquake, which highly damaged many other cities of Campania. That province had been alarmed before by frequent shocks; but this, which happened on the fifth of February, was so dreadful, that great numbers of the inhabitants abandoned their native country, and settled elsewhere, through fear of being one day swallowed up by the earth, a misfortune, which fifteen years after, that is, in the first year of the reign of Titus and seventy-ninth of the christian æra, befel those who remained, and likewise the inhabitants of Herculanum or Herculanum, as we shall relate in its proper place. This year Poppæa was delivered of a daughter, which filled Nero with unspeakable joy: she was honoured with the name of Augusta, and upon Poppæa was conferred the same title. The senate had before made public vows for her happy delivery, and now many more were added, and the whole amply fulfilled; days for solemn processions were appointed, a temple was decreed to Fecundity, golden images of the Fortunes at Antium, where the child was born, were ordered to be made and placed in the throne of Jupiter Capitolinus, &c. ^e But short-lived was the prince's joy; for within four months the infant died, which gave occasion to new sallies of flattery, since she was placed among the gods, and divine worship with a priest, altars, and sacrifices were voted to her. As for the emperor, as he had rejoiced, so he grieved beyond all measure ^g. To allay his grief, he exhibited various shews, among the rest a combat of gladiators, in which four hundred senators, six hundred knights, and, what was a sight altogether new, many ladies of great distinction entered the lists, and infamously contaminated themselves and families, to use the expression of Tacitus, by appearing among the common gladiators. In one of these shews a knight, of illustrious quality, rid full speed down a steep descent upon an elephant; another personated Icarus, but in attempting to fly, fell down so near the emperor, that he was besprinkled with his blood. A comedy was also acted, composed by Afranius, and intitled incendium, or the burning, in which a house richly furnished was set on fire, and permission granted to the actors to rifle it. During these shews, he did not, like other emperors, scatter money among the populace, but tickets for vast sums, for fine houses, gardens, and estates, which he faithfully consigned to those who produced the said tickets. For he believed, as Suetonius observes, that all the pleasure and advantage of riches consisted in profusion and prodigality, reckoned those sordid and mean-spirited, who kept any account an account of their expences, and cried up such as squandered away and consumed Nero's prodigality. Hence he never mentioned his uncle Caligula, but with the highest elogiums, because in less than a year's time he had consumed, besides his ordinary revenues, the vast sum (eighteen millions of our money), which Tiberius had left him^b.

In the next consulship of Caius Lecanius Bassus and M. Licinius Crassus Frugi, Nero becoming every day more transported with a passion for singing and playing on the public stage, for he had hitherto exerted his skill only in the assemblies called Juvenalia, which were restrained to particular houses and gardens, and not daring to begin at Rome, resolved to repair to Naples to make his first essay and appearance there, and from thence pass over into Greece, and contend for the prize in music at the Olympic games. Accordingly, he set out from Rome with his usual attendance and equipage, that is, with a thousand chariots, his horses and mules all shod with silver, his grooms and muletiers clad in the richest cloth of Canusium, and attended by a band of prætorian guards and a body of African horse, most pompously attired. Soon after his arrival at Naples, he mounted the stage, and sang for several days together to an immense multitude, all the rabble of Naples, and incredible numbers flocking from the neighbouring cities and colonies, to such an extraordinary spectacle, an emperor singing on the public stage. In this exercise he passed his whole time at Naples, repairing to the theatre in the morning, and continuing there till night, allowing himself now and then a small respite to take breath and refresh himself, which he did publicly in the presence of the multitude, telling them, that when he had washed his throat, he would entertain them with a finer air than any they had yet heard. We are told, that though the theatre was one day, while he was singing, shaken all on a sudden with a violent earthquake and in great danger of falling, yet he would not give over till he had ended his song. When he had done, he gave the numerous audience leave to retire; and the theatre, as soon as it was empty, fell to the ground. This accident Nero looked upon as a providential event, betokening the immediate protection of his guardian deities, and celebrated the benignity of the gods in songs of thanksgiving composed by himself. Being much delighted with the praises which some Alexandrians, lately arrived at Naples, bestowed on his heavenly and august voice, he sent for more of them over in great haste, and was ever after attended by some of them on the stage, richly attired with a ring of great value on their left hand: as they were for the most part youths, he appointed them governors to take care of their education, and allowed them an annual pension of four hundred thousand sestercesⁱ. The emperor left Naples with a design to pass over into Greece, and display his abilities there. In his rout to the Adriatic he rested a while at Beneventum, where by Vatinius was exhibited a pompous shew of gladiators. Vatinius was one of the most baneful monsters that haunted the court, originally bred in a cobbler's stall, hideous and distorted in his person, at first taken to court as a buffoon, and afterwards by calumny, by lying accusations against every worthy man, and a sarcastical turn, raised to such a height, that in wealth, and favour, and in power to do mischief, he surpassed all the other ministers of iniquity in Nero's court^k (K). During the solemnity of these sports, Nero forbore not acts of tyranny and blood, but forced Torquatus Silanus, the great grandson of Augustus, to die, for no other crime, but because he lived with greater splendor and magnificence than became a private person, and therefore was supposed to aspire at the sovereign power. Torquatus opened the veins of both his arms and bled to death. After this Nero, for reasons that were not known, put off his voyage to Greece and returned to Rome, with a design to shew himself to the provinces of the east, especially to Egypt, which project he declared by a public edict, and then went to pay his oblations for the success of that journey to the several deities in the city. But as he entered the temple of Vesta, he was seized with a sudden dread, which shook him in every joint; and is ascribed by some writers to the awful aspect of the goddesses, by others to the remembrance of his enormous crimes,

(K) Vatinius is mentioned by Martial and Juvenal as the contriver of certain cups with four long spouts, called by the Latins noses: says Martial: and Juvenal:

crimes, with which he was so eternally haunted, that he was never a moment free from pangs and agonies. Be that as it will, he dropped his project, giving out, that he could not prevail upon himself to deprive the Roman citizens for so long a time of the joyful sight of their prince. This declaration was pleasing to the populace, from their inclination to diversions, which by his residence at Rome they enjoyed, and from the apprehension of scarcity of provisions in his absence¹.

Nero banquetted frequently in the public places and great squares, using the whole city as his own house. These banquets were expensive and magnificent almost beyond belief, and no less infamous for the monstrous scenes of lewdness practised at them; for he was generally attended at such entertainments, whether given by himself or his friends, by the most debauched and abandoned women of the whole city. Tacitus describes here the feast prepared for him this year by Tigellinus, as a pattern of all the rest. In the lake of Agrippa he built a large vessel, which contained the banquet, and was towed by other vessels embellished with rich ornaments of gold and ivory, which were rowed by professed catamites, ranged according to their different age and skill in their abominable profession. The banquet consisted of great variety of wild fowl and wild beasts from remote countries, and fish from the ocean. On the banks of the lake on one side stood brothels filled with ladies of great rank, and on the other common harlots, quite naked. When night came, the neighbouring groves and houses resounded with the joyful symphony of musical instruments and songs, and appeared illuminated with a huge blaze of lights, which turned night into day. It was a few days after this memorable banquet, that Nero, who had already surpassed all men, as Tacitus observes, in every kind of abomination, was prompted by his extravagant lewdness and folly to such excesses, as would seem altogether incredible, were they not attested by historians, who lived near those times, and whose veracity cannot be questioned. He attired himself in the habit of a woman, and as such was publicly with the usual forms and solemnity married to a pathic of his contaminated crew, named Pythagoras. Not satisfied with such monstrous and unheard-of impiety and pollutions, as he was the wife of one pathic, so he became the husband of another, named Sporus, whom he married with the same solemnity, kept in his palace, and carried about with him all over Italy and Greece in the same litter, and in the attire of an empress; on which occasion it was said, that the world would have been happy, had Nero's father had such a wife^m. His other abominable pollutions, unknown before to the most abandoned debauchees, we shall pass over in silence, being well apprised, that a detail of such monstrous obscenities would prove no less shocking to our readers, than that which we read in Suetonius has proved shocking to us. We shall only observe out of that writer, that Nero was firmly persuaded all men were as wicked as himself; and therefore freely forgave those, who made an open profession of obscenity, all other crimes; but punished with the utmost severity, as hypocrites and impostors, such as seemed to be offended with the most unnatural impuritiesⁿ.

This year, the eleventh of Nero's reign and sixty-fourth of the Christian æra, happened the famous burning of Rome; but whether by chance, or the contrivance of the prince, is not determined, both being asserted by authors. The fire began amongst certain shops, in which were kept such goods as were proper to feed it, and spread every way with such amazing rapidity, that its havock was felt in distant streets before any measures to stop it could be tried. Besides an infinite number of common houses, all the noble monuments of antiquity, all the stately palaces, temples, porticos, with goods, riches, furniture, and merchandise to an immense value, were devoured by the flame, which raged first in the low regions of the city, and then mounted to the higher, with such terrible violence and impetuosity, as to frustrate all relief. The shrieks of the women, the various efforts of some endeavouring to save the young and tender, of others attempting to assist the aged and infirm, and the hurry of such as strove only to provide for themselves, occasioned a mutual interruption and universal confusion. Many, while they chiefly regarded the danger that pursued them behind, found themselves suddenly involved in the flame before and on every side: if they escaped into the quarters adjoining, or into the parts quite remote, there too they met with the devouring flames. At last, not knowing whither to fly, nor where to seek sanctuary, they abandoned the city, and repaired to the open fields. Some out of despair for the loss of their whole substance, others through tenderness for their

a their children and relations, whom they had not been able to snatch from the flames, suffered themselves to perish in them, though they had easy means to escape. No man durst offer to stop the progress of the fire, there being many, who had no other business, but to prevent with repeated menaces all attempts of that nature; nay some were in the face of the public seen to throw lighted fire-brands into the houses, loudly declaring, that they were authorized so to do; but whether this was only a device to plunder more freely, or in reality they had such orders, was never certainly known. Nero, who was then at Antium, did not offer to return to the city, till he heard, that the flame was advancing to his palace, which after his arrival was, in spite of all opposition, burnt down to the ground, with all the houses adjoining to it. However, Nero, affecting compassion for the multitude, thus vagabond and bereft of their dwell-b ings, laid open the field of Mars, and all the great edifices erected there by Agrippa, and even his own gardens. He likewise caused tabernacles to be reared in haste for the reception of the forlorn populace; from Ostia too and the neighbouring cities were brought by his orders all sorts of furniture and necessaries, and the price of corn considerably lessened. But these bounties, however generous and popular, were bestowed in vain, because a report was spread abroad, that, during the time of this general conflagration, he mounted his domestic stage, and sang the destruction of Troy, comparing the present desolation to the celebrated calamities of antiquity. At length, on the sixth day (M), the fury of the flames was stopt at the foot of mount c Esquiline, by levelling with the ground an infinite number of buildings, so that it found nothing to encounter, but the open fields and empty air. But scarce had the late alarm ceased, when the fire broke out anew with fresh rage; but in places more wide and spacious; whence fewer persons were destroyed, but more temples overthrown and porticos appropriated to public diversion. As this second conflagration broke out in certain buildings belonging to Tigellinus, they were both generally ascribed to Nero; and it was conjectured, that by destroying the old city, he aimed at the glory of building a new one, and calling it by his name. Of the fourteen quarters, into which Rome was divided, four remained intire, three were laid in ashes, and in the seven others there remained only here and there a few houses, miserably shattered d and half consumed^p. Such is the account which Tacitus gives us of this dreadful calamity. But Suetonius and Dion Cassius are positive in their relations, that it was occasioned by Nero. The former author writes, that one happening in a private conversation with the emperor, to say in Greek, When I am dead, let the world be burnt; nay, replied he, Let it be burnt while I am alive; and not long after, being displeased with the old buildings of the city, with its narrow alleys, and irregular streets, he caused it to be set on fire so publicly, that several of his officers were found in the houses of the great men with fire and flax in their hands, and nevertheless dismissed, because they openly declared, that they had one to authorize them. There being certain store-houses near his palace, which ground he desired to have, that with their walls of e stone withstood the violence of the flames, he caused them to be battered down with engines of war. Though in this barbarous conflagration, continues the same writer, the palaces of our ancient commanders, adorned with hostile spoils, the temples formerly consecrated by our kings, those which the piety of our ancestors raised in the Punic and Gaulish wars, and in short all the noble and stately monuments of antiquity, were consumed by the devouring flames, yet Nero was so far from being touched with sorrow or compassion, that he beheld the fire the whole time from the tower of Mecenas, and being highly pleased with the sight, he chanted a poem on the destruction of Troy, in the same habit which he used when he sung on the stage. He would not allow any one to attempt the stopping or extinguishing of the fire, promising to remove f at his own charge the rubbish and dead bodies^q. Among the many ancient and stately edifices which the rage of the flames utterly consumed, Tacitus reckons the temple

(M) Suetonius tells us, that it lasted six days and seven nights; wherein he disagrees with an ancient inscription, still to be seen near St. Peter's church in Rome, according to which it continued nine days. The words of the inscription are; Ex Voto Suscepto. Quod. Diu. Erat. Neglectum. Nec. Redditum. Incendior. Arcendorum. Causa. Quando. Urbs. Per. Novem. Dies. Arsit. Neronianis. Temporibus. Et.

temple dedicated by Servius Tullius to the moon; the temple and great altar consecrated by Evander to Hercules, the chapel vowed by Romulus to Jupiter Stator, the court of Numa with the temple of Vesta, and in it the tutelar gods peculiar to the Romans. In the same fate were involved the inestimable treasures acquired by so many victories, the wonderful works of the best painters and sculptors of Greece, and what is still more to be lamented, the ancient writings of celebrated authors, till then preserved perfectly intire. It was observed, that the fire began the same day on which the Gauls, having formerly taken the city, burnt it to the ground^r. Upon the ruins of the demolished city Nero founded a palace, which he called his golden house, though it was not so much admired on account of an immense profusion of gold, precious stones, and other inestimable ornaments, as for its immense extent, containing spacious fields, vast wildernesses, artificial lakes, thick woods, gardens, orchards, vineyards, hills, groves, &c. The entrance of this stately edifice was spacious enough to receive a colossus, representing Nero, a hundred and twenty foot high; the galleries consisted of three rows of tall pillars, each of them a full mile in length; the lakes were encompassed with magnificent buildings, in the manner of cities, and the woods stocked with all sorts of wild beasts. The house itself was tiled with gold, and the walls covered with the same metal, and richly adorned with precious stones and mother of pearl, which in those days was valued above gold; the timber-work and ceilings of the rooms were inlaid with gold and ivory; the roof of one of the banquetting rooms resembled the firmament both in its figure and motion, turning incessantly about night and day, and showering all sorts of sweet waters. When this magnificent structure was finished, Nero approved of it only so far as to say, that at length he began to lodge like a man (N). Pliny tells us, that this palace extended quite round the city^t. Nero, it seems, did not quite finish it; for the first order Osbo signed was, as we read in Suetonius, for fifty millions of sesterces to be employed in perfecting the golden palace, which Nero had begun^u. The projectors of this plan were Severus and Celer, two bold and enterprising men, who soon after put the emperor upon a still more expensive and arduous undertaking, namely, that of cutting a canal, through hard rocks and steep mountains, from the lake Avernus to the mouth of the Tiber, a hundred and sixty miles in length, and of such breadth, that two galleys of five ranks of oars might easily pass abreast. His view in this was to open a communication between Rome and Campania, free from the troubles and dangers of the sea; for this very year a great number of vessels laden with corn were shipwrecked at cape Misenum, the pilots chusing rather to venture out in a violent storm, than not to arrive at the time they were expected by Nero^v. For the perfecting of this great undertaking, the emperor ordered the prisoners from all parts to be transported into Italy, and such as were convicted, whatever their crimes were, to be condemned only to his works. We are told, that to this bold and extravagant attempt he was likewise encouraged by a Roman knight, who assured him, that he could help him to the immense treasures, which queen Dido had carried along with her from Tyre, and buried in vast caves under-ground in Africa, whence they might without much trouble be recovered^w. Nero, who undertook nothing with more ardor and readiness, than what was deemed impossible, expended incredible sums in this rash undertaking, and exerted all his might to cut through the mountains adjoining to the lake Avernus; but not being able to remove by art the obstacles of nature, he was in the end obliged to drop the enterprise^x.

(N) Martial describes the immense tract of ground on which this palace stood (46). Several lampoons were handed about upon the same subject; among the rest the following, which likewise reflected on the murder of his mother and his shameful passion for playing upon the harp:

*Quis neget Æneæ natum de stirpe Neronem?
Sustulit hic matrem, sustulit ille patrem.
Dum tendit cytharam noster, dum cornua Parthus,*

*Noster erit Pæan, ille Hecatebeletes.
Roma domus fiet; Veios migrate, Quirites, Si non & Veios occupat ista domus.*

But Nero, whether he really despised such reflections, or wisely smothered his resentment, never so much as inquired after the author of these satires; nay, some of them being discovered, he would not suffer the senate to punish them with any severity.

- ^a THE ground, which was not taken up by the foundations of Nero's own palace, Rome rebuilt. he assigned for houses, which were not placed, as after the burning of the city by the Gauls, at random and without order; but the streets were laid out regularly, spacious and strait; the edifices restrained to a certain height, perhaps of seventy foot, according to the plan of Augustus; the courts were widened, and to all the great houses, which stood by themselves and were called isles, large porticos were added, which Nero engaged to raise at his own expence, and to deliver to each proprietor the squares about them clear from all rubbish. He likewise promised rewards according to every man's rank and substance, and fixed a day for the discharge of his promise, on condition that against that day their several houses and palaces were finished. He moreover made the following wise regulations to obviate such a dreadful calamity for the future, viz. that the new buildings should be raised to a certain height Precautions to prevent the like disaster. without timber; that they should be arched with stone from the quarries of Gabii and Alba, which were proof against fire; that over the common springs, which were diverted by private men for their own uses, overseers should be placed to prevent that abuse; that every citizen should have ready in his house, some machine proper to extinguish fire; that no wall should be common to two houses, but every house be inclosed within its own peculiar walls, &c. Thus the city in a short time rose out of its ashes with new lustre, and more beautiful than ever. However, some believed, that the ancient form was more conducing to health, the rays of the sun being hardly felt, on account of the narrowness of the streets and the height of the buildings, whereas ^c now there was no shelter against the scorching heat. We are told, that Nero designed to extend the walls to Ostia, and to bring from thence, by a canal, the sea into the city. As Nero, notwithstanding all his bounties, was still universally believed to have been the author of the conflagration, in order to wipe off this aspersion, he transferred the guilt upon the Christians, who were already very numerous in the city, and raised the first general persecution. We shall deliver, in our historian's own words, Nero transfers upon the Christians the guilt of burning the city. what he writes upon this subject, mislaid, no doubt, by the accounts that were current among the Romans, and crediting, as he wanted an opportunity of being better informed, the calumnies, with which the enemies of truth laboured to discredit such ^d as professed it. Nero, says he, to suppress the prevailing rumour, that he was the author of the conflagration, transferred the guilt upon supposed criminals, subjecting to most exquisite torments those people, who for their enormous crimes were already universally abhorred, and known to the vulgar by the name of Christians. The author of this name was Christ, who in the reign of Tiberius was executed under Pontius Pilate, procurator of Judæa. The pestilent superstition was for a while suppressed; but it revived again, and spread, not only over Judæa, where this evil was first broached, but reached Rome, whither from every quarter of the earth is constantly flowing whatever is hideous and abominable amongst men, and is there readily embraced and practised. First therefore were apprehended such as openly owned themselves to be of that sect; then by them was discovered an immense multitude, and ^e all were convicted, not of the crime of burning Rome, but of their hatred and enmity to mankind. Their death and torture was aggravated with cruel derision and sport; for they were either covered with the skins of wild beasts, and torn in pieces by devouring dogs, or fastened to crosses, or wrapt up in combustible garments, Tacitus's account of them.

z SUET. c. 16.

(O) Tacitus seems in this particular to confound the Christians with the Jews; for speaking of the latter in his history (28). They are immoveable, says he, in their adherence to one another, and prone to mutual acts of compassion; but towards the whole human race besides, they maintain a mortal and implacable hatred. With all others they refuse to eat; with all others they refuse to lodge; nay, though they are a people abandoned to sensuality, they avoid the embraces of all foreign women. This censure they deserved in the time of Tacitus, as they still do in ours, saving the last particular mentioned by our historian; for now they condescend to the embraces of foreign harlots. They had not common mercy towards the Gentiles and uncircumcised; and being persuaded, that the Almighty loved only their nation, they fancied that he abhorred, and therefore they abhorred, the whole human race besides; so that it was said of them by Tacitus too truly, adversus omnes alios hostile odium. But surely the Christians did not, at least in Tacitus's time, deserve this censure: an universal and unbounded charity is the main basis and characteristic of our religion; and it is not probable, that the Christians were then so degenerated as to disgrace their profession, by neglecting the most essential duty of it. They avoided indeed the profane meetings of the Gentiles, their lewd revels, their shews and spectacles; and thence were thought, as Arnobius observes, by men not acquainted with their principles, to hate the Gentiles themselves.

ments, that when the day-light failed, they might, like torches, serve to dispel the darkness of the night. For this tragical spectacle Nero lent his own gardens, and exhibited at the same time the public diversion of the circus, sometimes driving a chariot in person, and sometimes standing as a spectator among the populace in the habit of a charioteer. Hence towards the miserable sufferers, however guilty and deserving the most exemplary punishment, compassion arose, seeing they were doomed to perish, not with a view to the public good, but to gratify the cruelty of one manⁱ. Thus far Tacitus, who, 'tis manifest, was quite unacquainted with the sacred mysteries and sound morals of our religion. He was himself a man of strict morality, and displays, throughout all his writings, a spirit truly virtuous and humane; no wonder therefore, if considering the Christians as enemies to mankind, according to the prevailing notion, and their religion as a new sect inconsistent with the laws of Rome, and threatening civil tumults, he painted them in such ugly colours. But, after all, he does them the justice to vindicate them from the aspersions of Nero, and exposes the barbarous treatment they met with from that tyrant.

Nero betakes himself to all manner of rapine.

Plunders Italy and the provinces.

Seneca is refused leave to retire.

In the mean time, Nero having, with the immense sums, he had expended in building his golden house, and embellishing the city, quite drained his exchequer, to supply his prodigality betook himself to all manner of rapine and extortion. Not Italy alone, but the provinces, the several confederate nations, and all those cities, that had the title of free, were pillaged and laid waste. In this general spoil were involved the temples of the gods, being stript of all their rich ornaments, of all the treasures, which the Roman people in every age of their state had consecrated, either as monuments of triumphs celebrated, or vows fulfilled. Through Greece and Asia the same ravages were committed, Acratus an imperial freed-man, and Secundus Carinas, two prompt instruments, as Tacitus styles them, to execute any iniquity, however black and flagrant, being sent into those provinces with a commission to strip every-where the temples of all their ornaments, gifts, oblations, &c. and convey them together with the statues and images of the gods themselves to Rome^k, where they were melted down, and turned into money^l. Suetonius assures us, that from this time forward he never raised any man to an office, without telling him, You know what I want; let us make it our business, that no one may have any thing, which he can call his own^m. Seneca, fearing these sacrileges and iniquitous extortions might be imputed to him, begged leave to retire to a seat of his own remote from Rome; but that being refused him, he confined himself to his chamber, pretending an indisposition in his nerves. Some writers tell us, that one of his freed-men, named Cleonicus, had, by the command of Nero, prepared poison for him; but that he escaped it, either by the discovery made by the freed-man, or by his own caution; for being apprised of the danger he was in, he led a most abstemious life, satisfying his hunger with wild fruit from the woods, and quenching his thirst with a draught from the common fountainⁿ. Of this wonderful temperance and sobriety, he speaks himself in one of his letters^o: I banquet, says he, upon dry bread, and dine without a table; my dinner is such that after it I have no occasion to wash my hands: and elsewhere^p; I sleep little, and watch much; I abstain from all wine, avoid batheing, and use no ointments, being persuaded, that with respect to our bodies, of all smells, no smell is the best. In the close of the year, the heads and mouths of the populace were filled with prodigies (P), said to have happened, and always looked upon as the fore-runners of some dreadful calamity. A comet too appeared, an omen ever supposed to portend misfortunes threatening some sovereign power. Nero was therefore under no small apprehension; but an astrologer, by name Babilus, having acquainted him, that among monarchs it was usual upon such occasions to avert these omens from themselves by some extraordinary massacre, he resolved utterly to exterminate the whole senatorial order, and commit the government of the provinces, and the command of the armies, to the knights and his freed-men.

(P) In the streets and roads were found exposed several monsters with double heads, some brutes, and some of the human species: some were also taken from the bellies of victims: in the territory of Placentia was brought forth a calf with its head growing upon its leg; a prodigy, which, according to the interpretation of the soothsayers, foreboded, that for human kind another head was preparing, that would not remain long concealed (29).

- ^a THIS bloody design he began to put in execution the following year, when A. Licinius Nerva Silanus and M. Vestinus Atticus were consuls, a conspiracy, which was ^{Piso's conspiracy.} then discovered, affording him a plausible pretence for the mighty carnage. In this memorable conspiracy were engaged, we may say, the whole nobility of Rome; senators, knights, soldiers, and even women, entering into it with great eagerness and competition, partly from their detestation of Nero, and partly from their zeal for Caius Piso, who was at the head of it. He was allied to most of the illustrious families in Rome, and for his own virtues, or qualities, as Tacitus observes, that resembled virtues, highly favoured by the populace; for he was a great orator, and employed his eloquence in the defence of his fellow-citizens; generous to his friends and acquaint- ^{His character.} ance, and even to such as were unknown to him, affable and complaisant: he was of a tall stature, of a graceful countenance, and extremely popular in his language and address; but so far from being strict and austere in his life and manners, that he observed no restraint in his pleasures, abandoning himself to all manner of debauchery and luxury, a conduct, says our historian, not disapproved of by those who designed to raise him to the empire; for they did not care that the supreme head of the empire should be in his morals over severe. However, he was not the first author of the conspiracy; nay, our historian tells us, that it was never known by whom the design was first concerted, though Subrius Flavius, tribune of a prætorian cohort, and Sulpicius Asper, a centurion, seem to have been the most forward champions in it. Among ^{Many persons of distinction concerned in it.} the first who entered into it, our historian names Lucan, the celebrated poet, Plautius Lateranus, consul elect, Flavius Scevius, and Afranius Quinctilianus. Lucan was instigated by personal provocations, Nero, who was possessed with an ardent ambition of excelling in poetry, having from a ridiculous emulation forbid the publication of his poems: Lateranus, from whom the famous basilic at Rome took its name, was piqued by no injury done to himself, but engaged in a plot from a sincere affection to the republic. The other two had souls drowned in sensuality, and had till that time lived in sloth and debauchery: what prompted Scevius to conspire, we are not told; but Quinctilianus became an accomplice in order to be revenged on Nero, for having in a virulent satire published his scandalous and unnatural lewdness. Rome was surprised, ^d that two men of such characters should engage in an enterprise so great and daring. These we have mentioned drew soon into the combination Tullius Senecio, Cervarius Proculus, Vulcatus Araricus, Julius Tugurinus, Munatius Gratus, Antonius Natalis, and Martius Festus, all Roman knights. Out of the troops, besides the two officers already mentioned, were assumed as accomplices, Granius Silvanus, Stattius Proximus, both tribunes of the prætorian bands, Maximus Scaurus, Venetius Paulus, two centurions, and, as their main strength and dependence, Fenius Rufus, captain of the imperial guards, a man greatly esteemed by the people, and on that account hated both by his colleague Tigellinus and the emperor. The conspirators were no sooner assured, that Rufus had embraced their party, than they began more resolutely to debate about the time and place of the intended assassination. ^e Subrius Flavius undertook to assail Nero, while he was singing on the stage, or scouring the streets in his drunken revels by night, unattended by his guards; but a too great anxiety to escape with impunity, ever unseasonable in great enterprises, restrained him ¹.

^f IN the mean time, the conspirators putting off from day to day the execution of their design, a woman, named Epicharis, took upon her to rouse them. It was ^{freed-woman} utterly unknown by what means she came at all to be apprised of the plot; for till ^{animates the} that time she had never shewn the least regard to honour, virtue, or honesty. When ^{conspirators.} she found that all her reproaches and exhortations were to no effect, impatient of their slowness, she left Rome, and hastened into Campania, where she employed all her industry and skill to estrange from Nero the hearts of the chief officers of the fleet riding at Misenum, and to engage them in the design, which they had frequent opportunities of executing, as the emperor took great delight in sailing often along the coasts of Misenum and Puteoli. In that fleet, Volusius Proculus, who had been employed by Nero to dispatch his mother, had the command of a thousand marines. But as he did not think himself thereby sufficiently rewarded for so meritorious a murder, either from an old acquaintance with Epicharis, or a friendship newly contracted, he related to her his signal services to Nero, adding bitter complaints, that he had not been distinguished with promotion equal to his deserts. In answer to him,

The conspiracy
how discovered.

Epicharis urged all the crying cruelties, all the barbarous outrages committed by the tyrant, and at the same time acquainted him with the conspiracy; but had the precaution to conceal from him the names of the conspirators. The traitor was no sooner let into the secret, than he flew to Rome, and betrayed the whole to Nero. But his discovery availed nothing; for when Epicharis was summoned and confronted with the informer, as his charge against her was supported by no witnesses, she denied it, pretending to be greatly amazed at the impudent boldness of the accuser. However, she was detained in prison, Nero suspecting that the charge was not false, though not proved to be true*. The conspirators being, notwithstanding the silence of Epicharis, apprehensive of a discovery, came to a resolution to hasten the intended murder, and chose, as the most convenient place for the execution of their design, a villa at Baiæ belonging to Piso, whither the emperor frequently resorted to bathe and banquet, with a small number of attendants. But in this Piso would by no means concur, alledging the general abhorrence, which must ensue, were the sacred rights of hospitality violated, with the murder of a prince, however wicked. He thought it more adviseable to dispatch him at Rome, either in the detested house, which he had reared with the spoils of the unhappy city, or in the face of the public, since for the benefit of the public the design had been undertaken. Thus he reasoned openly among the conspirators; but in his heart he was influenced by secret jealousy, fearing lest Lucius Silanus, a man of extraordinary accomplishments, might, as he was then at Rome, upon the first news of Nero's death, seize the vacant sovereignty for himself. He was likewise jealous of the consul Vestinus, not knowing but he might, as he was a man of great intrepidity, attempt the restoring of the ancient government, or bestow the empire upon some other, as a gift of his own. The conspirators, moved by the reasonings of Piso, unanimously agreed to execute their design, not at Baiæ, but at Rome, on the anniversary sacred to Ceres, and always solemnised with Circensian games, at which Nero never failed to assist, giving free access to all, during the gaiety of the sports. The design was to be executed in the following manner: Lateranus, who was but in slender circumstances, under pretence of imploring relief, was to fall at the prince's feet, and, while he apprehended no such attempt, throw him down, and keep him fixed to the ground. Then the tribunes, centurions, and the other conspirators, were, each according to his boldness, to rush in and dispatch him. Scevinus earnestly claimed the honour and satisfaction of giving the first blow; for having formerly taken a dagger out of a temple, he carried it constantly about him, as consecrated to the execution of some mighty design. It was moreover agreed, that Piso should wait the event in the temple of Ceres, and be thence brought forth by Fenius, captain of the guards, and conducted to the camp (Q).

THE day before that, which was appointed for the execution of the design, Scevinus, upon his returning home from a long conference with Antonius Natalis, sealed his will; then unsheathing the above-mentioned dagger, he complained it was blunt and rusty, charging Milichus, one of his freed men, to have it ground and sharpened at the point: next he ordered a repast, more sumptuous and profuse than ordinary, to be got ready; after which he presented his favourite slaves with their liberty, and others with sums of money: his countenance, in the midst of an affected cheerfulness, appeared clouded: in his discourse he was continually running from one subject to another, without attending to any; whence all who were present, concluded, that his mind was fraught with some great design: at last he ordered the same Milichus to prepare bandages for wounds, and applications for stopping blood. The freed-man, reflecting on these orders, and concluding with himself, that a conspiracy was undoubtedly carrying on, and his patron concerned in it, hastened next morning by break of day to the gardens of Servilius, where Nero then was; and being refused admittance, declared that he came to discover matters of the utmost importance.

* Idem, c. 51, 52.

(Q) Pliny tells us, that in order to attract the affections of the people, Antonia, daughter of the late emperor Claudius, was to accompany Piso to the camp. But our historian thinks it incredible, that either Antonia should contribute her name, and risque her life, to promote a scheme, from which she could reap no advantage, or that Piso, who was universally known to be passionately fond of his wife, should engage to marry another (30).

(30) Idem, c. 44.

a importance. Hereupon he was by the porters conducted to Epaphroditus, one of Nero's freed-men, and by him forthwith to the emperor himself, to whom he related all the circumstances he had observed, shewed the dagger, and desired the criminal to be immediately sent for. Accordingly, Scevinus was by a band of soldiers hastily seized and dragged before the emperor; but defended himself with a spirit so undaunted, and inveighed against the informer as a treacherous wretch, still actuated by the base spirit of a slave, with such firmness and intrepidity, that the informer had been baffled, had not his wife put him in mind, that Antonius Natalis had held a long conference with Scevinus, and that both lived in close confidence with Caius Piso. Natalis was therefore immediately sent for, and both he and Scevinus examined apart concerning the particulars of that conference. As their answers varied, they were thrown into b irons, and threatened with the rack, the sight of which neither of them being able to bear, they discovered the whole order and progress of the conspiracy. Natalis confessed the first, and declared how far Piso was concerned in the plot, and named also Seneca; but whether he had acted as an inter-agent between him and Piso, or whether Natalis impeached him only to purchase the favour of Nero, who was daily hunting after some specious pretence to destroy him, is uncertain, Scevinus, understanding that by Natalis a confession was made, and that no advantage could be reaped from his silence, yielded at length, and declared all the other accomplices. Of these Lucan, Quintilianus, and Senecio, persisted long in denying the charge; but at length c were decoyed by a promise of impunity; and then, to atone for their backwardness, they informed against their dearest friends, Lucan against Attilia, his own mother, Quintilianus against Glicius Gallus, and Senecio against Annius Pollio. In the mean time, Nero, recollecting that Epicharis was detained in prison, and supposing, that the tender body of a woman could never endure the violence of the rack, commanded her to be rent and mangled with all sorts of torments. But her firmness and magnanimity was proof against the fury of stripes, of fire, and of all the torments the executioners could invent, though they exerted their utmost efforts in cruelty, lest they should be at last scorned and baffled by a woman. She still utterly denied every particular; and such was the issue of the first day's torture. The next day, as she was
d reconducted in a chair to suffer anew the same torments, for all her members were so rent and disjointed, that she could not support herself, with the girdle, that bound her breasts, she framed a noose for her neck, and tying it to the top of the chair, hung upon it with all the weight of her body, and put an end to the poor remains of life. Thus a woman, who was once a slave, cheerfully suffered the most exquisite torments cruelty could invent, and death itself, to protect persons, whom she scarce knew, when men born free, when Roman knights and senators, without once feeling the torture, betrayed their dearest friends, their nearest relations. For Lucan, Senecio, and Quintilianus were daily making new discoveries, and still naming more accomplices; which so terrified Nero, that he not only doubled his guards, but posted bands of e soldiers upon the walls and all round the city, lined the sea-coast and the banks of the Tiber with numerous detachments, ordered parties of foot and horse to scour the fields night and day, to range in the public squares, in the neighbouring municipal towns, to enter the private houses, &c. With the prætorian guards Germans were intermixt; for in them, as they were foreigners, the prince chiefly confided.

Nero's great consternation.

f AND now the accused were dragged in whole droves, numbers after numbers, to Nero's tribunal, which was erected in his gardens, and lay together at the gates, expecting to be successively admitted and examined. If upon their trial it appeared, that they had ever been seen smiling with any of the conspirators; that they had ever spoke with them, met them, however fortuitously, been common guests at the same table, or sat together at some publick shew; all this, or any part of it, was imputed as an unpardonable crime. The judges were Nero himself, Tigellinus, and his colleague Fenius Rufus, who, as he was not yet detected, proved more severe than the other two in examining his own associates, in order to persuade the prince, that he was an utter stranger to the plot. Nay, to him it was owing, that the design was not put in execution, even during the examination of the conspirators: for the brave tribune, Subrius Flavius, who attended and was not yet impeached or suspected, having demanded by signs, whether he should draw his sword, and dispatch the tyrant, was by contrary signs checked and forbid, when he had already grasped the hilt.

hilt. When the conspiracy was first discovered, there were some, who exhorted Piso a to proceed directly to the camp, or mount the rostrum; and try the affections of the people and soldiery, since nothing worse could befall him; though both the soldiery and people failed him, than he must already expect; nay, by losing his life in so glorious an attempt, he would approve himself worthy of his ancestors, and leave a glorious example to his posterity; whereas, if he neglected the present opportunity, he would be soon seized, committed to bonds, and condemned to an ignominious death. But Piso, rejecting the advice of his friends and associates, the best that could be given him at the present juncture, retired, without making the least attempt, to his own house; where, upon the arrival of a band of soldiers to seize him, he opened the veins in both his arms, and bled to death. He left a will full of fulsome flattery b towards Nero; and this out of tenderness to his wife Arria Galla, whom he had taken from Domitius Silius, a friend of his own, tho' she was a woman of most vicious inclinations, and, save the beauty of her person, destitute of every recommendation. Next followed the death of Plautius Lateranus, consul elect, inflicted with such precipitation, that he was not allowed even to embrace his children; but instantly dragged to the place allotted for the execution of slaves, and there slaughtered by the hand of Statius the tribune. He died with exemplary firmness and intrepidity; uttered not a syllable relating to the conspiracy; but with an undaunted spirit answered Epaphroditus, the emperor's freedman and secretary, who asked him some questions, If I were mean enough to make any discoveries, it would be to your master, not to you. c He did not even upbraid the tribune appointed to cut off his head, tho' he too was concerned with him in the conspiracy. Arrian tells us, that the first blow having only wounded him, he shook his head a little, and then presented his neck again to the executioner d.

Piso puts himself to death.

Plautius Lateranus dies with great intrepidity.

The particulars of Seneca's death.

THE next illustrious person sacrificed on this occasion was Annæus Seneca, to the infinite joy of Nero, who had been long seeking his destruction. Natalis alone had named him, and concerning him could only discover thus much, that he had been sent by Piso to visit Seneca, then indisposed, to complain in his name, that he was debarred access to him, and to represent, that it would be better if they maintained their friendship by familiar conversation; that to this Seneca replied, that frequent interviews and conversations by themselves were conducing to the service of neither; but that upon the safety of Piso his own welfare depended. Granius Silvanus, tribune of a prætorian cohort, was sent to Seneca, with orders to ask him, Whether he owned the words of Natalis and his own answers? Seneca was returned that very day from Campania, and had stopped at a villa of his, four miles from Rome. Thither arrived the tribune in the evening; and having beset the villa with his men, he entered the house, and acquainted Seneca with his commission, while he sat at table with Paulina his wife, and two friends. Seneca answered, That Natalis had in truth been sent to him, and had complained in Piso's name, that he was refused admittance; a complaint which he had answered by excusing himself, on account of his bodily disorder and his love of quiet. He denied to have ever declared, that his safety depended upon that of any private man, adding, that he was not at all addicted to flattery, as no man better knew than Nero. When this answer was by the tribune reported to the emperor, he asked, whether Seneca seemed determined upon a voluntary death? I have not discovered, replied the tribune, either in his words or looks, the least symptom of fear. Hereupon Nero commanded him to return directly, and acquaint him, that he must die. The tribune who was himself one of the conspirators, took not the same way he came; but turning aside, went first to Fenius, captain of the guards, and disclosing to him the emperor's orders, asked, Whether he should obey them? The cowardly commander advised him to execute his commission, and act in every respect as if he were an utter stranger to the plot. Thus Fenius and Silvanus, through a meanness and timidity hardly to be believed, contributed to multiply those very cruelties, which they had conspired to avenge. However, the tribune avoided seeing Seneca, and delivering in person the said message; but sent in a centurion to apprise him of his doom. Seneca heard the sentence without betraying the least dismay or concern, and calmly called for his will; but that being denied him by the centurion, turning to his friends, he told them, That since he was prevented from gratefully acknowledging their favours, he

- a he bequeathed them that which alone was now left him, the pattern of his life. He repressed their tears, sometimes with gentle reasoning, sometimes with sharp rebukes, asking them, Where were now all the documents of philosophy? where the precepts of wisdom so many years premeditated against impending calamities? for to whom, said he, is unknown the bloody nature of Nero? After the butchering of his mother and brother, what remained, but to add to theirs the slaughter of his preceptor and instructor? After he had discoursed some time to the company in general, he embraced his wife; an affecting object! which somewhat abated his firmness, and seemed to soften his philosophical spirit. He besought her to moderate her sorrow, and to fortify herself against the grief arising from the loss of her husband, by the contemplation of his life spent in a steady course of virtue. Paulina, on the contrary, The constancy of his wife.
- b resolutely declared, that she was determined to die with him. This declaration surprised Seneca, who, unwilling to bereave her of so much glory, and loth to leave one, whom he tenderly loved, exposed to insults and injuries, after a short pause, Since to the delights of a short life, you prefer, said he, the everlasting fame of a glorious death, I shall not envy you this honour. Let us share the glory of so brave an end, tho' your share will be by far the greater. After this conversation, both had the veins of their arms opened at the same instant. As Seneca was aged, and his body extenuated with a slender diet, his blood issued but slowly; whereupon he caused the veins of his legs and those about the joints of his knees to be likewise cut. As he suffered cruel agonies, he persuaded his wife to retire into another chamber, lest his torments should shake her resolution, or he himself, affected with her pangs, betray weakness and impatience. As his eloquence did not fail him to the last moment of his life, he called for his scribes, and dictated to them many things, which were published after his death. As Nero bore no personal enmity to Paulina, and was well apprised, that her death would double the hatred of the public towards him, he sent orders to the soldiers to prevent her from dying; who thereupon commanded her domestic slaves and freed-men to bind up her arms and stop the blood; but whether this was done without her knowledge, or with her concurrence, is uncertain; for as men are commonly prone to believe the worst, there were some who asserted, that while she despaired of her pardon, she aspired at the glory of dying with her husband; but yielded to the allurements of life, as soon as she found the prince inclined to mercy. However that be, she outlived her husband but a few years, ever pale and in a languishing condition, and retained to the last a reverence for his memory worthy of all praise. Seneca, in the mean time, to hasten his death which advanced but slowly, besought Statius Annaeus, an intimate friend of his and well skilled in medicine, to bring him a draught of poison, which he had prepared long before, and kept by him. This he swallowed; but in vain, his limbs being chilled with cold, and his juices stagnated. He had therefore recourse to a hot bath, to hasten by that means the operation of the poison, or to make his blood flow more freely. With the water of the bath he sprinkled such of his slaves as stood near him, saying, With this liquor I make a libation to Jupiter the deliverer. This he did in imitation of the Greeks, who, in departing after a banquet, used to make libations to Jupiter the preserver. As the bath had not the desired effect, and the soldiers were very pressing, he was at last conveyed into a stove, and there suffocated with the steam. His corps was burnt without any funeral solemnity, pursuant to a will which he had made, even while he was in high favour with the prince^w. Thus died the celebrated L. Annaeus Seneca, on the twelfth, or, as others will have it, on the thirteenth, of April. Dion Cassius assures us, that he was privy to the conspiracy^x, from which charge Tacitus does not attempt to clear him. He tells us indeed, that Nero had no proof of his being engaged in the plot; but adds, that a rumour prevailed, that Subrius Flavius, in a secret consultation with the centurions, not without the privacy of Seneca, had determined, as soon as Nero was cut off by the aid of Piso, to dispatch Piso too, and transfer the empire to Seneca; nay, the very words, said to have been uttered by Flavius in that conference, became current, viz. That it availed nothing to depose a minstrel, if he were to be succeeded by a tragedian; for as Nero used to play upon the harp, so Piso's chief delight was to sing attired like an actor in a tragedy. Of Seneca's writings we shall speak hereafter. As to his manners, we shall only say, that many things were imputed to him, perhaps not undeservedly, altogether.

altogether inconsistent with the philosophy which he professed. He entertained a mighty opinion of his own virtue; but few have hitherto concurred with him in the same sentiments.

Fenius Rufus
is accused and apprehended.

HITHERTO Fenius Rufus had proceeded with more severity, than either Tigellinus or Nero himself, against the conspirators his accomplices; but was in the end detected: for while in the examination of Flavius Scevius the senator, he urged him with many menaces to a full confession, Scevius smiled, and told him, That no man was better acquainted with the particulars of the plot than himself. Fenius attempted to refute the charge; but, faltering and perplexed in his speech, he gave manifest tokens of his guilt and dismay: whereupon he was by the emperor's orders immediately seized and dragged to prison. At the same time the brave tribune Subrius Flavius was impeached. He at first defended himself; but being pressed by the informers, he not only owned the charge, but gloried in it; and in answer to Nero, who asked him, Upon what provocation he had slighted the obligation of his oath? for the soldiery, especially the officers, bound themselves by a solemn oath to protect the prince against all foreign and domestic enemies; Because I abhorred thee, said he, though there was not in the whole army one more zealously attached to thee than I, so long as thou didst merit affection; but I began to hate thee, when thou becamest the murderer of thy mother, the murderer of thy brother and wife, a charioteer, a comedian, and an incendiary. Tacitus tells us, that the whole conspiracy afforded nothing which proved so bitter and pungent to Nero as this reproach. He ordered Flavius to be immediately put to death, committing the execution to Veianus Niger, a tribune, who led him into the next field, and there ordered in the first place a funeral trench to be dug, such as served for a grave to the soldiers, who died in the camp. Flavius found fault with it, as too straight and shallow; and turning to the guard of soldiers, This, said he, without betraying the least concern, is not even done according to the laws of discipline. When the tribune desired him to stretch out his neck valiantly, I wish, replied he, thou mayst strike as valiantly; and truly the tribune was seized with such a violent trembling, that he with difficulty cut off his head at two blows. However, he afterwards bragged to Nero, that he had designedly employed more blows than one. The next example of firmness and constancy was administered by Sulpicius Asper, the centurion; who being asked by Nero, Why he had conspired against him? answered in a few words, Because there was no other relief against thy abominable enormities. The other centurions faced death with equal bravery. But Fenius Rufus betrayed a meanness quite unbecoming a man of his rank and profession; nay, he even filled his last will with unmanly lamentations. Nero hoped to find the consul Vestinus likewise concerned in the conspiracy; but, as he was a man of a violent spirit and altogether untractable, the conspirators had not thought fit to impart their design to him. He had once lived in close confidence with Nero; but afterwards abusing the freedom which the emperor allowed him, and utterly despising him, he used frequently to insult the prince with poignant sarcasms, which left behind them a bitter remembrance, as they were for the most part founded on truth. Besides, Nero dreaded the haughty and violent temper of Vestinus; and therefore wished for a plausible pretence to get rid of him; but as no accuser appeared to charge him, since he could not satiate his rancour under the title of a judge, he had recourse to the violence of a tyrant, and dispatched Gerellanus the tribune, at the head of five hundred men, with orders to obviate the attempts of the consul. He had that day discharged all the functions of a consul, and was celebrating a banquet at home with great gaiety, when the soldiers entering, told him, That the tribune waited for him. Vestinus, without delay, rose from table, and in a trice the tragedy was begun and finished; he was shut up in a chamber; the physician attended; his veins were cut, and he, while he was still in full vigor, conveyed into a hot bath, and suffocated with the steam, without uttering a syllable that argued either grief or compassion for himself. In the mean time, the whole company that supped with him were beset by a guard, and not released, till the night was far spent, Nero making himself sport with the fears of men, who had passed at once, from the mirth and joy of a feast, to the deadly apprehension of their last doom. At length he ordered the guards to withdraw, saying, that the consul's guests had paid dear enough for their good cheer. Lucan the poet was next sentenced to die. - a issuing in streams, he soon perceived his feet and hands to grow cold and stiff; but before his faculties were impaired, recollecting some lines of his own, in which he described a wounded soldier expiring after the same manner, he rehearsed them, and they were the last words he uttered ² (N). Suetonius, or whoever else is the author of his life, tells us, that his behaviour towards Nero, who loved him, was such as would have provoked the best of princes. His informing, and indeed falsely, if the author of his life is to be credited, against his own mother, will reflect eternal ignominy on his memory. The emperor had promised him his pardon; but the only favour he granted him, was the choice of his death, which happened on the thirtieth of April in the twenty-seventh year of his age ^a. We shall speak of his writings anon.

- b Senecio, Quintilianus, and Scevinus, suffered death with a spirit far different from the former effeminacy of their lives. The other conspirators were put to death, without speaking or doing any thing worthy of notice. Suetonius tells us, that Nero, not satisfied with the punishment of the conspirators themselves, drove their innocent children out of Rome, and caused them, together with their tutors, governors, and domestics, to be either poisoned, or starved to death ^b. Whole families, as that writer assures us, were cut off at one meal. During this mighty carnage, which filled Rome with deaths, corpses, and funerals, no one durst shew the least symptom of sorrow for their murdered relations; nay, they must testify joy, unless they had a mind to be treated like traitors and enemies to the state and emperor. Hence, as the city was filled with carcases, so was the capitol with victims: one had lost a son; one a brother; this man a friend; that a near relation: but whatever was the loss, every one paid his public thanksgiving to the gods; adorned, in token of joy, his house with laurel; fell prostrate at the emperor's feet; kissed his hand, &c. Antonius Natalis and Cervarius Proculus were pardoned, in consideration of their early confession and discovery. Milichus the freed-man was amply rewarded, and honoured with a Greek name signifying protector. Granius Silvanus, one of the tribunes of the prætorian guards, obtained his pardon; but soon after, scorning to owe his life to the tyrant, fell by his own hand. All the friends of Seneca, tho' rather calumniated than convicted, were condemned to banishment. Cæsonius Maximus and Cadicia, the wife of Scevinus, were driven out of Italy, and only by their punishment knew that they had been charged as criminals (O). The accusation against Attilia, Lucian's mother, was dropt; so that, without being cleared, she escaped unpunished ^c.

Rewards the instruments of his cruelty.

AND now the conspiracy being utterly suppressed, and the conspirators either sentenced to death or banishment, Nero assembled the soldiery, distributed amongst them a largess of two thousand nummi a man, and ordered them to be thenceforth supplied with corn at the public expence. Upon Petronius Turpilianus, Cocceius Nerva, and Tigellinus, he bestowed triumphal ornaments, as a reward for their zeal in prosecuting the conspirators; nay, he caused triumphal statues to be erected in the forum to the two latter, and their images to be placed in the palace; a distinction seldom granted,

(N) The verses mentioned here, were, without all doubt, the following:

*Scinditur avulsus, nec sicut vulnere sanguis
Emicuit lentus, ruptis cadit undique venis;
Discursusque animæ diversa in membra meat

(O) The following beautiful epigram in Martial, inscribed to one Ovidius, an intimate friend of Cæsonius Maximus, may give us some light into this matter:

*Maximus ille tuus, Ovidi, Cæsonius hic est,
Cujus adhuc vultum vivida cera tenet.
Hunc Nero damnavit; sed tu damnare Neronem
Ausus es, & profugi, non tua fata, sequi:
Æquora per Scyllæ magnus comes exulis isti, Qui modo nolueras consulis ire comes.
Si victura meis mandantur nomina chartis,
Et fas est cineri me superesse meo;*

*Audiet hæc præsens, venturaque turba, fuisse
Illi te, Senecæ quod fuit ille suo (31).*

From these verses it is plain, that Cæsonius had been a consul, and was one of Seneca's most intimate friends; which was, without doubt, the motive that prompted Nero to banish him. As Ovidius accompanied him into banishment, so had Cæsonius in all likelihood accompanied formerly Seneca, when he was by Claudius banished into the island of Corfica. The subject of the present epigram is the effigies of Cæsonius in wax, sent either by Martial to his friend Ovidius, or by Ovidius to the poet. Cæsonius himself died, it seems, before this time in exile. After his consulship, he was sent into Africa, to govern that province, whither Ovidius refused to follow him; but, like a true friend, he attended him, when disgraced and condemned to banishment; a signal instance of fidelity and friendship, and worthy of being by so great a poet transmitted to the latest posterity.

granted, and only to persons of the greatest merit. Nymphidius was distinguished a with the consular ornaments. He was the son of a freed-woman, who, as she was very beautiful, had long prostituted herself to the domestics of the emperors, bond and free, without distinction. Nymphidius boasted himself the son of Caligula, whom he resembled both in his countenance and the tallness of his stature; and it is not improbable, says our historian, that the emperor, addicted as he was to all manner of lewdness, had descended to gallantries with his mother. But of him we shall have occasion to speak more at length hereafter; for he too had his share in the calamities and vicissitudes of Rome. The emperor, having thus rewarded the instruments of his tyranny, assembled the fathers, and acquainted them with the late transactions. To the people likewise he addressed an edict upon the same subject, and published b the several evidences against the conspirators, with their own confessions, in order to confute a rumour current among the populace, that the plot was forged; and that Nero, merely to satiate his cruelty and out of base fear, had sacrificed so many illustrious citizens. In the senate, where the most abject flattery prevailed, every particular, the more sensibly he was affected with inward grief for the loss of his friends or relations, the more outward joy and congratulations he expressed. It was by the whole body decreed, that public thanksgivings and oblations should be paid to all the deities, and particular honours to the sun, who having a chapel in the circus, where the parricide was to be perpetrated, had brought to light the dark contrivances of the conspirators; that the circensian games should be solemnized with c extraordinary pomp; that the month of April, in which the conspiracy was detected, should thenceforth bear the name of Nero; that a temple should be erected to the goddess Salus or Safety, in the place whence Scevinus had taken the dagger, &c. The dagger itself was by Nero dedicated in the capitol, with this inscription, To Jupiter the avenger (P). Such was the issue of this conspiracy, which to the same moment owed, as Tacitus observes, its beginning, progress, and perfection, and was with faithful silence and secrecy concealed in a combination so numerous, so variously framed, amongst those of every condition, sex, and age, till it was accidentally discovered in the manner we have related.

Nero betakes himself again to his harp.

He appears on the public stage as a competitor for the prizes.

Nero, now delivered from all fear, betook himself again to his harp. As the time d approached for disputing the prizes in the quinquennial games, the senate, to prevent Nero from appearing there as a competitor, offered him the prize of music, and also the crown of eloquence. But the emperor answered, That he needed not their partiality; since he himself was a match for all his competitors, and would only, by the just determination of the judges, purchase the praise and recompence of his skill. He appeared therefore publicly upon the stage, and there rehearsed a poem of his own composing; but the populace applauding him, and begging he would display all his studies, for these were their words, he entered the great theatre, and there appearing amongst the common harpers and minstrels, contended with them for the prize, with such eagerness and anxiety, that he never ventured to sit down, however e fatigued, that being contrary to the established laws of the harp, nor to spit, nor to wipe the sweat from his face, save only with his arm. In the end, adoring the multitude with his knee bent and his hands lifted up, according to the custom of the common players, he waited with awe and trembling the determination of the judges. The common people of Rome applauded him with loud shouts and clapping of hands, from an utter insensibility, says our historian, of the crying reproach, which disgraced the Roman empire. But the inhabitants of the municipal cities of Italy, who still retained the severe manners of the ancients, and such as came from remote provinces, and attended then at Rome upon embassies, or their own private affairs, could not behold, without indignation, the sovereign of Rome thus debasing himself upon the stage, and much less join those, who applauded this his shameful debasement. They f were

(P) The dagger was inscribed to Jupiter the avenger, Jovi vindici; words, says our historian, which, at that time, were not minded. But, upon the revolt of Julius Vindex, which afterwards happened, an augury and presage of approaching vengeance was drawn from them. Tacitus tells us, that he found, in the journals of the senate, that Cerealis Anicius, consul elect, when it came to his vote, moved, that a temple should in all speed be raised at the public charge, and consecrated to the deified Nero; a motion which he really meant as a compliment, to one who was intitled to divine worship; but from thence too was inferred an omen of his approaching fate; since to princes divine honours were not paid, till they finished their mortal course (32).

Nero, encouraged with the applause of the multitude, appeared thenceforth almost every day on the stage, inviting, not only the senators and knights, but likewise the populace and the whole rabble of Rome, to hear him, though he performed for the most part in the theatre, which he had built in the palace. He often kept the audience, not only the whole day, but the night too; for till he was tired and gave over, no one was allowed to depart upon any occasion, however necessary and urging: insomuch, that women are said to have been delivered in the theatre, and several persons so tired, that, finding the gates of the palace shut, they either leaped privately over the wall, or, in order to be carried out, pretended to be in a swoon^e; some, by never stirring night nor day from their seats, were seized with mortal distempers, which, however, they dreaded less than the prince's resentment, which they unavoidably incurred by their absence: besides the several concealed and private observers, employed to mark the carriage of the audience, there were numbers of open spies, who publicly set down the names of such as were present, observed their faces, and watched all the symptoms of pleasure or dissatisfaction in every one present: the vulgar were immediately punished by the soldiery for the least disattention; towards persons of rank the emperor's resentment was for the present smothered, but vented at last in a more dreadful manner. We are told, that Vespasian, afterwards emperor, was not only bitterly reproached by Phæbus, Nero's freed-man, but charged as a criminal, for having nodded while the emperor was singing: this disattention would have cost him his life, had not his friends, men of great rank and merit, employed their prayers and mediation in his behalf. This year the death of Poppæa, Nero's wife, filled Rome in appearance with grief and mourning, but in reality with much joy; for she was no less abhorred, than her husband, on account of her lewdness and cruelty. She was killed by Nero himself with a kick on the belly, while she was big with child, for finding fault with him, as Suetonius tells us, upon his coming home late^f; or because she ventured to rally him, as we read in Dion Cassius^g, upon his skill and address in chariot-driving. Her body was not burnt according to the Roman custom; but, after the manner of foreign monarchs, embalmed and reposed in the sepulchre of the Julian family. Her obsequies were celebrated with the utmost pomp, and her panegyric pronounced from the public rostrum by the emperor himself^h. Pliny assures us, that more perfumes were burnt at her funeral, than Arabia Felix produced in a yearⁱ. She constantly kept and carried about with her, if Dion Cassius is to be credited^k, five hundred asses, and daily bathed in their milk for the preservation of her beauty. Upon the death of Poppæa, Nero designed to marry Antonia, the daughter of Claudius and his own sister by adoption; but she declined the match, and was on that account by his orders put to death, as if she had been concerned in a conspiracy, probably that of Piso^l. Soon after he married Statilia Messalina, the widow of the late consul Atticus Vestinus, and descend from Statilius Taurus, who had been twice consul in the reign of Augustus. She too, as appears from some ancient medals^m, was honoured with the title of Augusta.

Not long after the death of Poppæa, Nero doomed to destruction two of the greatest men in Rome, Caius Cassius Longinus, a learned civilian, and L. Junius Silanus Torquatus, the former for his great wealth and the exemplary gravity of his manners; the latter, because he was related to the Cæsars, and, for his modesty and other eminent qualities, judged by the Roman people worthy of the empire. Cassius was blind, very aged, and led a retired life, as did likewise Silanus, though in the prime of his youth, having from the late bloody doom of his uncle Torquatus, who had assumed the port of a prince, learnt to shun all outward appearance of grandeur. However, the very same imputations, which had formerly been objected to his uncle, were urged against him; viz. that he aspired at the sovereign power, affected more majesty and state than became a private citizen, kept about him men with the title of principal secretaries, procurators, auditors of the revenues, treasurers, &c. names and offices of imperial grandeur, which he already personated: imputations utterly false and groundless. To Cassius Nero objected, that amongst the images of his ancestors he preserved in high reverence that of Caius Cassius, thus inscribed, The leader of

of the party. At the same time, he suborned certain persons to forge an accusation^a against Lepida, the wife of Cassius and aunt to Silanus, as if she had been guilty of incest with her nephew, and had practised magical rites of a mischievous tendency. Against Cassius and Silanus the senate pronounced sentence of perpetual banishment, but referred the punishment of Lepida to the judgment of the emperor. Cassius was transported into Sardinia, and, in regard of his great age, the short remains of his life were spared. Silanus, under colour of carrying him to the island of Naxos, was conveyed to Ostia, and afterwards confined in Barium, a city of Apulia, where a centurion, commissioned to put him to death, laying hold of him, advised him to cut his veins. Silanus answered, that he was not fond of life; but that no executioner should have the glory of putting him to death. Hereupon the centurion ordered his men to secure him; but Silanus, who was a young man of great strength, resolute and daring, though destitute of arms, made a vigorous resistance, till he fell by the sword of the centurion, under a multitude of wounds, all received before, like a brave man, who falls facing the enemy in the day of battleⁿ. With no less intrepidity died Lucius Vetius, and his mother-in-law Sextia, with Pollutia his daughter. Nero had long hated them, as standing reproaches upon him for the murder of Rubellius Plautus, the husband of Pollutia and son-in-law to Vetus. He therefore suborned a freed-man of Vetus to accuse him, and then sent a guard of soldiers to seize him at one of his seats in the neighbourhood of Formiæ. Hereupon his daughter Pollutia flew to Naples, where the emperor then was; and being denied access to him, watched at the gates of his house, till she had an opportunity of beseeching him to hear the defence of an innocent man, and not to sacrifice, upon the deposition of a treacherous slave, one who had formerly been his colleague in the consulship. But in the end, being convinced, that the implacable tyrant was not to be softened with supplications, she returned to her father, and acquainted him, that he must banish all hope, and with intrepidity meet a fate, which he could not avoid. At the same time, tidings arrived, that the senate was hastening his trial, and proceeding to a terrible and merciless sentence. Hereupon he distributed amongst his domestics whatever sums of money were then in his possession, and at the same time ordered them to remove and appropriate to themselves the rich furniture of his villa. Then retiring with his mother-in-law Sextia and his daughter Pollutia, into a private apartment, they all three opened their veins in one and the same chamber, with one and the same instrument; and being covered for decency with a single garment, they were conveyed into a warm bath, where they all three bled to death, the father's eyes being the whole time fixed upon his daughter, those of Sextia on her grand-daughter, and hers upon both: they all prayed with emulation for a speedy end; each wished to expire first, and leave behind such dear relations still alive, though hastening to die: and fortune observed the order of seniority and nature, the oldest expiring first, and the youngest last. After their death the servile senate was for pronouncing them guilty of high treason, and having their bodies dragged through the public streets, and thrown into the Tiber; but Nero interposed, declaring himself satisfied with the punishment, which they had voluntarily undergone^o. P. Gallus, a Roman knight, formerly intimate with Fenius Rufus and a friend to Vetus, was banished. To the freed-man the accuser a place was assigned in the theatre among the officers of the tribunes of the people. As the name of April had been already changed into that of Nero, the name of May into that of Claudius, so was the name of June now changed into that of Germanicus, Cornelius Orfitus moving, that the name of June should be abolished, since two of the Junii Torquati, already executed for treason, had rendered it abominable^p. This year the country of Campania was ravaged with dreadful tempests and violent whirlwinds; whole villages were overturned, plantations torn up, the fruits of the earth scattered, &c. At the same time, a terrible pestilence raged at Rome, and swept away in a short space above thirty thousand persons of all ranks and conditions. The senators and knights were less bewailed, as our historian observes, since by a contagion common to all, they escaped falling by the cruelty of the prince. Nero, after so many accumulated acts of tyranny, shewed this year some compassion upon the inhabitants of Lions, whom he presented with a large sum to repair the damage their city had suffered by accidental fire (R).

(33) Senec. epist. 91.

^a IN the following consulship of C. Suetonius Paulinus and C. Lusius Telesinus, Sofianus, who had been condemned, as we have related above, to perpetual banishment; for certain virulent verses by him composed against Nero, having insinuated himself into the friendship of one Pammenes, who was an exile in the same place, and celebrated for his knowledge in the mysteries of astrology, observed that messengers were daily arriving to consult him, and at the same time learnt, that from P. Anteius a yearly stipend was allowed him. Upon this intelligence he intercepted letters from Anteius, and even stole the papers containing the calculation of his nativity, and a scheme drawn concerning the birth and fortune of Ostorius Scapula; which he no sooner had in his possession, than he wrote to the emperor, that he had mighty discoveries to communicate; for Anteius and Ostorius were meditating some sudden attempt upon the state, and diving into their own destiny, and that of Cæsar. Light vessels were immediately dispatched away, and Sofianus with all possible expedition transported to Rome; where, upon the first divulging of his discovery, Anteius sealed his last testament, being warned by Tigellinus to lose no time, and then swallowed a draught of poison; but growing impatient of its slow operation, he hastened his death by opening his veins. Ostorius was then at an estate of his on the borders of Liguria, whither a centurion was sent with orders to kill him with all dispatch. For Ostorius was a man of extraordinary valour, of prodigious strength, great experience in war, eminently qualified for the command of an army, and had been distinguished in Britain, while he served there under his father, with a civic crown: hence Nero, who ever since the discovery of the late conspiracy, lived under continual dread, fearing that brave officer should take arms against him, was glad of any pretence to get rid of him. The centurion, having beset all the avenues to the villa, acquainted Ostorius with his orders from the emperor, which were no sooner signified to him, than turning against himself that bravery, which he had so often exerted against the enemy, he opened all his veins without betraying the least concern or dismay; but as the blood flowed slowly, he dispatched himself with a poignard, ordering one of his slaves to hold up the weapon steadily; then grasping and strengthening the slave's hand with his own, he ran his throat upon the fatal steel. Within the compass of a few days, Annæus Mella, Cerealis Anicius, Rufus Crispinus, and Caius Petronius, underwent the same bloody doom. Crispinus had been captain of the prætorian guards under Claudius, and distinguished, though only a knight, with the ornaments of the consulship; but lately banished, as privy to the conspiracy, into Sardinia, where, upon notice that he was doomed to die, he slew himself. Mella was brother to Gallio and Seneca, and the father of Lucan. He was accused by one of Lucan's intimate friends, named Fabius Romanus, who feigned, that the father and son were equally concerned in the conspiracy; and having counterfeited letters to this purpose in the hand of Lucan, shewed them to Nero, who ordered them to be carried to the accused, whose immense riches were his only crime. Mella no sooner saw them, than he opened his veins, and by a voluntary death anticipated his sentence: in his will he bequeathed immense sums to Tigellinus and his son-in-law Cossutianus Capito, in order to secure the remainder. Cerealis likewise became his own executioner, but fell unpitied, because he had formerly discovered a plot against Caligula. Caius Petronius, to whom some learned critics ascribe the fragments, equally elegant and obscene, which have reached our times, was a man intirely abandoned to all manner of voluptuousness. He wasted the day in sleep, and the night in revels: as others had by industry acquired a name and character, Petronius was by his signal sloth and indolence raised to notice and fame: he indulged himself in all the gaieties and delights of life; but at the same time had the prudence to keep within bounds, and not squander away, like many others, his estate. Neither was he a slave to his grosser appetites; but exceeding curious and refined in his luxury: his behaviour was extremely obliging and polite; his wit, in which he excelled all men of his time, natural and artless; and all his actions

Christian æra, orders for founding it having been given in the consulship of Hirtius and Pansa, forty-three years before the said æra. ten in the sixty-fourth or sixty-fifth of the Christian æra. That Nero should defer relieving the inhabitants for the space of seven years, as Lipsius pretends, is altogether improbable. This city shewed its gratitude to Nero, by steadily adhering to his party, after all the other cities of Gaul had declared for the revoltors (34).

tions accompanied with a certain air of negligence. However, he discharged the^a proconsular government of Bithynia, and soon after the consulship itself, with great reputation, shewing himself in both these employments equal to the management of the greatest affairs. Then returning to his former vices, he was by Nero admitted to a great intimacy, nothing appearing to the emperor elegant and polite, but what was recommended to him by the taste and approbation of Petronius. This Tigellinus could not bear, and therefore to get rid of one, who in credit was his rival, and in the science of pleasures his superior, had recourse to the cruelty and jealousy of the prince, two passions, to which all others gave room; accused Petronius of having lived in great intimacy with the conspirator Scevinus; suborned one of his slaves to confirm the charge, and precluded him from all means of defence. Nero happened at that^b time to be upon the road to Campania, and Petronius, having accompanied him as far as Cumæ, was there by his orders put under arrest: whereupon without flattering himself with vain hopes, or condescending to intreaties, he resolved to prevent his sentence by a voluntary death, which he underwent in a manner altogether new, but well suited to the life he had led; for having ordered his veins to be cut, he did not shew any eagerness to put an end to his agonies, but directed them to be closed again, and then opened by intervals, just as his fancy moved him, discoursing the whole time with his friends, not upon serious subjects, as if he aimed at the glory of constancy in braving death, but upon indifferent matters, hearkening with attention to gay epigrams, love-verses, and entertaining stories: some of his slaves he rewarded^c with bounties, others he punished with stripes: he even diverted himself with walking out, even refreshed himself with sleep, that his death, though in reality violent, might appear altogether natural. In his last will he flattered neither Nero nor Tigellinus, nor any of the great men in power, as most others had done; but, under feigned names of harlots and catamites, described the secret abominations of the emperor, transmitted to him this picture of himself carefully sealed, and then broke his signet, that it might not after his death become a snare to the innocent. Nero, greatly amazed to find all his nocturnal and most private impurities thus brought to light, after having long considered with himself by what means Petronius had come to the knowledge of them, fixed at length his suspicion upon Silia, the wife of a senator, one privy to^d all his debaucheries, and very intimate with Petronius. She was therefore doomed to banishment, for not concealing what she had seen and undergone in the prince's nocturnal revels. At the same time, Numicius Thermus was put to death, for no other crime, but because a freedman belonging to him accused Tigellinus of treason; which offence the informer expiated under the most exquisite torments^e.

AFTER the slaughter of so many illustrious men, Nero at length attempted, says our historian, to extirpate virtue itself, in the persons of Bareas Soranus and Thrasea Pætus, long since the objects of his hatred. Thrasea had withdrawn from the senate, as we have related above, when the affair of Agrippina came under debate there; at the sports, called Juvenales, he could not approve of the emperor's acting and singing upon the stage; when the senate was about to condemn to death Antistius the prætor, for a virulent satire by him composed against Nero, he proposed a mitigation of the sentence, and carried it; when divine honours were decreed to Poppæa, he absented himself, and declined attending her funeral; he had not now in three years once set his foot in the senate, and, though invested with the quindecemviral priesthood, had never made oblations for the safety of the prince, and the preservation of his heavenly voice, &c. These were the crimes urged against Thrasea by Capito Cossutianus and Marcellus Eprius, two informers of great acrimony and vehemence. Ostorius Sabinus, a Roman knight, took upon him the task of accusing Bareas Soranus: the crimes imputed to him were his friendship with Plautus, murdered by^f Nero's orders in Asia, and his intrigues with the Asiatics, while he governed them in quality of proconsul, in order to engage them in a revolt. But his real crimes were, as Tacitus informs us, his having governed Asia with signal vigilance and justice, his opening the port of Ephesus, a work mightily applauded by the Asiatics, and his leaving the inhabitants of Pergamus unpunished for opposing Acratus, one of Nero's freedmen, when he would have stripped their city of all its pictures and statues. The juncture Nero chose for destroying these two great men was, that of the arrival of Tiridates to receive the crown of Armenia, either because the public attention was then wholly

- a wholly engaged in that new sight, or because Nero meant on that occasion to display his greatness and power by the slaughter of the two most illustrious men in the whole empire. While the whole city flocked out to see a foreign king, Thrasea received orders not to attend his entry. Hereupon he composed a memorial to Nero, beseeching the emperor to acquaint him with the allegations against him, and offering to vindicate himself, were he but apprised of the charge. Nero received the memorial greedily, hoping that Thrasea, under the apprehension of his impending doom, might have writ something tending to the glory of the prince and his own discredit; but finding himself disappointed, and dreading the countenance, the great spirit, and free speech of a man so generally esteemed and revered, he ordered the senate to be summoned. In the mean time, Thrasea, having assembled his friends and relations The firmness of Thrasea.
- b to consult with them, whether he should attempt a defence or be silent, Rusticus Arulanus, a young man of great spirit and one of the tribunes of the people, who assisted at the consultation, offered to thwart the decree of the senate, by interposing against it. But Thrasea would by no means allow him to pursue such methods, as would in the end prove fatal to him. The next day, two cohorts of the prætorian guards surrounded the temple of Venus, where the senate was to meet; all the avenues to it were beset with men in their gowns, the common dress of the city, but armed with swords, which they took no care to conceal; the great squares and several temples were filled with bands of soldiers under arms. Through these the senators passed to their assembly, where, after a speech sent to them by Nero, and read by his quæstor, in which he sufficiently declared what he required of them, they condemned Thrasea, Soranus, and his daughter Servilia, but granted them the choice of their own deaths. The charge brought against Servilia was, that she had consulted the magicians, which she owned; but declared at the same time, that her consultation had been confined to the conservation of her own family, whether the wrath of Nero might not be appeased, and whether no tragical judgment would follow the cognizance of the senate. Farther than this she had not inquired; but nevertheless she was brought into the senate, and there arraigned by Ostorius Sabinus, who questioned her, whether she had not turned into money all her ornaments, and even stripped from her neck her jewels, to defray the expence of magic rites and sacrifices? To this question young Servilia, for she was under twenty, embracing the altars with a flood of tears, answered, that the whole of her consultation had been to know, whether the emperor, and the fathers of the senate, would to her dear and indulgent parent, beset with terrors, graciously afford protection and safety. With this view, said she, I presented the diviners, men till now utterly unknown to me, with my jewels, apparel, and the other ornaments peculiar to my quality, as I would have presented my blood and life, had my blood and life been required. But whatever this my proceeding was, my unfortunate father was an utter stranger to it; and, if it is a crime, I alone am the delinquent. These words alarmed Soranus, who interrupted her while she was yet uttering them, crying out, that as she was not supposed to be guilty of the crimes laid to his charge, her cause ought to be disjoined from his; that his own fate, whatever it should prove, he was ready to undergo, but hoped, that in the danger of the father they would not involve the innocent daughter. Having thus spoken, he was hastening to embrace his daughter, who flew to meet him; but the consul's lictors stepped between and prevented them.

SENTENCE was no sooner pronounced against the pretended criminals, than the quæstor was dispatched to acquaint Thrasea with it, who was then in his gardens, reasoning there with Demetrius, a Cynic philosopher, about the nature of the soul, and its departure from the body. While he was intent upon this discourse, Domitius Cecilianus, one of his most intimate friends, arrived, and related to him what the senate had decreed. Thrasea heard him without betraying, either in his voice or countenance, the least concern; only turning to his friends, who came with Cecilianus, he embraced them, took his last leave of them, and pressed them forthwith to retire, lest they should for their unseasonable compassion be involved in the same fate. His wife Arria was very earnest to follow the example of her mother, who bore the same name, and was wife to Cecina Pætus, with whom she died, as we have related elsewhere. But Thrasea would not by any means allow her to share in his lot, beseeching her to preserve her life, and not deprive her daughter of her only remaining refuge. He then then went forth into a gallery, and there the quæstor found him, and delivered to him in form the sentence of the senate, which he immediately put in execution, retiring into his chamber with Helvidius his son-in-law, Demetrius, and the quæstor, in whose presence he ordered the veins of both his arms to be cut. As the blood sprung, he called the quæstor nearer, and sprinkling the floor with it, Let us, said he to him, make this libation to Jupiter the Deliverer. Behold, young man; may the gods avert the omen! but you are born in such times as require you to fortify your mind with examples of constancy. After this, falling into grievous torments, occasioned by the slow approaches of death, he turned towards Demetrius; but of the last words and particulars of this great man's death we are bereft, by a lamentable chasm in this last annal of our historian, and by the same misfortune robbed of the detail, which that inimitable writer left of the other remarkable incidents that happened during the remainder of this, and the whole two last years of Nero's reign. This loss we shall supply in the best manner we can with the accounts which have been transmitted to us by other writers, especially Suetonius and Dion Cassius; but as neither of them has described the particulars of the death of Thrasea, Soranus, and his daughter Servilia, we cannot therein satisfy the curiosity of our readers.

crowned king of Armenia
by Nero.

Soon after the death of Thrasea, Nero, to divert the attention of the public from their domestic calamities, received Tiridates with all the pomp of majesty and grandeur imaginable, and crowned him in one of the great squares king of Armenia. This was the most magnificent and pompous ceremony that had ever been seen in Rome; but as we have already described it in our history of the Greater Armenia, we shall only add here, that Nero allowed him, during his stay at Rome, eighty thousand nummi a day, and loaded him, upon his departure, with presents of immense value. The Armenian, who was a good courtier, had flattered the vain prince, and pretended to be ravished with his harmonious voice, and the skill he displayed in chariot-driving. After the coronation of Tiridates, Nero shut up the temple of Janus, in token of an universal peace, as appears from a medal dated the thirteenth year of his reign, which did not begin till the month of October, before which time, that is, in the month of May, the Jews, grievously oppressed by their governor, especially Florus, had taken arms^r. Nero solicited Vologeses, brother to Tiridates, still king of the Parthians, to come likewise to Rome; but in vain, Vologeses returning no other answer, than that Nero might, with less trouble, cross the Mediterranean and come into Asia, where he would endeavour to meet him. The emperor, piqued with this answer, resolved to make war upon the Parthian; and with this view made mighty preparations; ordered the flower of the armies in Illyricum, Germany, and Britain, to begin their march towards the kingdom of Albania; and raised a new legion of Italians, each man six foot tall, which he called the legion of Alexander the Great^s. Thus was size first required in a soldier by a prince brought up amongst minstrels, songsters, and charioteers, who, it seems, had no real design of employing his chosen legion, or any others, in military feats: for upon intelligence, that the Parthian king was inflexible, and prepared on his side for a vigorous defence, he thought it adviseable to leave the glory of conquests and warlike exploits to others, and confine his ambition to the unprincely honour of playing, singing, and acting upon the stage. As the time therefore of the Olympic games approached, he left Italy, and passed over into Greece, with no other design, but to gain the reputation of the best harper, singer, actor, and charioteer, in the whole Roman empire. The Greeks, who surpassed all other nations in flattery, understanding that the emperor piqued himself upon his skill in playing upon the harp, had dispatched two ambassadors to him with all the crowns designed by their several cities for such players; which was so acceptable to Nero, that he not only gave their ambassadors audience before any others, but admitted them to an entertainment, which he had prepared for his most intimate friends. On this occasion one of them having begged him to sing them a song; he immediately complied with his request, and was so taken with their extravagant flattery, that he cried out, The Greeks alone have a good ear; none but they understand music! and a few days after set out for Greece, leading with him, says Dion Cassius, such multitudes, as might have easily reduced the Parthians and all the nations of the east, had they not, like their general, been destitute of all courage, and armed only with harps, fiddles, masques, buskins, and such-like theatrical implements. With this army he imbarqued, and landing.

a landing at Cassiope, he immediately began to sing before the altar of Jupiter Cassius. Thence he advanced into the heart of Greece, playing, singing, and acting in all the cities, through which he passed. But he chiefly exerted his skill at the Olympic games, where, to the eternal ignominy of the Roman name, the head of the empire was not ashamed to appear, as a competitor, among the common harpers, players, and charioteers. He won the prize of music, by corrupting, as was commonly believed, with large presents, either the judges, or his competitors. The prize of chariot-driving he evidently forfeited; for having attempted to drive with ten horses, he was thrown off, and so hurt, that though he remounted, yet he was constrained to give over before he had finished the career. However, as he insisted with the judges upon their excluding all casual events and misfortunes, the prize was to b his unexpressible satisfaction decreed him. When the games were over, Nero not only rewarded the judges with the rights of Roman citizens and rich presents, but restored the whole province of Achaia to its ancient liberty, taking upon himself the office of crier, and solemnly proclaiming the freedom of the Achaëans at Corinth on the day of the Isthmian games: so that from this time the Greeks continued free from all manner of taxes, impositions, and tributes, governing themselves by their own laws, till the reign of Vespasian, who revoked all the privileges and exemptions granted them by Nero, as Galba obliged the judges to refund the vast sums, with which the chanting emperor had presented them. As the province of Achaia belonged to the senate and people, Nero, when he declared it free, bestowed upon them in its room the island of Sardinia. c After this he travelled all over Greece, not prompted by the commendable curiosity of visiting the antiquities of that once celebrated country, but by the unprinciply ambition of displaying his skill and art in singing and playing upon the harp. He challenged every-where the best performers, and never failed, as we may well imagine, being declared victor; insomuch, that he is said to have gained in this progress above eighteen hundred prizes. He transmitted a particular account of each victory to the senate, injoining them to acknowledge the favours of the gods towards him with victims, oblations, and public processions, and to take care, that the same devotions were practised throughout the whole empire. That there might remain no monuments of other victors, he commanded all their statues to be pulled d down, to be dragged through the streets, and to be either dashed to pieces, or thrown into the common sewers.

THE Greeks, notwithstanding the favours he bestowed upon them, longed for his departure, his numerous train occasioning a great dearth of provisions, and almost a general famine. Philostratus assures us, that Xerxes, who entered Greece in a hostile manner, putting all to fire and sword, did not so grievously afflict that unhappy country, as Nero, who came as a friend, and with no other view, but to divert the inhabitants. He every-where stripped the cities and temples of the few pictures, statues, and other ornaments, which his officers had left them. The unfortunate province felt the effects, not only of his avarice, but likewise of his cruelty, of which Philostratus gives c us the following instance: An actor in a tragedy at the Isthmian games having sung, so as to deserve the chief applause, and refusing, as he was better skilled in music than in the courtly art of flattery, to lower his voice, which quite drowned Nero's, the emperor, transported with rage, caused him to be strangled on the stage in the sight of all Greece. No wonder that his art every-where triumphed; when it was backed by so much cruelty. Loaded with the crowns and prizes he had won, he went to consult the oracle at Delphos, and was warned by the pretended deity of the place, To beware of seventy-three, which, not reflecting on Galba's age, he imagined to be the term of his life, and conceived so great assurance of his living and enjoying an uninterrupted happiness till that age, that having soon after lost many things of great value by shipwreck, he confidently told his friends, that the very fish would bring them again; nay, he was so possessed with this notion, that two years after, when the first tidings were brought him of the insurrections in several provinces, he was so far from being alarmed, that he seemed rather to rejoice at those disturbances, since they furnished him with a plausible pretence of seizing the estates of the inhabitants. The pythoness he presented with a large sum, which Galba not long after obliged her to pay back. Thus Dion Cassius and Suetonius; but Lucianus Samosatensis, Themistius, Themistius^a, and the emperor Julian, surnamed the apostate^b, assure us, that the pythonefs reviled him as an Orestes, an Alcmæon, two parricides who had murdered their mothers, without deigning to return him any further answer; which so provoked him, that he caused all the issues from the oracle to be stopt up; commanded several persons to be murdered in the temple, in order to profane it; stripped Apollo, or rather his priests, of the lands he posselt at Cyrrha, in the neighbourhood of Delphos; and carried away with him five hundred statues of brass, which no tyrant before him had offered to remove. We are told, that, as he departed, Apollo snatched the crown from off his head, signifying thereby, as was afterwards interpreted, that he was not to wear it long^c. He declined visiting Athens, which city was said to be haunted by the furies, and likewise Lacedæmon, abhorring the very name of Lycurgus^d and his laws^e. This year, Cestius Gallus, governor of Syria, being defeated on the eighth of November by the Jews, after he had raised the siege of Jerusalem, acquainted Nero with his overthrow; who thereupon appointed Mucianus governor of Syria in his room, and named Flavius Vespasianus to the command of the troops in that province, though he had not long before forbid him his presence, and threatened him with destruction, for having nodded while the emperor was singing on the stage^f.

BEFORE he left Greece, he undertook to cut the Isthmus, in order to open a communication between the Ionian and Ægean seas, and by that means prevent the frequent wrecks that happened on the coast of Peloponnesus. As the isthmus, or neck of land which parts the two seas, is scarce six miles over, Julius Cæsar, Caligula,^g and Claudius, had formed the same design; but dropt it, as we are told, upon their being assured, that by their undertaking, if it succeeded, whole countries would be drowned, by reason that the Ionian sea was much higher than the Ægean. Besides, at the first breaking of the earth, blood was said to have issued, groans to have been heard, and frightful spectres seen^h. But Nero, not crediting such reports, and always ready to attempt what was generally deemed impossible, assembled his prætorian guards, encouraged them with large promises to undertake the work cheerfully, and having solemnly prayed that the design might turn to his advantage, and to the advantage of the commonwealth, without so much as mentioning the senate, he ordered the trumpets to sound, and advanced at the head of his guards,^d singing and dancing, to the place where the work was to begin. There, with a golden pick-ax, which the governor of the province presented to him, he pretended to set an example to others; but being tired after three strokes, he carried away in a basket the handful of earth he had moved, and posted away to Corinth, as proud as if he had undergone the labours of Hercules. He ordered the prisoners from all parts to be transported into Greece, and such as were convicted, whatever their crimes were, to be condemned only to this work^e. Vespasian sent him six thousand Jews, whom he had already taken prisoners. These were, according to Josephus, employed in the laborious work of hewing the rocks, while the prætorian guards only removed the rubbishⁱ. But either the insurmountable difficulties that occurred, or the troubles, which began to break out, or were apprehended, about this time, obliged Nero to drop the enterprize, though he was with such ardor and eagerness bent upon the execution of it, that he had rather have renounced the harp for ever, than seen his favourite project thus defeated^j.

THE following year, L. Capito and C. Rufus being consuls, Nero, continuing still in Greece, and wanting money to supply his prodigality and defray his exorbitant expences, plundered first the province of Achaia, putting, under various pretences, such of the Greeks to death as were thought wealthy, and seizing their estates. From Achaia he extended his rapines to Italy and Rome, where all the riches of the known world centred, injoining Helius, a freedman of the emperor Claudius, whom he had left governor of the city, to seize, under some pretence or other, the estates of all the wealthy citizens, to confiscate their effects, and turn them into money. Nero had taken with him into Achaia, such of the senatorial and equestrian order as were any ways considerable for their birth, virtue, or fortunes, with a design to dispatch them at a distance from Rome, and consequently with more safety and less noise; so that tidings were daily brought to the city of the death of some of her most illustrious

- a illustrious citizens, and orders to Helius to seize their estates. For this year Nero issued an edict, declaring, contrary to the custom which had hitherto obtained, the estates confiscated even of those who anticipated their sentence by a voluntary death. Of the many great men who suffered this year, none was more generally lamented than the brave Domitius Corbulo. He was equal, says Tacitus, in courage, prudence, and experience, to the most renowned commanders of ancient Rome, and at the same time a true pattern of the modesty, virtue, and integrity of the primitive Romans. He was adored on account of his unbounded generosity, beneficence, and good-nature, even by the most inveterate enemies of the Roman name, who would readily have submitted to Rome, had Rome been governed by a Corbulo. Nero, well acquainted with his commendable qualities, honour, and integrity, reposed in him an intire confidence, and invested him with an unlimited power in the east, where he performed those feats, which we have described at length in our history of Armenia. Though he commanded a powerful army, intirely at his devotion, was by all judged the most worthy of the sovereign power in the whole Roman empire, and might have easily seized it, as he was equally adored by Romans and foreigners of every rank and condition; yet he never entertained the least thought of assuming it. This inviolable fidelity to so cruel a tyrant, so worthless a prince, was the only thing, which either Romans or foreigners ever blamed in him. To this Tiridates alluded, when speaking of him to Nero, he told the emperor, that in Corbulo he had an excellent slave. But this year, Nero, having resolved to extirpate virtue from off the face of the earth, wrote a letter to Corbulo, filled with the most tender expressions of friendship imaginable, styling him his father, his benefactor, his only refuge, &c. In the letter he invited him into Greece, pretending an eager desire to see one, to whom he was so highly indebted. Corbulo, judging of the emperor's sincerity from the uprightness of his own heart, immediately set out for Greece. But Nero, the instant he was informed of his arrival at Cenchreæ, the port of Corinth on the side of the Ægean sea, dispatched orders for his immediate execution; which were no sooner communicated to the brave general, than drawing his sword, he plunged it into his breast, saying, that he well deserved to die, no doubt, on account of his credulity and inviolable attachment to so vile a monster¹. Such was the end of the greatest commander and the best man in the whole Roman empire. He was beloved by the emperor, says Dion Cassius, for his unshaken fidelity; but hated for his virtue, of all crimes the greatest. He left behind him an account of his wars and other transactions in the east, which are frequently quoted by Pliny, but have not reached our times^m. The same year, Annæus Cornutus, one of the most learned men in Rome, was banished and confined to a desert island, for no other crime, but the study of philosophy and profession of virtue. The famous poets Lucan and Persius had been his disciples; for he took great pleasure in instructing the Roman youth in the principles of the philosophy of the Stoics, of which sect he was himself. Persius had a great veneration and esteem for him; whence he left him by his last will, for he died in the ninth year of Nero's reign, seven hundred volumes, and a considerable sum of money, which he restored to the heirs of the deceased, being satisfied with the books. He is said to have advised Persius's mother to suppress some poetical compositions, which her son had wrote in his youthⁿ (S). Nero, upon his leaving Rome, had committed the government of the city,

(S) Dion Cassius tells us (35), that Nero having a mind to write the Roman history in verse from the foundation of the city to his own time, for he had some genius for poetry, and being told, that he could not comprise it in fewer than four hundred books, consulted Cornutus upon that subject, who answered, that the number of books was too great, and that no one would read them. This Nero did not relent, believing Cornutus only meant, that no one would read them on account of their number. But one urging, that the books of Chrysippus were more numerous, and yet generally read, The books of Chrysippus, replied Cornutus, contain many useful precepts, which serve to improve both our manners and understanding. This answer provoked Nero to such a degree, that he was for having him immediately put to death; but, several of Cornutus's friends and disciples interposing in his behalf, he was only banished. Aulus Gellius quotes certain comments upon Virgil done by Annæus Cornutus, whom he styles an illustrious and learned grammarian (36), and likewise his second book upon the figures of rhetoric (37). Macrobius too speaks of Annæus Cornutus as a man well skilled in the Greek tongue. The treatise of the theology of the Greeks, which has reached our times, and passes under the name of Phormutus, is by Theodoret and others city, as we have hinted above, to Helius, a freedman of the late emperor, investing him with an absolute power over all persons, senators not excepted, whom he was allowed to banish, condemn, and execute, without so much as acquainting the emperor with the crimes laid to their charge, or waiting for his consent. And truly Helius, assisted by Polycletus, another freedman, made no less dreadful havock of the Roman nobility at Rome, than his master did in Achaia. Virtue, quality, or wealth were unpardonable crimes, and punished with death. Few noble families escaped the cruelty of the emperor, or the imperial freedman. The latter, more cruel, if possible, than Nero himself, cut off the nearest relations, and even the children of those he condemned; which alarmed the city to such a degree, that a general insurrection was apprehended. Hereupon Helius dispatched messengers after messengers to the emperor, representing to him the state of affairs, and pressing him to return to the capital with all possible expedition. As Nero put off his departure from day to day, and returned no other answer to Helius, than that if he truly loved him, he could not envy him the glory he was daily acquiring in Greece; but would rather wish, that Nero might return worthy of himself; the freedman left Rome unexpectedly, and arriving in seven days in Greece, so terrified the emperor with the exaggerated account he gave him of the general discontent that reigned in the city, that he immediately left Greece, where he had stayed at least a year, and imbarqued for Italy. In his passage his fleet was dispersed by a violent storm, the ships, laden with all the wealth of Greece, cast away, and he himself in imminent danger of being lost with them. But with much ado he escaped, and upon his landing caused many of his numerous retinue to be inhumanly massacred, for having imprudently betrayed joy while he was in danger of perishing. He entered Naples through a breach in the wall, according to the custom of the victors in the Olympic games, and in the same manner Antium, Albanum, and Rome. He made his entry into the latter city in the triumphal chariot of Augustus, pompously attired, having with him in the same chariot another player upon the harp, by name Diodorus, wearing an Olympic crown on his head, and carrying a Pythic crown in his hand. Before him marched in great pomp and richly dressed, eighteen hundred persons, each of them with a crown in his hand, and under it an inscription, signifying where it had been won, the name of the person whom the emperor had overcome, the subject and title of the song, and such-like important circumstances. His chariot was followed by the whole rabble of the city, crying out by way of derision, that they were the soldiers of Augustus, and claimed a share in the glory of the triumphant victor. From the via sacra the procession turned to the circus, which Nero entered through a breach, having caused one of the arches to be thrown down. Thence they proceeded through the Velabrum and the forum to the palace, and from the palace to the temple of Apollo, where he displayed all his crowns, and ordered them to be carried from thence to his golden house, and there hung up round his bed, upon the many statues which he had erected to himself in the habit and attire of a harper. The remaining part of the year he spent in playing upon the harp, singing, and acting upon the stage, no one of the nobility daring to absent themselves, upon any pretence whatsoever, from his theatrical representations, though they often lasted, not only the whole day, but the night too. We are told, that he personated with great art Canace in labour, Orestes murdering his mother, Ædipus pulling out his own eyes, and Hercules phrenetic; in which last representation a raw soldier, then upon guard, seeing the emperor bound in chains, as the argument required, and supposing it real violence, ran in, sword in hand, to his relief, and cleared the stage, which did not a little divert the weary and tired out multitude. While he was acting in a tragedy, the battoon happening to fall out of his hand, he betrayed such concern, and fear of forfeiting the reputation of an able others ascribed to Cornutus. From this work Porphyrius pretends, that Origen learnt to explain the scripture by allegories (38). It is certain, that Origen often makes use of the writings of Cornutus to prove the tenets of the Christian religion (39). But whether this be the Annæus Cornutus, who was banished by Nero, is much questioned by the critics (40). Suidas likewise mentions a philosopher, named Cornutus, and born at Leptis in Libya, who, according to him, came to Rome before the reign of Nero, and wrote several philosophical tracts. This we take to be the Annæus Cornutus mentioned by Dion Cassius; but Suidas is mistaken in supposing him to have been put to death by Nero.

a able actor, that he could not pursue his part, till one of his fellow actors assured him upon his oath, that not one of the audience had taken the least notice of so small a fault, and merely casual. To preserve his voice, he used to lie constantly on his back, with a thin plate of lead upon his stomach, took frequently vomitory and purging potions, and abstained from all sorts of fruit, and meats reputed prejudicial to his voice: nay, he gave over at length, through fear of hurting his voice, making speeches to the soldiery or senate, contenting himself to signify his pleasure to them in writing, or by the mouth of some of his friends or freedmen. After his return from Greece, he established a new employment, charging one, whom he called, with a name borrowed from the Greek tongue, his phonasus, to take care of his voice. He would never speak but in the presence of this new officer, who was first to admonish him, when he talked too loud, or strained his voice, and afterwards, if the emperor, transported with any sudden emotion, did not hearken to his admonitions, to stop his mouth with a napkin. The most effectual means of courting his favour was to commend his voice, to pretend raptures while he sung, to appear dejected, and be very importunate, if he took a fancy, as he sometimes did, like other singers, not to do what he was most ardently desirous of doing^p. Thus he trifled away his time, not forbearing, however, in the midst of diversion and pleasures, to pursue feats of cruelty and blood, till the next year, the fourteenth of his reign, when a bloody doom overtook at length this man of blood. Either this, or the preceding, year, a conspiracy was formed against him by Vinicius, and discovered at Beneventum; and this is all we find concerning it in the histories of those times, which have reached ours. Of this conspiracy, Plutarch, we conjecture, speaks in his treatise of talkativeness, where he tells, that a plot formed against Nero was discovered in the following manner, when it was ripe for execution: One of the conspirators, seeing a prisoner dragged to Nero's tribunal, accosted him, as he was bewailing his misfortune, and whispered him in the ear, If by the favour of the gods you escape to-day, you will be to-morrow indebted to me for your safety. The prisoner understood him, and as he was chiefly solicitous about averting his own doom, he immediately acquainted Nero with what had been told him. Hereupon the conspirator was forthwith seized, and being put upon the rack, owned the conspiracy and discovered his associates^q. Of this conspiracy we find no further account in the ancients, which makes us the more sensible of the irreparable loss we have suffered by the chasm in this part of Tacitus's annals.

He takes particular care of his voice.

A conspiracy discovered.

THE next consuls were Silius Italicus, the celebrated poet, and Galerius Trachalus^r. These were the last consuls named by Nero. Pliny, in one of his letters^s, gives us a succinct account of the life and death of Silius, for he died in the reign of Trajan; and tells us, that under Nero he accused, not by constraint, but choice, several persons of great distinction, and procured their destruction; but adds, that under the succeeding emperors he led a life free from all blemish. We shall have occasion to speak of him in the reign of Domitian, when he wrote his poem on the Punic war. Trachalus was an orator and civilian of great note^t, and nearly related to Galeria, the wife of Vitellius, who saved his life, as we shall relate hereafter. This year, Nero, after having long wallowed in the blood of human race, and made spoil, we may say, of the creation, was at length overtaken by the bloody doom, which his enormous and crying iniquities well deserved. His raging fury had quite tired out and exhausted the patience both of Romans and foreigners, who were equally disposed to a general revolution, and only wanted a person of credit and experience to head them. The first, who had courage enough openly to declare his generous resolution of redeeming the world, from the no less ignominious than tyrannical yoke, under which it had now groaned for thirteen years and upwards, was Julius Vindex, descended from the ancient kings of Aquitain, and at this time governor of Celtic Gaul. He was a true lover of his country, had on several occasions signalized his courage, prudence, and experience in the military art, bore an utter aversion to slavery, and was possessed with an ardent ambition of transmitting his name to posterity by some commendable action^u. We are told, that before he openly declared his design, he communicated it to Galba, then governor of Hispania Tarraconensis, who neither countenanced nor discovered it to Nero, as did several of the governors of other provinces, provinces, to whom Vindex had imparted it by letters, which they immediately sent a to Nero ^w. Philostratus, in his life of Apollonius Tyaneus, writes, that the governor of Bætica, now Andalusia, coming to Gades, or Cadiz, to visit Apollonius, conferred with him in private for three days together; and that it was afterwards believed, that Apollonius had encouraged the governor to revolt from Nero and join Vindex, whose design was not yet publicly known ^x. Whether Philostratus speaks here of Galba, or of some other, we know not. Galba indeed was not governor of Bætica; but in Philostratus such mistakes frequently occur. Though Galba did not at first shew himself inclined to favour the revolt, yet the brave Vindex, having about the beginning of March, assembled the Gauls, harassed and reduced to beggary, by heavy tributes and impositions, openly declared to them his design, encouraged them to concur b cheerfully in his measures, and in a long speech displayed their many grievances, from which he said there were no hopes of relief, so long as their tyrannical and cruel oppressor lived or reigned. His design was universally applauded by the Gauls, who immediately flocked to him from all parts; insomuch, that though he had no Roman troops under his command, yet he found himself in a short time at the head of a hundred thousand armed men. Hereupon he wrote once more to Galba, exhorting him to espouse the common cause of mankind, and put himself at the head of the Gauls, who were already a body of a hundred thousand armed men, and could, upon occasion, raise a greater force. At the same time arrived an express from the governor of Aquitain, demanding succours against Vindex. Upon the receipt of these important dispatches, Galba called a council of his friends to advise with them, before he returned an answer to either of the messengers. In the council they were almost all c of opinion, that he ought to wait, and see how Rome stood inclined before he declared. But Titus Vinius, tribune of the only legion in the province, standing up, “What room, said he, is there here for deliberation? It is a crime even to question, whether or “no we shall continue faithful to Nero, and as such it will be punished by him. There “is no medium; you must either hearken to the overture of Vindex, and look on Nero “as your declared enemy, or march this instant against a person, who had rather have “Galba for emperor than Nero.” This speech made a deep impression upon the mind of Galba, who was likewise animated by several favourable omens, and above all by a d prediction, which was uttered about this time by a young virgin of great distinction in Spain, and answered exactly another, which had been delivered two hundred years before, viz. that Spain should one day give a prince to Rome, and to the world a sovereign. He therefore hesitated no longer; but by an edict appointed a certain day for the Spaniards to meet at New Carthage, now Carthagena. The Spaniards, who had heard of the revolt in Gaul and suspected his design, obeyed the summons with great alacrity; for they abhorred the very name of Nero, and flocked from all quarters to Carthagena, where Galba, ascending the tribunal, round which were placed the images of several illustrious persons, whom Nero had caused to be inhumanly massacred, openly declared his design in the following speech: “Fellow-soldiers and friends, we are assembled to bestow on mankind the great benefit of liberty and freedom, a benefit, “which indeed is our birth-right, though we have not these many years been allowed “to taste the sweets of it. For what slave has endured greater hardships, has suffered a “more cruel servitude, than we under the inhuman tyrant, whom the evil fortune of the “Roman empire had placed over us? What kind of extortions has he not used to supply, “with rapine and injustice, what he has spent, with ignominy and shame? What kind “of cruelty has he not practised? Has he not wallowed in the blood of his father, his “brother, his mother, his wife, his instructor, and of all, who, in the senate, city, or “provinces, were any-ways considerable for their birth, wealth, courage, or virtue, “without distinction of sex or age? The blood of so many innocent victims cries aloud f “for vengeance.  “ of emperor or Augustus, which sacred names I adore” --- Here he was interrupted by the loud shouts, and joyful acclamations of the numerous assembly, saluting him with one voice, emperor and Augustus. But Galba, declining these specious titles, declared, He declines

 b before Galba’s death, and consequently on the third of April; for he was assassinated on the fifteenth of January of the following year. After this Galba ordered levies to be made throughout the whole province; selected a certain number of persons of known prudence and experience, and with them formed a kind of senate; appointed a band of young knights, whom he called evocati, to be as a guard at the door of his chamber; and caused edicts to be fixed up in every city of the province, inviting all to join him, and lend what assistance they could towards the recovery of their liberty, and the success of an enterprise, which so nearly concerned them. We are told, that as he was fortifying a town, which he designed for a place of arms, a ring was found of great antiquity, on the stone whereof was engraved a Victory; and c that about the same time a ship from Alexandria came into the port of Dertosa or Tortosa, laden with arms, without either pilot, mariners, or passengers. Otho, who still governed Lusitania, was the first of all the governors of provinces who declared for Galba, sending him all his gold and silver plate to turn it into money, and likewise his domestics, who were more accustomed to a court, and knew better than Galba’s how to serve an emperor.^a eight days together, without issuing any orders for suppressing the revolt, or even writing or speaking to any one about it: he was only once heard to say, upon receiving letters of a fresher date, exaggerating the impending danger, that he would make Vindex and the Gauls pay dear for disturbing his pleasures. At length the edicts of Vindex, filled with most bitter invectives, roused him so far as to prompt him to write to the senate, recommending to the fathers the revenging of the injuries offered to him, and in him to them and the whole republic, and excusing his absence with the pretence of an inflammation in his throat. But he resented nothing so much as Vindex’s calling him in one of his edicts an unskilful harper, and Abenobarbus instead of Nero. What he imputation affected him still more; he could not bear it: but in the transports of his passion broke out into bitter invectives against Vindex, abusing him as one intirely ignorant of an art, which he had, with his own industry and indefatigable pains, refined and brought to the greatest perfection: to refute this calumny, he played more frequently than ever, observing with great attention the countenances of the spectators, and asking them whether they had ever heard or known a more skilful player upon the harp than himself? But, the alarm increasing, and messenger after messenger arriving with dismal accounts, he at length left Naples in a great fright, and f repaired to Rome. However, his fear was greatly abated by his observing on the road a tomb, on which was engraved a Gaul overcome by a Roman knight, who dragged him on the ground by the hair. This frivolous presage so revived him, that he returned thanks to the gods for such an auspicious omén. Upon his arrival in the city, instead of assembling the senate or people, he only summoned some of the principal men to his palace, and after a short consultation, in which no resolution was taken, he spent the rest of the day in shewing his counsellors certain musical instruments His unconcern

manship of each of them, promising to produce them, ere it was long, upon the stage, ^a provided Vindex would give him leave. The following night he sent in haste for the chief men of the senatorial and equestrian order, who immediately flew to the palace, not doubting, but the emperor designed to advise with them in the present most urging juncture, and come to some speedy resolution. But they were greatly surprised to find, that they had been summoned in the dead of the night to be entertained with a farther account of the instruments, which had been shewn them the day before, and some new improvements, which had since occurred to Nero^b. However, he wrote a letter to the senate, complaining of Vindex, set a price upon his head, called back the troops that were on their march towards Albania, and ordered the legions in Illyricum to be ^b forthwith transported into Italy. We are told, that when news was brought to Vindex, that Nero had promised ten millions of sesterces to any one who should bring him his head, he answered with great calmness, Whoever shall bring Nero's head to me, shall, if he pleases, have mine in exchange. Nero seemed to despise Vindex, and to be under no apprehension of the Gauls; but intelligence being brought him of the revolt of Galba, just as he was sitting down to supper, he was so struck with it, that he remained a long time motionless, without being able to utter a single word; and when he came to himself again, he overturned in a violent rage the table, tore his garments, broke in pieces two cups of great value, and dashing his head against the wall, cried out, he was undone; his misfortunes were without example; his empire was seized, while he was still alive, and become the prey of an usurper. ^c However, he could not, even in the height of his consternation and fear, refrain from his usual debaucheries; but pursued his former course of life, feasting, revelling, and, upon his receiving news out of the provinces that seemed any-ways favourable to his affairs, jesting and ridiculing the heads of the rebellion. He even appeared in the theatre, and because one of the actors performed his part so as to deserve an extraordinary applause, he sent him word, that he invaded the rights of the emperor^c. In the mean time, the senate, out of fear and flattery, declared Galba a traitor and an enemy to the state; whereupon Nero immediately seized his estate, and commanded it to be put up to auction; which Galba no sooner understood, than he in his turn exposed ^d to sale Nero's estate in Spain, and found a great number of purchasers^d. This enraged Nero to such a degree, that, in the first transports of his fury, he resolved to send persons into all the provinces to murder the governors and commanders of the armies, under pretence of their being privy to the conspiracy, to order all the exiles to be massacred, lest they should join the revolters, to cut the throats of all the Gauls in Rome, as accomplices and favourers of their countrymen, to poison the whole senate at an entertainment, to set fire to the city, and at the same time let loose the wild beasts kept for the public spectacles, that the people being thus diverted from extinguishing the flames, their destruction, and the destruction of the city, might be the more inevitable. But dropping, upon farther thoughts, these barbarous designs, not ^e out of remorse, but despair of effecting them, he resolved to march in person against the rebels; and deposing the two consuls, Silius and Trachalus, entered alone upon the consulship, pretending an ancient prediction, importing, that when Rome had but one consul, by him the Gauls should be overcome. Having therefore assumed the fasces and other marks of the consular dignity, he ordered levies to be made throughout Italy, named the officers who were to command under him, and caused an immense number of waggons to be got ready for conveying with safety, not the engines of war, but his musical instruments and the decorations of the stage; for ^f he was so mean-spirited as to declare to his intimate friends, that he did not intend to try his fortune with the rebels in the field, but upon his arrival in the province, to present himself without arms before the armies, to weep, and with sighs and tears beg forgiveness of his former conduct; which if, touched with compassion, they should grant him, as he hoped they would, he designed to engage and fix their affections, by diverting them with plays and songs of triumph, which, he said, it was high time for him to begin to compose. That he had no design of facing the enemy in the field was manifest from his other preparations; for he ordered all the players upon instruments, singers, and actors to attend him; and arming his concubines, like Amazons, with battle-axes and shields, appointed them to guard his person^e.

IN the mean time, Galba's party gained daily new strength, all the governors of the provinces declaring for him, except Clodius Macer, who commanded in Africa, and L. Rufus Verginius, or Virginus, governor of Upper Germany, where he had under his command some of the best legions in the whole empire. The latter even marched against Vindex with all his forces, and being joined by the inhabitants of Treves, capital of Belgic Gaul, and powerfully assisted in Celtic Gaul itself by the cities of Langres and Lions, he advanced as far as the city of Besançon, which he besieged. Upon this intelligence, Vindex hastened to the relief of the place; but upon his arrival, Virginus desiring an interview with him, the two generals had a private conference, in which they agreed, as was commonly believed, to act against Nero; but Verginius could not by any means be prevailed upon to declare for Galba. After they had long conferred together, Vindex returned to his troops, and with them advanced to Besançon, in order to take possession of the place, pursuant to the private agreement of the two chiefs. But Verginius's men, believing that Vindex designed to attack them, marched out without their general's orders, fell upon the Gauls, who expected nothing less and were quite unprepared for an engagement, and with great slaughter put them to flight. Thus Dion Cassius^f; but Plutarch tells us, that the two armies engaged in defiance of the orders of their commanders, who did all that lay in their power to divert them from that wild resolution. Be that as it will, it is agreed on all hands, that the two armies engaged, that twenty thousand Gauls were killed upon the spot, and that Vindex after the battle laid violent hands on himself. After the death of Vindex, the victorious legions tore the images of Nero, and importuned Verginius to accept the empire, saluting him Cæsar, emperor, Augustus, &c. Verginius was descended of an equestrian family; but had on many occasions signalized his prudence, valour, equity, and such virtues and endowments as are requisite in a brave commander and excellent citizen^h. Dion Cassius assures us, that he might have easily seized on the empire, had he but seconded the ardent wishes of the troops under his command. But, either out of a greatness of soul truly heroic, or a lively apprehension of the evil consequences, which would inevitably accrue from allowing the soldiery to chuse the emperor, he not only rejected their offer, but resolutely declared, that he would neither take upon himself the sovereign power, nor suffer any one else to assume it, who was not named to it by the senate, to whom alone the disposal of the empire belonged. The same answer he returned to the soldiery, when, upon the news of Nero's death, they importuned him anew to accept of the empire^k. This refusal says Dion, gained him higher renown than the empire itself could have done, and filled the world with the fame of his name^l. He lived thirty years after this glorious and generous action, revered by all men; and having escaped the fury of so many princes, by whom he was both suspected and hated on account of his virtue, he died at length under Nerva, being then consul for the third time, in the eighty-third year of his age and ninety-seventh of the Christian æra. Tacitus tells us, that, in the following troubles and seditions, no one was exposed to greater dangers, no one so often threatened and assaulted by the soldiery as he; for though they admired his magnanimity, till then without example, yet they hated him, as having despised them by refusing the empire. In how great esteem he was held by the good princes, we may judge from the opinion which Vitellius entertained of him; a prince suspicious, distrustful, and open to every alarm. For though a slave of Verginius was charged as one employed to assassinate the emperor, though the soldiers had, upon the death of Otho, declared for him the third time, yet Vitellius never seemed in the least to question his fidelity^m. Before he died, he ordered an epitaph, composed by himself, to be engraved on his tomb, importing, that he had overcome Vindex, and thereby acquired the empire to his country, not to himself. Cluvius Rufus, who wrote the history of those times, begging him one day to excuse him, if the laws of history obliged him to relate something that he might not like, As to my actions and conduct, replied Verginius, I desire you would relate them, such as they are; for I am not conscious to myself of having ever done any thing but with a view to the applauses and approbation of posterityⁿ. This was the only time he was ever heard to speak of his own actions, however great and glorious. Cornelius Tacitus, the celebrated historian, was consul, when he died, and pronounced his funeral oration. Pliny the younger, who had received innumerable favours at his hands, hands, bestows on him the following elogium; No tongue can sufficiently commend a Rufus Verginius, or answer the opinion I entertain of his virtue^b. To resume the thread of our history.

The bad situation of Galba's affairs.

THE death of Vindex and declaration of Verginius not to suffer any one to assume the sovereignty, without the consent of the senate, exceedingly perplexed Galba. Besides, it was reported, that the legions commanded by Verginius, finding they could not persuade their general to accept of the empire, threatened to return to Nero; nay some of Galba's own troops, repenting the new oath they had taken, attempted to abandon him; and certain slaves, whom one of Nero's freedmen had presented him with, formed a conspiracy against him, and would in all likelihood have dispatched him, had they not discovered themselves, by exhorting one another, as Galba was passing through a narrow-street to his baths, not to let slip so favourable an opportunity. The new emperor therefore, in the utmost consternation, wrote to Verginius, earnestly soliciting him to act in concert with himself against Nero, the common enemy of mankind, and to lend a helping hand to the great work of restoring Rome to her ancient liberty. What answer Verginius returned him, we are no-where told; but it seems to have been no-ways favourable to his design, since he retired a few days after with his friends to a city in Spain called Clunia, quite disheartened, repenting what he had done, and ready to lay violent hands on himself^c. In the mean time, at Rome the levies commanded by Nero went on but slowly; for though he summoned all the tribes to take the military oath, yet no one appeared who was fit to bear arms; insomuch, that he was obliged to issue an edict, ordering all masters to send him a certain number of slaves, whom he enfranchised and listed among his troops. He likewise obliged persons of every rank and profession to contribute the greatest part of their yearly income towards the intended expedition, according as they were rated in the books of the censors. These heavy impositions, together with his foolish and unseasonable niceness, for he would receive no money but what was new coined, incensed the people to such a degree, that they openly opposed the collectors, telling them, that the best and most ready means of supplying the prince with money, was to oblige the informers to refund the immense sums they had earned with their infamous practices^d. As a famine began to be felt in the city, the fury of the populace was heightened by the arrival of a ship from Egypt, at that time the granary of Rome, laden not with corn, at was expected, but with sand for the gladiators and wrestlers. Upon this the people rose in a tumultuous manner, overturned in the night most of the emperor's statues, tore his images, plundered the houses of his friends and favourites, and committed innumerable disorders, no one offering to appease or restrain them. At the same time, news arrived of the revolt of the legions in Germany, which so affected Nero, that calling for poison, he inclosed it in a golden box, and went immediately into the Servilian gardens, whence he dispatched the freed-men, in whom he chiefly confided, to Ostia to prepare his fleet, being resolved to sail to Egypt, whither he had already sent some German troops. He was prompted to this resolution by the predictions of some astrologers, who had foretold him long before, that he would one day be abandoned by all; but at the same time assured him, that in the end he would obtain the empire of the east, or the kingdom of Jerusalem. However, before he left the palace, he sounded the tribunes and centurions of his guards, asking them whether they were disposed to accompany him in his flight? But some of them shifting, others positively refusing to attend him, and one of them crying out, Usque ad eone mori miserum est? Is it so sad a thing to die? he was quite distracted and confounded in his thoughts; resolving at one time to fly to the Parthians, at another to address Galba as a suppliant, to appear in public clad in deep mourning, and, with all possible humility and dejection, implore the forgiveness of the people for his former conduct; and, if he found them inflexible, to beg the government of Egypt. To this purpose an oration was found after his death among the rest of his papers; but he was deterred from delivering it by an apprehension of his being torn in pieces by the outrageous multitude, before he could reach the rostra. He therefore put off the taking of any resolution till the next day; and in the mean time his ruin was completed by one, whom he least of all suspected, Nymphidius Sabinus, who, though of a mean descent, had been by Nero upon the death of Fenius Rufus appointed colleague of Tigellinus in the command of the prætorian guards, and now entertained thoughts of seize-

a ing the sovereignty for himself. However, he did not immediately declare his ambitious views ; but, pretending to espouse the cause of Galba, assured the guards, that Nero was fled, and promised them in Galba's name such sums, as neither Galba nor any other was able to discharge. This promise secured for the present the empire to Galba, occasioned afterwards the loss of it, and in the end produced the destruction of Nymphidius and the guards themselves. For the soldiery, thus deceived and tempted with the mighty promises of Nymphidius, abandoned Nero, notwithstanding their long and sworn fealty to the house of the Cæsars, and proclaimed Galba emperor : even Tigellinus, the chief author of the crimes that rendered Nero's name so odious and detestable, forsook and betrayed him in his extremity. The emperor, altogether unacquainted with the treasonable practices of Tigellinus, awaked about midnight ; and understanding, to his unspeakable surprize, that his guards were retired, he leapt out of his bed, sent in great haste for his friends, and none of them obeying the summons, went at last in person, attended by a few domestics, to their several houses ; but finding the doors every-where shut, and no one deigning even to return an answer to his prayers and intreaties, he hastened back to his chamber, which he found rifled and stript even to the coverings of his bed. The golden box, in which he kept the poison prepared by the famous Locusta, being likewise carried off, he sent for Spicillus, a celebrated gladiator, to dispatch him ; but neither he, nor any other being found who would undertake that task, he cried out in a fit of despair, What !

b have I in this forlorn condition neither friends nor enemies ? Which words he had scarce uttered, when he left his room in a great hurry with a design to throw himself into the Tiber ; but changing his mind, he stopt all on a sudden, and desired some private place to recollect himself and resume his courage. Hereupon Phaon, one of his freedmen, offered him his country-house, which stood between the Salarian and Numentan roads, about four miles from the city. He accepted the offer, and, without further delay, attended by four persons, of whom Sporus was one, left Rome meanly apparelled and worse mounted, hiding his face, through fear of being discovered, with a handkerchief. Upon his setting out, he was terrified and dismayed by dreadful flashes of lightning, and a violent earthquake, as if the ghosts of the many persons

c he had murdered were rising up, says Dion, against the unmerciful tyrant. As he passed by the camp of the prætorian guards, he heard them cursing him, and wishing prosperity and success to Galba. A passenger, whom he met on the road, in seeing him and his attendants, These, said he, are no doubt in pursuit of Nero ; another asked him, What news of Nero in the city ? His horse starting at the sight of a carcass that lay in the way, the covering of his face was shaken off, and he known by a soldier of the prætorian guards, named Missicius, who saluted him with the title of emperor ; which so alarmed Nero and his attendants, that at the first turning they quitted their horses, and, betaking themselves to a narrow path, crept with much difficulty through bushes and briars to the wall, which inclosed Phaon's grounds, who intreated the emperor to conceal himself in a sand-pit, till he found means of conveying him in with more secrecy : but Nero answered, that he would not be buried till he was dead ; and lay concealed among the briars, while Phaon, examining the wall, was considering how he might introduce him undiscovered. In the mean time, Nero, being prest with drought, took up water out of a ditch with his hands, saying, To this liquor is Nero reduced : he likewise cleared with his own hands his garments of the briars that had stuck to them. In order to procure a more private access for him to the house, a hole was opened in the wall, through which he was dragged, and conveyed into a room very indifferently furnished, where he passed the remainder of the night and part of the following day, in such agonies as can hardly be expressed,

d alarmed at the least noise he heard, as if assassins were come to murder him, and not daring to speak through fear of being discovered. He now repented the many crimes he had committed, wished he had pursued a quite different conduct, was sensible, that those, who had put him upon the measures he had followed, were his greatest enemies ; and had constantly in his mouth the following words, taken out of a tragedy, entitled, Œdipus banished, the last in which he had acted ; My father, mother, and wife, doom me to destruction^c. As those who attended him were constantly soliciting and importuning him to prevent with a voluntary death the dangers that threatened him, he at last ordered his grave to be dug, and wood and water to be the senate an enemy to the state, and condemned to die.*

THE news of Nero's flight filled the city with joy; the senate assembled early in the morning and proclaimed Galba emperor; and, having taken the usual oaths to him, declared Nero an enemy to the state, and doomed him to be punished more majorum. One of Phaon's friends immediately dispatched a messenger to him with a letter, acquainting him with the transactions of the senate. As soon as the messenger appeared, Nero snatched the letter out of his hand; and finding by it, that he was declared an enemy to the state, and doomed to be punished more majorum, he asked, what kind of punishment that was? Phaon told him, that, pursuant to the sentence of the senate, he was to be stript naked, his head was to be fastened in a pillory, and he in that posture to be whipt to death; which so terrified him, that he snatched up two daggers, which he always carried about with him, as if he were determined to anticipate in that instant the execution of so cruel a sentence by a voluntary death; but, after trying their points with a trembling hand, he put them up again, saying, that his fatal hour was not yet come: then turning to Sporus, he desired him to begin his complaints and lamentations, since the fatal moment approached. He betrayed such meanness as to desire with many tears, that some of his attendants would by their example encourage him to die with resolution and intrepidity. But none of them shewing the least inclination to animate him at the expence of their own lives, he strove to raise his drooping spirits with the following words; Courage, Nero, courage; such pusillanimity in an emperor is base and dishonourable; the pains of death are but short and momentary; strike boldly, &c. Thus he continued animating himself, but to no effect; till hearing the noise of some horsemen, sent by the senate to seize him and bring him alive to Rome, he cried out in a Greek verse, A dismal noise of horses sounds in my ears; and drawing one of his daggers, he put it to his throat; but his heart failing him, he begged Epaphroditus his freedman and secretary to lend him his assistance; which he did with great reluctance, and paid dear for it, being afterwards put to death by Domitian, for imbruing his hands in the blood of the Cæsars. Before he was quite dead, the centurion, sent by the senate to apprehend him, entered the room, and, pretending he was come to his relief, endeavoured to stop the blood: Nero gave him no other answer, but, 'Tis too late: Is this your fidelity and allegiance? With which words he expired, his eyes staring in a frightful manner, and ready to start out of his head, to the great terror and amazement of all who were present^g.

Roman people.*

Upon the first rumour of his death, one of Galba's freedmen, not trusting to common report, flew to the place where his body lay, and having with his own eyes beheld the lifeless carcass extended on the ground, and all covered with gore, hastened away to Spain with the important tidings^h. Many others, prompted by the like curiosity, flocked to Phaon's country-house; so that his death being no longer questioned, the joy of the Roman people was so great and universal, that they ran up and down the streets, with such caps on their heads as were worn by manumitted slaves, congratulating one another upon their deliverance from so hard a bondage, overturned and dashed in pieces most of Nero's statues, knocked out the brains of as many of his friends as fell into their hands, &c. Amongst others they fastened the gladiator Spicillus to one of Nero's statues, which they dragged along the streets, and crushed the unhappy favourite to pieces: they laid a famous informer, named Aponius, flat on the ground, and drove carts heavy laden with stones over him. Many others were seized by the outrageous and undistinguishing multitude, and by them torn in pieces, though they had no share in Nero's crimes: insomuch, that Mauriscus, who was deservedly esteemed one of the best men in the city, declared in full senate, that he was afraid they should soon have cause to wish for *Nero*ⁱ. Such was the miserable end of Nero, the sixth emperor of Rome, who by his unheard-of iniquities well deserved all the misfortunes which befel him. He died in the thirty-first year of his age, after having reigned thirteen years and eight months complete, according to some, or eight months wanting two days, according to others: for St. Jerom, Eusebius^k, and Zonaras^l place his death on the eleventh of June; whereas the learned archbishop Usher, father Pagi, and cardinal Noris alledge strong arguments to prove, that he died on the ninth of the said month. a inlarge on his character, since the name of Nero is by most nations made use of emphatically to express a barbarous, raging, and abandoned tyrant. Pliny calls him the common enemy and fury of mankind^m, and most writers propose him as the pattern of a complete tyrant; and truly his whole life seems to have been a constant struggle, to shew how abandonedly wicked, how execrably bad a human creature can be, when vested with great power. The only thing he earnestly commended to his attendants before he died was, that his head might not be cut off, but his body burnt intire. His request was readily granted by Icelus, one of Galba's freedmen, who likewise allowed his obsequies to be performed with the usual solemnity. His ashes were carefully gathered, and deposited in the stately monument of the Domitian family, by his concubine Acte, and two other women, who in his infancy had been charged with the care of his education. He was no eloquent speaker, Seneca having diverted him, if Suetonius is to be credited, from perusing the works of the ancient orators, lest he should despise his style and compositions. He had a genius for poetry, and wrote verses with great ease: some indeed accused him as a plagiarist; but from this imputation Suetonius clears him, assuring us, that from the tablets on which he wrote, according to the custom of those times, and which our author narrowly examined, it evidently appeared, that the verses were neither transcribed by him, nor dictated by another, being effaced, interlined, and corrected, as thoughts or expressions occurred to him, which he liked betterⁿ. Though he died generally hated and abhorred, yet the vulgar, abandoned to debauchery and inured to the idle amusements of the theatre and circus, began soon to regret the loss of a prince, by whose infamous vices they subsisted. Hence they flocked to his tomb, adorned it with flowers, carried his images, as it were, in triumph, &c. Vologeses likewise, king of the Parthians, shewed a particular respect for Nero after his death, and by the ambassadors, whom he sent to the senate to renew his alliance with the Roman people, earnestly begged, that the memory of Nero might be revered, and a monument erected to him^o. Some even gave out, that he was not dead, but would soon appear again and take vengeance of his enemies: edicts were publicly hung up as issued by him, and soon after a slave, who greatly resembled him, and was no less skilled in singing and playing upon the harp, attempted to pass himself upon the provinces of Asia and Achaia for the deceased prince; but was seized and executed in the island of Cythrus^p. Several counterfeit Neros appeared afterwards; one especially in the reign of the emperor Domitian, near twenty years after the true Nero was dead, created great disturbances in the east, where he was followed by vast crowds. Artabanes, who then reigned in Parthia, espoused his cause, and sent him powerful succours; but was at length, with much ado, prevailed upon to abandon the impostor, and deliver him up to the Romans^q. But what above all to us seems surprising is, that, towards the end of the third and the beginning of the fourth century, an opinion prevailed in the church, that Nero was to appear again at the end of the world, and either to be himself the antichrist, or to reign in the west and re-establish idolatry there, while the antichrist reigned in the east. This opinion is by Sulpicius Severus ascribed to St. Martin^r. Some believed, that Nero was to be raised from the dead under another name; others, that he did not really die; but, his wound being cured, was conveyed to some private place, where he is to lie concealed, till the time appointed for the appearance of the antichrist. This opinion, which some pretended to prove from the Revelations, is taken notice of by Lactantius^s; but what were his sentiments upon that subject is hard to determine, all the copies of his works being in that place strangely corrupted. It is, however, manifest, that he supposes with Sulpicius Severus, Nero's body never to have been found, notwithstanding the account which both Suetonius and Plutarch give us of his obsequies. St. Austin expresses no small surprize, that such an absurd, and, as he styles it, ridiculous, opinion should have found partizans amongst men of knowledge and learning^t. But what opinion has hitherto been broached, that has not found some zealous profelytes among the learned? The family of the Cæsars, properly speaking, ended in Caligula, who had been adopted by Tiberius; but nevertheless, as Nero was, as well as Claudius, descended from Augustus by his mother Agrippina, the house of the Cæsars is said to have ended in the people, but to lead them astray (74). In the above-mentioned book he disapproved of the Jewish ceremonies; but never once mentioned the christians; which, in the opinion of St. Austin, plainly shews, that he found nothing in their religion but what he judged commendable, though he durst not commend it, through fear of disobliging the prince and the misled multitude. Some letters of his to St. Paul, and of St. Paul to him, were published very early, which St. Austin and St. Jerom seem to have thought genuine; nay, the latter was by them induced to place Seneca among the ecclesiastic writers (75). But these letters are now universally rejected as spurious, and altogether unworthy of St. Paul, and even of Seneca; which inclines us to believe, that the letters, which have been conveyed down to us, are not the same with those which were handed about in the time of St. Austin and St. Jerom. Lipsius is of opinion, that the supposed letters from Seneca to St. Paul, and from St. Paul to Seneca, were written by one and the same impostor (76); and Baronius discovers in them some enormous mistakes (77). And thus much of the writers who flourished under Nero.

C H A P. X.

From the death of Nero, to the death of Vitellius, when the empire became hereditary a second time.

S*ervius Sulpicius Galba*, the seventh emperor, was, by his father, descended from the Sulpician family, one of the most ancient and illustrious in Rome. Sulpicius Galba governed Spain in quality of prætor in the year of Rome 602, and was the chief cause of the war with Viriatius, the celebrated leader of the Lusitanians. He was afterwards created consul; but required greater renown by his eloquence, than by the offices he bore, being reckoned the most eloquent orator of his time. His grandson, Sergius Galba, served with great reputation under Julius Cæsar, and distinguished himself in the Gaulish war; but afterwards, imputing the loss of the consulship to the ill offices of the dictator, he joined Brutus and Cassius, and was on that account condemned by the Pedian law. His son, Servius Galba, was more famous for his studies, than his employments; for he was not advanced above the degree of a prætor, when he published several histories, which are greatly cried up by the ancients. His son, Sergius Galba, married Mummia Achaica, the grand-daughter of the celebrated Q. Lutatius Catulus Capitolinus, and great grand-daughter of L. Mummius, who took and razed Corinth. By her he had two sons, Caius and Servius Sulpicius Galba the emperor. Caius, having in his youth squandered away his estate, led a retired life in the country, till the twenty-second year of Tiberius's reign; when, upon his receiving a letter from that prince, forbidding him to draw his lot for a province, he laid violent hands on himself. Tacitus supposes him to have been consul^u; but Suetonius tells us, that he fell by his own hand, upon his being by Tiberius forbidden to stand for the consulship^w. The emperor was born on the twenty-fourth of December, the fifth year before the common christian æra, that is, the eve of the nativity of our Saviour. His mother, Mummia Achaica, dying while he was yet an infant, his father soon after took to his second wife Livia Ocellina (U), a lady of great quality and wealth. She adopted young Galba, who thereupon took the

(U) Suetonius tells us, that Galba, apprised of the passion which she had conceived for him, called her one day aside, and pulling off his robe, shewed her the imperfections of his shape, for he was strangely distorted; which, instead of lessening, heightened her esteem for him to such a degree, that though she was courted on account of her wealth and beauty by the chief nobility of the city, she constantly declared, that if she could not marry Galba, she would not marry at all (78).

a the name of L. Livius Ocella; which, however, he seems to have retained but a short time. We are told by Suetonius, that while he was one day amongst other noble youths of his own age saluting Augustus, the emperor laying his hand upon his head, And you too, my son, said he, shall one day taste of empire. The same writer adds, that Tiberius, who was greatly addicted to the study of astrology, foresaw the future grandeur of Galba; but at the same time knew, that he was not to attain the sovereign power till he was stricken in years; so that he never betrayed the least uneasiness or concern about his distant promotion*. Livia Augusta, the mother of Tiberius, to whom he was related, shewed a great kindness and esteem for him while she lived, and at her death left him an immense sum of money; which Tiberius never paid

b him, he being without that legacy one of the most wealthy citizens of his time. He was well versed in all the liberal sciences, especially in the civil law. He married Lepida, descended of an illustrious family; but she, and the two sons he had by her, dying, he led ever after a single life, withstanding even the solicitations of Agrippina the mother of Nero, become a widow by the death of Domitius. She had conceived a great passion for him in his wife's life-time; which occasioned a quarrel between her and the mother of Lepida, who publicly upbraided her with her scandalous conduct. He was, by the interest of Livia, preferred to employments before the age required by the laws. During his prætorship he diverted the people at the sports called Floralia, with a new kind of entertainment, viz. elephants walking upon the rope. When his prætorship was expired, he was appointed governor of Aquitain, c and about a year after raised to the consulship, in which office he succeeded L. Domitius, the father of Nero, and was succeeded by Salvius Otho, the father of Otho, who was emperor after him. Caligula named him to the command of the legions in Germany, in the room of Getulicus; which trust he discharged with great reputation, having in a short time restored the ancient discipline, which his predecessor had entirely neglected. Besides, he repulsed with incredible expedition the Germans, who had made an inroad into Gaul; which gained him the favour and esteem of Caligula. Upon the death of that emperor, he was earnestly solicited by many persons of great interest and power, to lay hold of that opportunity, and seize the empire for himself; but he, without hearkening to their proposals, obliged his troops to take the usual oaths to Claudius, who thereupon received him into the number of his most intimate friends, and ever after shewed so great esteem for him, that being upon the point of setting out on his expedition into Britain, he put off his journey for some days, on account of a slight indisposition which seized Galba. Some time after, Africa being strangely harassed with intestine troubles and the invasions of the neighbouring barbarians, he was, without drawing lots according to custom, sent into that province in quality of proconsul, and distinguished himself there even above those, who had gained the greatest reputation in that government. He remained there two years, during which time he restored, with great prudence and necessary

e severity, the province to its former tranquillity. Suetonius tells us, that one of his soldiers having sold, while provisions were very scarce, his allowance of corn for a hundred denarii, the proconsul, to punish his avarice, forbade his comrades to supply him; by which means he was starved. Upon his return from Africa, he was honoured with the triumphal ornaments, and admitted among the Titian priests and the priests of Augustus. From this time to the middle of Nero's reign, that is, the sixtieth year of the christian æra, he led a retired life, dreading to give the tyrant any umbrage. During his retirement, he never stirred out, even to take the air, but attended by a chariot with a vast sum of money in it, that he might not be reduced to want, in case he found it necessary to consult his safety by a sudden flight.

f Thus he lived, till Nero, of his own motion, named him to the government of Hispania Tarraconensis, that prince not having yet learnt, as Plutarch observes, to fear, and exclude from the great employments, men of interest and power. He governed that province for the space of eight years, at first with excessive rigor, of which authors give us several instances: a banker being convicted of fraud in his profession, he ordered both his hands to be cut off and nailed to his counter. He caused a guardian to be crucified for poisoning his ward, whose next heir he was. The criminal urged, that he was a Roman citizen, and, as such, exempted from that ignominious death; upon which Galba commanded, by way of distinction, a white cross to be prepared prepared for him much higher than usual, but would not revoke his former sentence. However, by degrees he abated of his rigor, through fear of giving Nero occasion of jealousy, and abandoned himself, contrary to his inclination, to sloth and idleness, saying, that no man could be called to an account for doing nothing: Nevertheless he took no care to suppress the many bitter lampoons, which were handed about against Nero and sung throughout his province, or to inquire after or punish the authors of them. He could not check the cruelties and extortions practised by the imperial procurators, whose province it was to collect the taxes and other duties belonging to the revenue; but openly shewed a tender concern for the sufferings of the oppressed people, which gained him the hearts of the natives, but provoked the emperor's officers to such a degree, that, at their instigation, Nero had already ordered him to be privately dispatched. But, before these orders could be put in execution, he openly revolted in the manner we have related above^a.

Galba receives the news of Nero's death.

Assumes the title of emperor.

Virginus refuses the empire.

WE left Galba at Clunia, a city of his province, whither he had retired with his friends, in the utmost consternation, upon the news of the death of Vindex, and the declaration of Virginus not to seize the empire himself, nor suffer any one else to assume it, who was not chosen by the senate. While he was deliberating with his friends what measures to take, and in the utmost despair ready to lay violent hands on himself, his freedman, by name Vicellius, of whom we have spoken above, arriving in seven days from Rome, and understanding upon his arrival, that Galba was reposing in his chamber, opened the door, and, entering in spite of his guards, acquainted him, that Nero was dead, and he, by the army, the senate, and people, declared emperor; adding, that not trusting to common report, he had gone himself to the place where the tyrant lay, seen his lifeless carcase extended on the ground, and heard Galba, in the camp of the prætorian guards, proclaimed emperor. We may well imagine, how great was the joy of Galba upon this intelligence; it flew in a trice through the neighbouring cities, and drew vast crowds to Clunia: Galba received them in the most obliging manner, communicated to them the news he had received, and assured them of the truth of it, tho' the expedition used by the messenger rendered it almost incredible. Two days after, Titus Vinus, tribune of the only legion then in the province, having received from his friends in Rome a distinct account of what had passed in the capital, came from the camp and imparted it to his general. Nor was it long, ere messengers arrived from the consuls Silius and Trachalus, who, tho' deposed by Nero, had, it seems, upon his death, resumed the fasces, with the decrees of the senate, declaring Galba emperor and vesting him with the sovereign power^b. Suetonius writes, that he no sooner received these dispatches, than laying aside the title of lieutenant to the senate and people, he assumed that of emperor^c; but Zonaras tells us, that he would not suffer himself to be styled emperor or Cæsar, till he was acknowledged as such by the deputies, who were sent to him by the senate and met him at Narbonne^d. Be that as it will, he no sooner received the decrees of the senate, than he left Spain and set out for Rome, attended by his Spanish guard, by his chief friends, and by Otho, proprætor of Lusitania, the first governor who had declared for him; but advanced slowly, being, on account of his age, carried the whole way in a litter. Suetonius tells us, that on his journey he dispatched assassins into Judea, with private orders to murder Vespasian, whose power and abilities he dreaded. But Tacitus^e and Josephus^f assure us, that Vespasian entertained not the least thought of revolting from Galba; but, on the contrary, upon the first news of his assumption to the empire, he dispatched his son Titus to perform fealty and homage in his name, and to receive his orders concerning the war he was carrying on against the Jews. With Titus king Agrippa set out from Judea, in order to assure the new emperor of his submission and obedience; but they proceeded no farther than Achaia, where they received news of Galba's death. The only person whom Galba seemed to dread and suspect was Virginus Rufus, who was at the head of a powerful army in Germany, and acquired great reputation by the defeat of Vindex, and was greatly beloved by the soldiery. But he, tho' earnestly pressed to assume the sovereignty, not only by the troops under his command, but likewise by deputies from the legions, which, by Nero's orders, had from Illyricum crossed over into Italy, continued firm to his first resolution of reserving a ing to the senate the power of electing an emperor; nay, when certain news was brought him of Nero's death, he still persisted in refusing the title of emperor, tho' his soldiers bound themselves by a solemn oath to stand by him to the last drop of their blood, and one of the tribunes, forcing his way into his tent, with his drawn sword, threatened to kill him upon the spot, if he continued to withstand the ardent wishes of the whole army. When he received from Rome a certain account of the resolutions of the senate, he immediately took the oath of fidelity to the new emperor, and persuaded, not without much difficulty, the troops under his command to lay aside all thoughts of raising him to the empire, which by the senate had been decreed to another. Galba was so taken with his loyal and generous conduct, b that he immediately sent for him, with a design to have him near his person, and confer upon him such rewards as his fidelity well deserved. Virginus received with the utmost respect Flaccus Hordeonius, who was appointed to command in his room, resigned the army to him, and set out without delay to meet the emperor, who already approached the frontiers of Gaul. Upon his arrival, he was received very coldly by Galba, without the least token, says Plutarch, of affection or hatred, of gratitude or resentment. The emperor had a personal value and esteem for him, and would have raised him, had he followed his own inclination, to the chief employments in the state. But Titus Vinius, who had already gained a great sway over the emperor and was jealous of Virginus, did all that lay in his power to estrange from him the mind of the emperor, and to put a stop to his promotion. c But herein he was more his friend, as Plutarch observes, than he intended, and contributed to that happiness which he thought he was opposing: for, by preventing his preferment, he preserved him from those calamities, in which the other officers of the army were involved, and secured to him a life of quiet and tranquillity, which he enjoyed to an advanced age^s. Galba, upon his arrival at Narbonne, found there the ambassadors sent to him from the senate, received them in a most obliging manner, and invited them to an entertainment, at which he refused to make use of the silver and gold plate which belonged to Nero, and had been sent him from Rome, contenting himself with his own, which shewed, that he utterly despised all pomp and outward appearances of grandeur. However, he was soon d persuaded by Vinius to alter his conduct in this particular, and put upon other measures, which hastened his ruin. He treated with the utmost severity some cities of Spain and Gaul, that had been backward in acknowledging him, published threatening edicts against them, and deprived some of them of great part of their territories, loading them with heavy taxes, and causing their walls to be beaten down^b. In Gaul he ordered Vettius Chilo, and in Spain Obultronius Sabinus and Cornelius Marcellus to be put to death, and with them, if we believe *Suetonius*ⁱ, even their wives and children, for having refused to join him, when he first revolted from Nero. As Galba was known to be a man of an humane temper, and naturally averse to all manner of cruelty, these executions were generally imputed, and not e undeservedly, to Vinius and his other favourites, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the course of the present reign.

In the mean time, at Rome, Nymphidius Sabinus, of whom we have spoken in the preceding reign, having, by his immense largesses, gained the affections of the prætorian guards, and persuading himself, that Galba, by reason of his infirmities and old age, would never reach the capital, usurped all the authority there. Presuming upon his interest, he obliged Tigellinus, who commanded, jointly with him, the prætorian guards, to lay down his commission. After this, he made several magnificent and expensive entertainments, inviting to them such as had been consuls or had commanded armies, distributed large sums among the people, and with f shews and other diversions, which he daily exhibited, gained so great an interest with all ranks, that he already looked upon himself as sovereign. The senate, dreading his power, conferred extraordinary honours upon him, styled him their protector, attended him when he appeared in public, and had recourse to him for the confirmation of their decrees, as if he had been already invested with the sovereign power. This base compliance puffed him up to such a degree, that he usurped, not leisurely and by degrees, but all at once, an absolute authority. Plutarch tells us, that he was so provoked against the consuls for sealing the dispatches, patches, which they sent to the emperor, with their own signets, and not with his, ^a that he would have deposed them, had they not studied to appease him with submissions quite unbecoming persons of their rank and station. Tho' he acted as sovereign, he had not yet openly declared his design of seizing the sovereignty; but when he understood, that Galba was already in Gaul and approached the borders of Italy, that Cornelius Laco was appointed commander of the prætorian guards, and Titius Vinius the new emperor's chief favourite, he summoned the officers under his command, and, after having bitterly inveighed against Galba's favourites, who, he said, would exercise the same power and authority, which had been usurped by Tigellinus, if they were allowed time to establish themselves, he exhorted them to send ambassadors to the emperor, and beg, in the name of the whole army, that ^b he would discharge from his service Laco and Vinius. If Galba complied with their request, he did not doubt, but the whole power would devolve upon him, since he had contributed more than any other to the ruin of Nero and promotion of Galba;

and this power he designed to make use of against Galba himself: if the emperor rejected the petition of the army, that, he hoped, would estrange their minds from him, and dispose them to a revolt. But the officers did not approve of the motion; on the contrary, they thought it absurd and unreasonable to direct an emperor of Galba's years and experience, and tell him who of his friends were to be trusted, and who discharged. Hereupon Nymphidius changed his measures, and, contrary to the advice of Clodius Celsus, a native of Antioch, his intimate friend, resolved to ^c conceal no longer his design. Accordingly he imparted it, without disguise, to some of the officers, and they to the soldiers under their command; and it was agreed, that Nymphidius should be conveyed that very night into the camp, and there proclaimed emperor. But Antonius Honoratus, one of the tribunes, touched with remorse, assembled his men in the evening, signified to them his repentance, and encouraged them to continue steady in their allegiance to Galba. We had, indeed, said he, some colourable pretence to revolt from Nero, whose cruelty and tyranny
we could no longer bear. But what can prompt us to abandon and betray Galba?
Can you reproach him with the murder of his wife and mother? did he ever disgrace the imperial dignity by debasing himself to act upon the stage? Notwithstanding all the provocations that monster had given us, we thought ourselves bound to continue faithful to him, to defend and protect him, till we were assured by the traitor Nymphidius, that he had abandoned us and was fled into Egypt.
What, but some evil genius, can thus hurry us on from one treason to another?
Must Galba fall a victim to appease the ghost of Nero? must one of Livia's family be sacrificed to make way for the son of Nymphidia? Let us rather call him to an account for the Death of Nero, and approve our fidelity to Galba by inflicting on the base traitor the punishment he deserves. The discourse of the tribune brought all who heard him over to his sentiments; so that they resolved to maintain inviolable the oath which they had taken to Galba. Most of the other cohorts joined ^e them, and with loud shouts proclaimed a-new Galba emperor. Nymphidius hearing the noise, and either imagining they proclaimed him, or fearing some insurrection, hastened to the camp, attended by a great number of lights, and holding a speech in his hand composed by Ciconius Varro, which he intended to pronounce to the army. Upon his arrival at the camp, he found the gates shut and the soldiers under arms on the ramparts. This greatly alarmed him; but nevertheless advancing nearer, he asked them, What they designed, and by whose orders they had taken arms? To this question they answered with one voice, We are determined to ac- knowledge no other emperor but Galba. Nymphidius, pretending to concur in their sentiments, commended their fidelity; and, not yet despairing of being able by large ^f promises to gain them over to his interest, ordered them to open the gates to their general. They obeyed; but Nymphidius, upon his first entering the camp, was saluted with a dart, which Septimus, who marched before him, received on his shield. The traitor immediately betook himself to flight; but being closely pursued by the soldiery, was overtaken and slain. His body was dragged through the camp, and next morning exposed to public view in an inclosure made for that purposeⁱ. For this account we are indebted to Plutarch; for Tacitus and Suetonius only tell us, that Nymphidius embarked in measures to seize the sovereignty, but

^a perished in the attempt. Nymphidius boasted himself, as we have related above ^k, the son of the emperor Caligula; but was commonly thought, according to *Plutarch*¹, to be the son of a celebrated gladiator named Martianus, to whom he bore a greater resemblance than to Caligula; for his mother Nymphidia was a public prostitute. Galba being at the same time informed of the treason and the punishment inflicted on the traitor, dispatched orders to the senate, injoining them to put all his accomplices to death without distinction. Among these were executed Cingonius ^{His accomplices punished by Galba's orders.} Varro, consul elect, who had composed his speech, and Mithridates of Pontus, the same, as we conjecture, who having been by the Romans stript of his dominions twenty years before, had delivered himself into their hands, and had by them been conveyed to Rome. They were both, without all doubt, privy to the conspiracy; ^b nay, Mithridates had said publicly, while men of all ranks were with emulation testifying their joy for the promotion of Galba, that while he was at some distance, they entertained mighty expectations of him; but the moment he appeared, they would think it a disgrace to the present age, that he had ever been styled Cæsar. But, notwithstanding their guilt, they were deemed to perish as innocents, because they died without being heard in their own defence. Every one expected, from a man of Galba's years and experience, a quite different conduct; and therefore the whole city was greatly alarmed at such illegal and arbitrary proceedings, against persons of their rank and quality^m. But what occasioned a far greater surprize was, ^c his ordering Petronius Turpilianus, who had been consul in the eighth year of Nero's reign, to be forthwith put to death, for no other crime, but because he had been faithful to that prince, and commanded as general under him. As Turpilianus was broken with age, and had no longer any troops under his command, the emperor, ^{Galba's unseasonable severity.} as was publicly said, ought to have put off his execution, till his arrival at Rome, and heard him himself. From these hasty and illegal executions it was generally concluded, that the new prince would not observe that moderation in his actions, which he had promised in his speeches.

AFTER a long and bloody march, Galba reached at length the Milvian bridge, within twenty-five furlongs of the city, and was there met by a numerous body of ^d marines, who by Nero had been formed into a legion, and were come to address the new emperor for a confirmation of their establishment. But Galba either rejecting their petition, or putting off the affair to another time, they grew mutinous, beset the emperor, stopping up the way to all others who came to wait upon him, and with a tumultuous noise, required an eagle and legionary ensigns. Hereupon Galba ordered his horse to ride in among them, who put many of them to the sword and the rest to flight. The emperor, not satisfied with this severity, com- ^{He causes a great number of marines to be massacred.} manded every tenth man of those who had escaped to be decimated; so that, according to Tacitus, several thousands fell, either by the swords of the horse, or those of the executionersⁿ. Dion Cassius tells us, that seven thousand of the disarmed ^e multitude were cut in pieces upon the spot. Such, as had the good luck to outlive the massacre and execution of their companions, were, by Galba's orders, committed to prison, where they lay till his death, when they were by Otho set at liberty, and anew formed into a legion^o. The entrance of the new emperor into the capital, through so much blood and slaughter, was looked upon as an omen portending greater calamities, than the city had suffered even under Nero; and the populace were confirmed in their apprehensions by several prodigies, especially by an earthquake, attended with a dreadful noise, which happened upon Galba's first entering the palace^p. But what most of all rendered him both odious and contemptible was, his suffering himself to be entirely governed and blindly controuled by his three ^f favourites, Titus Vinius, Cornelius Laco, and Marcianus Icelus, who, as they lodged ^{Is governed by his favourites.} in the palace, and were continually about the emperor, were commonly styled his pedagogues. Titus Vinius was descended of an illustrious family, but disgraced it by his infamous conduct, being, according to Tacitus, of all men the most notoriously ^{The character of Titus Vinius.} wicked. In his very first campaign under Calvisius Sabinus, he was branded with infamy; for the wife of that general, led with a preposterous curiosity to view the disposition of the camp, entered it in the night, disguised in the habit of a soldier; and, having there ventured into the place where the guard was kept, was debauched by

by Vinius, in the very quarter which was sacred to the Roman eagles and banners. For this crime he was by the emperor Caligula put in irons, and kept under close confinement; but being soon after set at liberty by Claudius, he discharged several public employments with a character free from reproach. Upon the expiring of his prætorship, he was preferred to the command of a legion, and acquitted himself in it with applause. Afterwards he was guilty of a crime, altogether infamous and worthy only of a slave; for being invited by Claudius to an entertainment, he purloined a golden cup of great value. But the only punishment which the emperor inflicted upon him for so scandalous an action was, to invite him again to his table the very next day, and to distinguish him from the rest of his guests, by ordering, that Vinius alone should be served in an earthen cup. Yet he ruled the province of Narbonne Gaul, in quality of proconsul, with unbiaſſed justice and eminent integrity. He was, upon the close of his proconsulship, appointed to command, under Galba, the legion which was quartered in Spain; where, contrary to the opinion of the other officers, he encouraged his general, in the manner we have related above, not to let slip the opportunity that offered to seize the sovereignty. He was a man of great boldness and address, and, according as he chose to apply his talents, capable of performing great things for the public welfare, or plunging the state in endless calamities. Cornelius Laco, the other favourite, whom Galba had appointed captain of the prætorian guards before he left Spain, was a man of slender parts, of no courage or activity, but mightily conceited with his own talents, a certain enemy to every counsel, however excellent, if not suggested by himself, and headstrong in opposing every man eminent for ability and discernment. Icelus was a manumised slave, but not inferior to the other two in favour and authority. Nero had vested him, by the gold ring, with the order of knighthood, and he was now every-where called by an equestrian name, that of Martianus. He was a man of insatiable avarice, and is said, by spoil and rapine, to have amassed more wealth in the seventh months that Galba reigned, than the most rapacious freedman of Nero had done during the fourteen years of his reign. As the aged emperor reposed an entire confidence in these ministers, without ever inquiring into their conduct, they prostituted the credit and character of their master to their own vile gain and wicked passions. By them all things were set to sale; offices, provinces, public revenues, public justice, and the lives of men both innocent and guilty. He was old; they were insatiable, and eager to make the most of a short reign; so that in the court of Galba appeared all the evils and excesses lately seen and abhorred in that of Nero: they were equally grievous, says Tacitus, but not equally excused, in a prince of Galba's years and experience. He had himself a heart altogether upright and well-meaning; but, as the numberless iniquities of his ministers were imputed to him, he was no less hated, than if he had committed them himself. This, says Dion Cassius, is the unhappy condition of princes: it is not enough for them to abstain from all violence; they must restrain others, especially their ministers, from committing any: no prince will be reckoned good, when his ministers are known to be bad; nor to be much beloved, when they are much hated. Ministers, it must be owned, are often doomed to suffer imputations altogether groundless, as proceeding rather from envy and the nature of their post, than from their evil conduct; in which cases it is but reasonable and generous to protect them. But here the guilt was notorious, and manifest to all men but Galba. He, whom of all men it most imported to know it, knew it not; and hence, without check or controul, they abused the power with which he too blindly entrusted them, and sacrificed his life, his glory, and diadem to their own private views, to sordid interest, which was the smallest thing they ought to have sacrificed for so good a master. But the measures, which they took, proved in the end no less fatal to them, than to the emperor, as we shall have occasion to relate.

Galba's first care, after his arrival in the capital, was to call to an account, and punish, according to their deserts, such as had borne the chief sway in the late tyrannical administration. Among these, Elius Polycletus, Petinus, Patrobius, Narcissus, all Nero's freedmen, and Locusta, the famous poisoner, were publicly executed, to the infinite satisfaction of the people, who, with loud shouts of joy, attended them as they were led to the place of execution. No one doubted, but a Tigellinus would suffer the like doom. He had been the chief author and promoter of all Nero's iniquities, had perpetrated many unknown to him, and at last forsaken and betrayed him. Hence the execution of no man was more ardently wished for, more vehemently urged, by such as hated, by such as lamented, Nero; both concurring from opposite passions, in the same antipathy and request. But he had, with immense presents, purchased the favour of Vinius, who protected him with his mighty authority, on pretence that his daughter had been saved by Tigellinus; and truly he had saved her, says Tacitus, not from any clemency of his, after such numbers murdered by him, but purely to purchase means of shelter and escape in time to come. For this is the policy, continues our historian, of every desperate offender, from distrust of present fortune and dread of change, to arm himself betimes with private favour against the public hatred. Hence it comes, that for the protection of innocence no regard is shewn, but the guilty combine for mutual exemption from punishment. Of this scandalous partiality the people loudly complained: Turpilianus, said they, without having been guilty of any iniquity, or been polluted with the crimes of Nero, has been put to death for no other guilt, but because he would not betray his prince and master; whereas he who plunged his prince into those abominations, for which he deserved to die, and afterwards treacherously forsook and betrayed him, is not only suffered to live, but to enjoy the immense wealth, which by all manner of rapine he has accumulated.

b As often as the emperor appeared abroad, the people crowded about him, demanding the execution of Tigellinus. This they earnestly begged, in the theatre, in the circus, at the gates of the palace, &c. As the execution of this execrable instrument of Nero's tyranny was thus demanded by the universal voice of the Roman people, it had been but just, as well as politic and popular, to have sacrificed him, though he had been less guilty than he really was, to the manes of so many illustrious Romans murdered by him, and to the honest rage of the public. This would have obliged both the friends and enemies of Nero, gained the affections of the people, and strengthened Galba's party. But these were small considerations with Vinius, in comparison of filling his coffers. In order, therefore, to oblige d Tigellinus, who had engaged to pay him an immense sum, in case he escaped unpunished, he persuaded Galba, who reposed in him an entire confidence, not only to withstand the ardent wishes and earnest solicitations of the whole Roman people, but to check them with an edict, wherein he reproached them with cruelty, and begged they would not make his government appear tyrannical, nor insist upon the execution of an unhappy man, who was dying of a consumption. Nothing so much provoked the indignation of the people as this edict; for it was afterwards known, that Tigellinus had that very day made a sacrifice to the gods for his recovery, which was followed by a magnificent entertainment; and that Vinius, after having supped with the emperor, had spent the whole night in revelling with Tigellinus: it was moreover known, that Vinius had carried his daughter with him to the entertainment; and that Tigellinus, after having thanked the father for the edict, presented the daughter, first with two hundred and fifty thousand drachmas, and afterwards with a necklace, which he took from the neck of the chief of his concubines, valued at one hundred and fifty thousand more. Halotus, another of Nero's ministers, and perhaps no less hated, on account of his enormous cruelties and extortions, than Tigellinus, (for with equal ardour the Roman people demanded his execution) was in the same manner, and from the same motives, protected by the authority of Vinius; nay, in consideration of an immense sum, which he paid to that wicked minister, he not only escaped unpunished, but was preferred to a most honourable and profitable employment. Thus were criminals, notoriously guilty of the most crying iniquities, but possessed with wealth enough to purchase the favour of the reigning minister, screened from the punishment due to their crimes, while others, less guilty, were by droves hurried to execution. This scandalous and barefaced partiality gained to the minister what he chiefly aimed at, immense treasures, but derived upon the prince infinite public hatred; for, by not restraining his minister, he incurred the same censure and blame, as if he himself had done the evil, or authorized it.

THE example of Vinius was followed by the other ministers and favourites of the new emperor; for being indulged in immoderate power, they exposed to common sale all the honours and emoluments of the state. His bondmen too were greedy to profit by their sudden sunshine, and eager to convert into hasty gains the short reign of a master already enfeebled with age. So that the people began loudly to complain: Why, said they, was Nero deposed, if things are not mended under Galba? Why a new prince chosen, but for the ease of the public, after a reign of violence and tyranny? The public hatred, which the numberless iniquities of the new emperor's ministers derived upon him, was heightened by his ill timed strictness and unpopular parsimony; though his parsimony was chiefly ascribed to Vinius, who was said to have checked the emperor's generosity to others, that he might the better gratify his own avarice. However that be, while the emperor endeavoured to reform the abuses, and retrench the exorbitant expences that had prevailed in the preceding reign, he ran into the other extreme. No man's money, says Tacitus, did he ever covet, but was sparing of his own, and of the public money greedy and tenacious. Authors relate several instances of his unseasonable parsimony, altogether unbecoming a person of his rank and station. Plutarch tells us, that one Canus, a celebrated player upon the flute, having one night entertained him while he was supping, the emperor, after having highly commended the excellence of his performance, sent for his purse, and presented him with five denarii, about three shillings of our money, telling him, that he made him that present out of his privy purse, and not out of the public money. Suetonius adds, that when his table, upon any extraordinary occasion, was more splendidly served than usual, he could not refrain from sighing and expressing his dissatisfaction, in a manner inconsistent with common decency. As the public treasure had been quite exhausted by Nero, who had consumed above seventeen millions in profuse pensions and donations, Galba, after examining every expedient to find the necessary supplies, preferred to all others, as the most just, that of supplying the public at the expence of those, for whose sake the public had been impoverished. All the partakers, therefore, in the late emperor's extravagance were called to account; and it was enacted, that they should retain only a tenth of that wild liberality, and restore the rest. But, as they had scarce a tenth left unwasted, having lavished the plunder of the public and of their fellow-citizens, in the same riot and prodigality in which they had squandered away their own private fortunes, the emperor obliged those who had had any dealings with them, who had bought or received any thing from them, to refund the whole. For these searches and exactions a new court was instituted, in which presided according to Tacitus thirty, according to Suetonius fifty, Roman knights; who extended their inquiries even into Greece, and there obliged the players upon instruments, the actors, wrestlers, charioteers, the judges at the Olympic games, the priests of Apollo Delphicus, &c. to restore nine tenths of Nero's donations. As this was an affair without bounds, and many were affected by it; as on all hands were seen open sales and the public crier, and this court was new in its institution, and from the multitude of officers, from the numerous suits, heavy and vexatious, the whole city, nay, the whole empire, was in a ferment. The soldiers of the prætorian guards were kept quiet a while in expectation of the mighty donative, which had been promised them by Nymphidius in Galba's name, supposing, that though they did not receive the full, yet the emperor, notwithstanding his parsimony, would not scruple to bestow upon them the same sum that had been given them by Nero. But when he refused to fulfil the promise which had been made in his name, and ordered only a small sum, less than had yet been given by any prince, to be distributed among them, they could not refrain from seditious invectives, vilifying the emperor for his old age and avarice. This disaffection was heightened by a saying of Galba: a saying, according to Tacitus, worthy of the primitive virtue of the Romans and the commonwealth, but to himself dangerous; That he chose his soldiers, and did not buy them. His severity too in exacting a strict observance of military discipline, a quality so admired of old, and by the armies ever distinguished with applause, was very grievous to a slothful soldiery, scorning the ancient discipline, and for fourteen years so accustomed to the base reign of Nero, that at this time they no less admired

Galba's parsimony.

He orders nine tenths of Nero's donations to be restored.

Refuses the soldiery the usual donative

^a admired the vices of their princes, than of old they had adored their virtues^u. Though the rest of his conduct did not, according to Tacitus, answer his severity in keeping the soldiery to their duty, yet he performed, as Suetonius informs us, many things worthy of so great a prince^w. That writer does not descend to particulars; but Zonaras tells us, that he punished with the utmost severity those who had, by false accusations, occasioned the ruin of innocent persons; that he delivered up to all masters such of their slaves as had borne witness against them; and that he recalled from exile those, who had been banished by Nero upon the law of majesty^x. Casaubon thinks it plainly appears from an ancient inscription, that he suppressed the tax of the quadragesima or fortieth penny, which had been first taken off, and afterwards restored by Nero^y. He discharged several of the prætorian guards, who had been engaged in the conspiracy of Nymphidius; and dismissed, without the usual rewards, the German cohort, which had served the other Cæsars with unshaken fidelity, ordering them to return to their country, because he suspected them more inclined to Cn. Do- ^{Discharges the German cohort.} labella than to him^z. However, he took particular care of some other cohorts of Germans, who having been sent by Nero before him to Alexandria, while he meditated a journey thither, and soon after recalled, were returned sickly, and greatly fatigued with so long a course of sailing^a.

ABOUT the same time that Julius Vindex revolted in Gaul, Clodius Macer, who governed Africa in quality of proprætor, took up arms against Nero, levied new forces, and even a legion, which from him was called the Macrian legion, but was soon after disbanded by Galba, whom he refused to acknowledge, through fear of being called to account for the numberless murders and extortions, to which his unbounded avarice and cruelty had prompted him. Plutarch tells us, that, without either accepting or rejecting the imperial title, he strove to maintain himself in possession of Africa, and to furnish the city, by stopping the vessels which thence conveyed corn to Rome. He was instigated to this revolt, according to Tacitus^b, chiefly by Galvia Crispinilla, who had been to Nero the directress of his lusts, and afterwards, passing over into Africa, had insinuated herself into the favour of the proprætor Macer. According to this account, Macer seems not to have revolted till after Nero's death. Be- ^{Clodius Macer killed in Africa.} that as it will, he was slain at the command of Galba by Trebonius Garucianus, the imperial procurator in Africa. As for Crispinilla, she returned to Rome; and though it was notorious, that she had suggested to Macer the pernicious counsel of furnishing the Roman people, and on that score capital punishment was demanded against her by the universal voice of Rome; yet, by the connivance of the prince and the favour of his ministers, (for she was both opulent and childless) she escaped her doom, and lived in perfect impunity during the reigns of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius^c. About the same time, was assassinated Fonteius Capito, who commanded in Lower Germany, by Cornelius Aquinas and Fabius Valens, two tribunes, without staying for the emperor's command. There were who believed, that Capito, however abominable he was, ^{And Fonteius Capito in Lower Germany.} however stained with avarice and immersed in impurities, had yet declined engaging in any turbulent counsels; that having rejected the solicitations of Aquinas and Valens to rebel with them, he was by them charged with their own ill faith and treason; and that Galba, either imposed upon or afraid of making further inquiry, ratified the execution. However it was, both these executions, that of Macer as well as that of Capito, were ill received, this being, as Tacitus well observes, the usual fate of a prince under public hatred, that every action of his, whether good or evil, is generally disapproved, perversely construed, and contributes to his ruin^d. Suetonius tells us, that, after the death of these two commanders, Galba at length quitted his military habit, and a dagger, which till then he had worn fastened to his neck, and hanging down on his breast, tho' he was not in a condition to make use of it, being enfeebled with age and infirmities^e. Capito was succeeded in the government of Lower Germany by Aulus Vitellius, afterwards emperor, who was raised to that post chiefly by the interest of Vinius, whose favour he had gained, by supporting the same faction in the circus. Galba, in conferring upon him that command, openly declared, that he did not prefer him out of any esteem he had for him, or opinion of his abilities, but because he believed those to be less feared, who were most addicted to gluttony, and that his keen appetite might be satiated with the plenty of that province; so so that his preferment was owing to the contempt, and not to the esteem, the emperor had for him †. Philostratus, in his life of Apollonius Tyaneus, tells us, that this year was born at Syracuse, and exposed to public view, a child with three heads; which monstrous birth denoted, according to the interpretation of his Apollonius, the three heads or emperors, Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, by whom the Roman state was for some time governed in one and the same year. He adds, that the cities of Sicily were then in arms against each other, and strangely harassed with intestine divisions ‡. But of these disturbances we find no farther account in that writer, nor any mention of them in others.

Licinianus.

THE following year on the calends of January, Galba entered on his second consulship, having his favourite minister, Titus Vinus, for his colleague. He had scarce assumed the fasces, when an express arrived from Pompeius Propinquus, procurator of Belgic Gaul, informing him, that the legions in Upper Germany, in open violation of their oaths and allegiance, demanded imperiously another emperor, and referred the free election of one to the pleasure of the senate and people of Rome. Verginius had been removed from them, as we have related above; and as he had neither been restored, nor preferred to any other command or employment, but treated, in a manner, like a criminal, they conceived themselves to be charged as delinquents, for having offered him the empire. Hordeonius Flaccus, who had been sent to succeed him, they utterly contemned; and truly he was a man void of firmness, void of authority, and, from his lameness and the infirmities of his age, unequal to the direction of the most orderly and peaceable army. Hence, under their present frenzy, they were further inflamed by his impotent endeavours to restrain them. This intelligence ripened the design, about which Galba had been for some time deliberating with himself and in concert with his friends, concerning the adoption of a successor; for he imagined himself to be despised, not so much on account of his age, as for want of issue. But his favourites, already at variance and pursuing each his own private views, were divided into two factions: Vinus was for Otho; Laco and Icelus were combined together, not so much to favour the interest of any particular, as to exclude him. As Vinus had a daughter, who was a widow, and Otho was not married, no one doubted but an alliance between them was intended. But Galba, moved with a concern for the commonwealth, which, he thought, was in vain rescued from Nero, were it to devolve upon Otho, the chief confident of that prince's impure pleasures; did not, in this particular, suffer himself to be blindly guided by Vinus; but, hearing him favourably, referred the farther consideration of the affair to another time. However, out of complaisance to his chief minister, he appointed him and Otho consuls for the ensuing year. Hence it was generally taken for granted, that Otho would, upon his entering the consulship, be by Galba declared his successor; which caused an universal joy among the soldiery, who, for the most part, favoured Otho, and among the courtiers and creatures of Nero, who were passionate for a prince so resembling their former. But while Galba was deliberating about the choice, and putting it off from day to day, dismal tidings were daily brought from Upper Germany; for the legions there, being summoned, according to custom, on the calends of January, to take the usual oath of fidelity to the emperor, had torn his images, broken his statues, and openly declaring, that they would never acknowledge Galba, sworn allegiance to the Roman senate and people. Hereupon the emperor, beset with anxieties, as not knowing whither the fury of the revolters might tend, and not trusting to the faith of the troops in Rome, applied what to him seemed the only remedy, and held a council for declaring a successor, to which, besides Vinus and Laco, he summoned Marius Celsus, consul elect, and Ducennius Geminus, governor of Rome. On this occasion Vinnius promoted anew with great zeal the adoption of Otho, and Ducennius Geminus that of Dolabella, who was nearly related to Galba. But the emperor, preferring the welfare of the publick to all other regards, after a short speech concerning his great age, ordered Piso Licinianus to be sent for, and, to the great surprize of all, named him his successor. Piso was the son of Marcus Crassus and Scribonia, and both by father and mother nobly born, being by his father descended from the celebrated Marcus Licinius Crassus, who was slain in the fatal battle of Carrhæ, and by his mother from Pompey the Great. He was at this time in the thirty-first year of his age, and by all highly esteemed on account of his extraordinary parts, his a his engaging behaviour, and singular modesty. His gravity, resembling that of the ancient Romans, was, says Tacitus, by those who judged censoriously, accounted melancholy and austere; but that part of his temper, which alarmed the discontented, pleased the person adopting^b. Suetonius tells us, that Galba had always shewn a great esteem for him, and named him in his last will for his heir, before he was raised to the empireⁱ. Some, however, believed, that he was by Laco prevailed upon to adopt him for his successor; for Laco had, unknown to Galba, held private conferences with him at the house of Rubellius Plautus, but artfully recommended him to Galba, as one to whom he was an utter stranger. Galba, after having declared to him, in the presence of his friends and counsellors, his design of adopting him, and naming him for his successor in the empire, is said to have taken him by the hand, and to have spoken thus: “ Were I as a private person to adopt you for my son, glorious

 b “ even then would be the adoption to us both, since my family would receive new lustre “ from the blood of the great Pompey and of Marcus Crassus, and yours from that of “ the Sulpitian and Lutatian families. I am now a publick person, called to the em“ pire by the united consent of the gods and men; and of this sovereignty, for which “ our ancestors have often exposed their lives, I offer you the possession, while you “ are neither seeking nor pursuing it. To this I am urged only by the love of my “ country, and your excellent qualifications. Augustus, who would intail the empire “ upon his own house, in his own house sought a successor. I chuse out of the common“ wealth an heir to the commonwealth: not that I am reduced to this choice by any c “ want of relations of my own; but them I overlook, as well as your relations, because “ I do not judge them so well qualified for so important a charge as yourself. You “ have a brother, in nobility your equal, in age your superior, a man worthy of this “ fortune, did I not find in you one still more worthy. You have passed your youth “ without reproach, and such hitherto has been your course of life, that nothing in “ your conduct thus far is subject to blame: but you have yet only had adverse fortune “ to contend with. Prosperity is more ensnaring; it tries the temper of the soul, and “ exposes its weaknesses: calamities we often bear with patience; but are utterly sub“ dued and corrupted by a flow of felicity. I do not doubt but you will, with your d “ usual firmness, still retain the same integrity, faith in friendship, candour, and free“ dom of spirit, endowments, which, above all others, adorn the mind. But in “ others, you will find a different conduct towards you: by false complaisance they “ will endeavour to weaken your fortitude, and, by deceitful flattery and soothing “ speeches, poison every honest affection of your mind; and to his own sordid gain “ will every particular be wresting your honour and good inclinations. You and I, “ upon this occasion, converse with hearts perfectly sincere; but others will make their “ addresses to our fortunes, rather than to us: and indeed, to reason princes into their “ duty is a dangerous task; but easy is the art of flattering any prince whatsoever.
 “ Could this immense empire subsist without a single ruler, I should glory in resigning, “ glory in being the first emperor, who resigned the power of the republic into her e “ own hands; but such long since has been the unhappy situation of the state, that all “ the good, which my old age allows me to do the Roman people, is, to leave them a “ good successor; nor can you, with all your youth, do more for them, than afford “ them in yourself a benevolent prince. Under Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius, we “ were all the inheritance of one family. That the empire has begun in me to be “ elective, is some equivalent for our ancient liberty, and the only liberty we are capa“ ble of enjoying. Now the Julian and Claudian families being extinct, the best men, “ by this way of adoption, will become the greatest. To be descended from princes is “ the effect of chance; but, in the work of adoption, the judgment is exercised;
 “ and whenever you want to chuse, the general consent will direct you to the person f “ most worthy to be chosen. Have always before your eyes the example of Nero, “ who, elated with the glory of his race and a long genealogy of the Cæsars was not “ in reality dethroned by Julius Vindex, the governor of a province, unprovided with “ forces, nor by me assisted with one legion, but by his own cruelty and infamous de“ baucheries; nor was there, till then, any instance of an emperor by public sentence “ condemned and deposed. It was my lot to be called to an unsettled state; nor must you “ be alarmed, if while the whole world continues in this general uproar, there are “ two legions which yet remain unreclaimed to obedience. As to my old age, the “ only objection to my government, it is no longer one, since when it comes to be

WHEN Galba had done speaking, Piso returned him thanks for the extraordinary modesty. He betrayed no symptoms of joy, no change in his countenance, none afterwards in his behaviour, as if he had been insensible of so mighty a favour; manifest indications, says Tacitus, that he was more capable of reigning, than desirous to reign. The next thing that came under debate in the council was, where to declare the adoption, whether to the people assembled, to the senate, or to the army. The result was to do it in the camp; and thither he immediately repaired, tho' that day, the tenth of January, was rendered unusually terrible by heavy rains, frequent claps of thunder, and incessant lightning; which, in ancient times, would have proved sufficient ground for dissolving public assemblies, but were looked upon by Galba, and contemned, as fortuitous and unmeaning. Upon his arrival in the camp, he declared to a full assembly of the soldiers, with the brevity becoming an emperor, that he adopted Piso after the precedent of the deified Augustus, and according to the custom of the army, where every one chuses his man. And lest the revolt of the German legions might, if by him concealed, be thence thought more formidable, he frankly told them, that the fourth legion and the eighteenth, at the instigation of some few incendiaries, had departed from their duty, but would soon return to their allegiance.

 As no mention was made of the distributions usual on such occasions, only the soldiers who stood next to him applauded his speech, and through all the rest was observed a fullen sadness and silence for having thus lost the donative, which custom and their own insolent claims had, in some degree, rendered necessary. Tacitus tells us, that with any liberality, however small, Galba might have gained the affections of the soldiery; but suffered by practising, out of season, the rigorous purity of ancient times, which they were no longer able to bear^k. From the camp Galba proceeded to the senate, where he spoke with the same brevity and bluntness as to the soldiery. The speech which Piso made was better received. In the mean time, Otho, who had been the foremost to espouse the cause of Galba, had promoted it with vigor, and thence conceived hopes of being adopted and named by him for his successor, enraged at his disappointment, and burning with anger against Galba, with envy towards Piso, determined to make a resolute effort, while the authority of the one was daily decaying, and that of the other not yet confirmed. Many concurring motives inspired him with this resolution. As he had consumed his fortune in a course of riot and expence, and contracted immense debts, in the quiet establishment of the state he saw nothing but despair, and only upon public confusion founded his hopes. Besides, he looked upon his being thus put by, as a certain sign of the displeasure and ill-will of Galba towards him, and thence thought resignation and acquiescence more threatening, than boldness and temerity. His favourite freed-men too and his slaves, inured to a licentiousness and riot inconsistent with the œconomy of a private family, were to their lord continually displaying the alluring advantages attending the sovereign power, and representing them as his own, if he roused himself, and made them so.
 The astrologers at the same time urged him by their predictions, while they were confidently averring, that the stars presaged approaching revolutions and a year of great glory to Otho. Of this tribe Ptolemy was one, who having accompanied Otho into Lusitania, and foretold him that he should survive Nero, had gained mighty credit from the event. Now he persuaded him, that, if he exerted his might and laid hold of the present opportunity, he would certainly attain the accomplishment of his wishes, the sovereign power. Hereupon Otho, with whom these predictions resolved to make a bold push and try his fortune. The direction of the treasonable design he committed to one of his freed-men, by name Onomastus, who introduced to him two men as proper instruments in it, Veturius, a soldier of the life-guard, and Barbius Proculus, tesserarius of the same band; that is, one whose office it was to receive the parole from the tribune in writing, and carry it to the tents of the soldiers.

Otho, having first in a long conversation tried their temper and capacity, and found them to be men of great address and resolution, imparted to them his design, loaded them with mighty presents, promised them more ample rewards, and furnished them with vast sums to bribe and debauch the inclinations of as many of the rest as they were able. Thus two common soldiers undertook to transfer the Roman empire Two common soldiers undertake to transfer the empire.
 b from one prince to another, and transferred it effectually. They admitted very few into the secret; the minds of the rest, already uneasy and wavering, they estranged from the emperor by various artifices, especially by filling them with utter despair of the donative, which had been promised, and so often put off. This, said they, is not only defrauding us of our deserved rewards, but blasting our expectations for ever, and giving a bad precedent to other emperors, who will not fail to follow an example so prejudicial to us, so advantageous to themselves. Rome was at this time filled with troops; Galba had brought with him a Spanish legion; the legion, which had been raised by Nero, still remained in the city; and besides these forces, there were many from Germany, Britain, and Illyricum, such as had been thence detached c by Nero's orders, and sent forwards to the Caspian streights, for the war which he meditated against the Parthians, but recalled to suppress the revolt of Vindex in Gaul.
 These, dreading the severity of discipline, which in this reign began to be revived, were all ready to revolt; and though not combining in favour of any particular, yet prepared for the first daring spirit. The prætorian guards indeed, transported with a fondness for Nero, were entirely addicted to Otho, who, they hoped, would recal
 the licentiousness which they had enjoyed under that prince; nay, some of them were so impatient to see him invested with the sovereign power, that on the fourteenth of January they were prepared, as he returned home from supping abroad, to d have hurried him away and declared him emperor; only they apprehended, that, during the dark, whoever chanced to be presented to the German or Pannonian army, might by them, for the most part unacquainted with the person of Otho, be, instead of him, saluted emperor. The execution of the design was therefore put off till the next day, when Otho early in the morning went to attend the emperor, and was, according to custom, received by him with a kiss, and admitted to be present at a private sacrifice, which Galba offered in the temple of Apollo. We are told, that Umbricius the soothsayer had no sooner viewed the intrails of the victim, than he Galba is warned of a treasonable plot.
 warned the emperor of dismal presages, of treasonable plots just impending, and a domestic foe, all in the hearing of Otho, who stood next to him, and, by a different construction, understood it all as propitious to himself, and a successful issue foretold of his own machinations. However, he was not a little disconcerted at the disco-c very, and could not help betraying some dismay and confusion. But, in the mean time, Onomastus, his freed-man arriving, acquainted him, that the surveyor and builders waited his coming. This was the signal before settled amongst them, to intimate that the soldiers were assembling, and the conspiracy ripe for execution. He therefore immediately withdrew, feigning to those who asked him the cause of his departure, that he was about purchasing certain houses, which being old, and thence suspected to be decayed, it was necessary first to examine them. Then, leaning on his freedman, he proceeded through the palace of Tiberius to the Velabrum, and f from thence to the gilt pillar by the temple of Saturn, where the several highways in Italy terminated. There he was received by a party of the guards and proclaimed emperor; but as they were not above twenty-three, though his soul was not of the same Otho is saluted emperor by a small party of the guards;
 soft temper and effeminacy with his person, but, on the contrary, bold and daring, yet he was so dismayed at the smallness of their number, that he desired to retire and drop his design. This the soldiers would not suffer; but putting him in great haste into a chair, hurried him away with their drawn swords. Plutarch tells us, that he pressed them to make all the haste they could, crying out, I am a lost man.
 The party that attended him was soon joined by much the like number of soldiers, and these, in their progress to the camp, were followed by others, who came in, arrival at the camp, Julius Martialis the tribune, who that day commanded the main guard, suffered them to enter, either overcome with surprize at so daring an undertaking, or privy to the conspiracy, or else believing the camp to be generally infected, and that it was in vain to resist. In the camp they met with no opposition, those who were not privy to the design being incompassed by such as were; so that some out of fear, others by choice, joined the revolt, and at last all with one voice saluted Otho emperor and *Cæsar*¹.

Measures taken by Galba
to suppress the revolt.

In the mean time, Galba, utterly unacquainted with the revolution, was still bent upon the sacrifice, and tiring, says Tacitus, with his supplications, the guardian gods of the empire, already under the sway of another head. News was first brought him, that a senator, it was uncertain who, was by a party of the guards hurried away to the camp, there to be presented to the soldiery; and soon after word was brought, that Otho was the senator thus hurried thither. Instantly from all parts of the city people crouded to Galba with the same tidings, each relating them his own way. Some exaggerated every thing beyond measure; others, not laying aside, even at so desperate a juncture, their wonted flattery, soothed him with relations far short of facts. In this sudden alarm Galba hastily summoned his friends, and in a consultation held with them it was resolved, that the temper of the cohort then upon duty in the palace should first of all be sounded, not by Galba in person, whose authority was reserved as the last remedy upon the highest emergency, but by Piso; who having caused them to be assembled at the foot of the stairs of the palace, exhorted them with great eloquence and energy, to continue steady in their allegiance, displayed the vices and debaucheries of Otho, and assured them, that they should receive from Galba and him as large a donative for their fidelity preserved, as was offered them by Otho for dipping their hands in the blood of their sovereign. When he had ended his speech, some of the cohort stole away; but the major part displayed their ensigns, and prepared their arms to defend their emperor. Celsus Marius was immediately sent to secure the troops that had been detached from the army in Illyricum, and were then posted in the Vipsanian porch. To Amulius Serenus and Domitius Sabinus, centurions of the first rank, orders were given to bring away from the court of the temple of Liberty the band of German soldiers there. To the camp of the prætorian guards repaired the tribunes Cerius Severus, Subrius Dexter, and Pompeius Longinus, to try, whether, by reason and exhortations, the mutiny, then in its infancy, might not be quelled and obedience restored. Two of these tribunes the soldiers only terrified with threats, but laid violent hands on Longinus, stripped him of his arms, and ignominiously drove him out of the camp, he being, above the rest, obnoxious to them, on account of his known fidelity and invincible attachment to Galba. The band detached from the Illyrian army drove Celsus from amongst them with flights of darts. The second legion of marines, eager to revenge the blood of their brethren, massacred by Galba on his first entry as emperor into Rome, joined, without hesitation, the prætorian bands. The German troops continued a great while wavering and irresolute, being in their bodies still feeble, (for they were lately returned from Alexandria sickly and fatigued) and in their minds entirely peaceable, and rather inclined to Galba, out of gratitude for the care he was taking to cherish and restore them². Suetonius tells us, that they immediately hastened to the assistance of Galba; but not being acquainted with the streets, they mistook their way and came too late³. Galba, in the mean time, was held in suspense between two different counsels. Vinius was of opinion, that the emperor should remain in the palace, arm his slaves in his defence, fortify the avenues, and by no means issue forth amongst men mad with rage. All the rest alledged the necessity of dispatch and instant measures, before the conspiracy of a few, yet weak and unsupported, had gathered strength and numbers. Galba yielded to the advice of the latter, their counsels appearing to him more plausible. Piso, however, was sent away before to the camp, as a young man of great fame and reputation, and one who was generally looked upon as an enemy to the hated minister Titus Vinius. Scarce had he left the place, when it was rumoured about, that Otho was slain in the camp; and soon after there appeared persons who averred, that they themselves had been upon the spot when the traitor was killed, and beheld his dead body extended on the ground. It was by many conjectured, that this rumour was first framed, and afterwards heightened, by the partizans of Otho, with no other view, a view, but to entice Galba from his retirement. However that be, upon this occasion, not only the simple and thoughtless vulgar broke out into loud shouts and extravagant demonstrations of zeal; but the greater part of the Roman knights and senators, now divested of their fears, and therefore void of caution and reserve, forced the gates of the palace; and rushing in, presented themselves before Galba, complaining, that the vengeance, by them meditated in his behalf, was now snatched out of their hands. The most cowardly, such as had not courage enough to face the least danger, as the event well proved, were at this juncture profuse of words and boasts, and in tongue valiant and daring. No man knew the fact, and all averred it; so that Galba, deprived of true information, put on a breast-plate; and b finding himself unable, through age and infirmities, to sustain the pressing crowd, he was put into a chair. Before he left the palace, Julius Atticus, one of the guards, And from Julius Atticus pressing through the crowd, presented himself before the emperor, and, displaying a sword all over bloody, declared with a loud voice, that by his hand Otho had been slain. Galba returned no other answer, than, Fellow soldier, whose orders hadst thou? Such was his firmness in restraining the licentious insolence of the soldiery, without being dismayed by menaces, or corrupted with the most soothing flattery ^m.

In the mean time, they had to a man declared for Otho in the camp; and placing him amidst the ensigns upon that very tribunal, where a little before stood the golden statue of Galba, encompassed him round with banners displayed. The common c soldiers refused to the tribunes and centurions access to his person; nay, they gave him caution to beware of all who were in command or authority among them. First the prætorian guards, and then the legion of marines, unanimously swore allegiance to him, and, with loud shouts, saluted him emperor, Cæsar, and Augustus. After this, Otho, now confiding in his strength, inflamed them with a long speech, filled with bitter invectives against Galba and his favourites; and then ordered the common armoury to be thrown open, whence arms were instantly snatched at random, without any regard to the custom of war, or the different orders and ranks of men. Galba, in the mean time, having left the palace, was approaching the d forum, when he was overtaken by Piso, who, hearing the cries of the rebellious soldiery resounding quite to the city, had thought it adviseable not to proceed to the camp. At the same time, Celsus Marius, who had been sent to the Illyrian army, returned with a melancholy account. In this conjuncture, some advised Galba to retire back to the palace; others proposed seizing the capitol; and several were for taking possession of the place where the people used to assemble. In this contest, as in a storm, Galba's chair was borne, sometimes one way and sometimes another, according to the different movement and fluctuation of the multitude; when on a sudden appeared first a party of horse, and then a body of foot, rushing furiously into the forum. At this sight, the standard-bearer to the cohort, which had remained with Galba, rent from his standard the effigies of the emperor, and e dashed it against the ground. Upon this signal, the whole cohort abandoned him, and joined the detachments from the camp. Hereupon, those who carried Galba, seized with dread and trembling, flung him from his chair prostrate upon the ground, and there left him to the mercy of his enemies. His last words are differently reported, as he was hated by some, or admired by others. By several it was spread abroad, that he asked in the style of a suppliant, What evil he had merited? and begged time, only for a few days, to discharge the donative, which had been promised in his name. But most agree, that of his own accord he presented his throat to the assassins, bidding them strike resolutely, if the good of the commonwealth so required. Of the very person, who gave him the mortal f blow, we have no clear account. Some hold it to have been one Terentius, an evocatus, or resumed veteran; others one Lecanius. The more current tradition in Tacitus's time was, that Camurius, a common soldier of the fifteenth legion, cut his throat with his sword. The rest hacked and mangled in a dreadful manner his legs and arms (for his breast was covered with armour); nay, they were transported with a spirit so brutal and inhuman, that even after they had cut off his head, they satiated their rage by disfiguring with numberless wounds his lifeless body. Upon Titus Vinius they next discharged their rage. Some writers tell us, that through fear had no such orders from Otho; whence they conclude, that he was privy to the conspiracy, and had imbarqued in that treason, for which he had administered cause. Before the temple of Julius Cæsar, he was wounded in the knee; and presently after, by one Julius Carus, a legionary, pierced quite through the body. Among the many persons who had first made boast of their inviolable faith and attachment to their sovereign, one was found who performed what he had promised. This was Sempronius Densus, centurion of a prætorian cohort, and by Galba appointed to guard the person of Piso. He had not received any particular favour of Galba; but only from a principle of honour, and in compliance with the oath he had taken, he placed himself before the emperor's chair, commanding those who were advancing against him, to spare the emperor. As they still advanced, he threw away the vine branch, which he held in his hand as the badge of his office; and drawing his sword, singly encountered them all, boldly upbraiding them as detestable parricides; insomuch, that, partly by his blows partly by his reproaches, he drew upon himself the swords of the assassins; and though he could not save the emperor, yet procured to Piso, who was already wounded, opportunity to retire. He was himself killed; but Piso escaped to the temple of Vesta, where he was by a bondman of the state received through compassion and concealed in his chamber; which Otho no sooner knew, than he dispatched Sulpitius Florus, belonging to the British bands, a man just before presented by Galba with the privilege of a Roman citizen, and Statius Murcus, one of his guards, with orders to dispatch Piso. By them therefore Piso was dragged forth, and butchered near the gate of the temple. His head was immediately cut off and carried to Otho, who beheld it with unspeakable joy, thinking himself now relieved from all fear and perplexity. The bleeding heads of the emperor and his adopted son were stuck upon long poles, and thus carried along amidst the banners of the military bands, close by the eagle of a legion. Many, who had not the least share in the murder either of Galba or Piso, displayed their swords and hands all embrued with blood, and demanded of the new emperor a gratuity. Tacitus and Plutarch tell us, that above an hundred and twenty petitions of this nature, presented in one day to Otho, fell afterwards into the hands of Vitellius, who commanded search to be made after the authors, and punished them all with death, not from any tenderness for Galba, but out of policy, looking upon their punishment as a wholesome method of securing himself against such traitors^a.

THE news of Galba's death was no sooner divulged, than the senate, the Roman knights, and the people earnestly crowded to the camp, striving to out-run each other, and to overtake and pass such as were before them. To a man they condemned the conduct of Galba, magnified the judgment and choice of the soldiery, kissed the hands of Otho; and the more counterfeit their indications of zeal were, the more loud were their protestations. The senate, as if they were not the same men, says Plutarch, or had other gods to swear by, took the same oath to Otho, which Otho had not long before taken to Galba, and had just then violated. The new emperor received all who presented themselves to him with great demonstrations of kindness; and at the same time endeavoured to pacify the soldiery, breathing menaces and ravage. They demanded, that Manius Celsus, consul elect, and a faithful friend to Galba even in his last distress, might be instantly put to death. They hated him on account of his integrity and unshaken fidelity; but what they chiefly aimed at was, to have their hands let loose to general pillage and massacre, and to destroy every worthy and able man in the Roman state. But, as Otho had not sufficient authority to check the fury of the licentious soldiery, he personated great wrath against Celsus, ordered him to be put in irons, as if he reserved him for some more severe punishment; and by that means redeemed him from a violent death just impending. From this moment all things were transacted by the arbitrary will of the soldiers. By them were chosen the captains of the prætorian guards, namely Plotius Primus, once a common soldier, thence preferred to command the watch, and during the reign of Galba, a chief man among the partizans of Otho. With Plotius they joined Licinius Proculus, one in high confidence with Otho, and thought to have been employed by him to promote his intrigues. To the government of Rome they advanced Flavius Sabinus, partly in deference

a to the judgment of Nero, in whose reign he had administered the same office, and partly out of regard to his brother Vespasian. They then demanded, that the fees, wont to be by them paid to their centurions, for exemption from certain military burdens, should be utterly abolished; for under this name every soldier paid, as it were, an annual tribute. Hence the fourth part of a legion used to be absent at once, roaming like vagrants up and down the countries, where they were quartered, and robbing and plundering, in order to raise money wherewithal to purchase a dispensation from military toils. As most of the soldiers were debauched by such wild immunity, and reduced to beggary by the fees they paid for it, they were always ready to run headlong into sedition, dissention, and civil wars. Otho, therefore, readily granted them their request: but that he might not estrange from him the affections of the centurions, he undertook to pay out of his own revenue the fees for such exemptions and furloughs, when they were judged necessary; a regulation, which, by his successors, was perpetuated as part of the military establishment. In the close of the day, Laco, captain of the guards to Galba, was seized, and soon after by Otho condemned to an island, where, by his orders, he was murdered by a veteran, whom the emperor had sent before him for that purpose. Laco and Icelus, as he was only a manumised slave, was publicly executed. The day, thus spent in black and tragical iniquities, was concluded with public rejoicings. The next day, the city prætor assembled the senate, when to Otho were decreed the tribunitial authority, the title of Augustus, and all the honours enjoyed by other emperors. From the senate, the new emperor was carried in a kind of triumph cross the forum, still flowing with blood, and over heaps of dead bodies to the capitol, and thence to the palace, where at length he granted leave to burn and bury the slain. The remains of Piso were, by his wife Verania and his brother Scribonianus, committed to the grave, as were those of Titus Vinius by his daughter Crispina, after they had found out and redeemed, at a great price, their heads, which their murderers had retained, in order to sell them to their relations. The body of Galba, after it had lain long neglected in the streets, and suffered, during the licentiousness of the night, insults without number, was, by Argius one of his principal bondmen, bearing the office of steward, deposited in a mean grave within his own gardens. His head, miserably mangled and stuck upon a pole by the vile rabble attending the camp, was by them set up before the tomb of Patrobius, a freedman of Nero, whom Galba had caused to be executed. Here it was found the day following, and laid with the remains of his body, which had been already burnt^o. Such was the end of Galba, after he had lived seventy-two years and twenty-three days, and reigned, from the time he declared against Nero, nine months and thirteen days, but from that prince's death only seven months and as many days. He had passed through the reigns of five emperors, much happier under the sovereignty of other princes, than in his own. He had but moderate talents, and was, according to Tacitus, rather free from vices, than endowed with many virtues. He had commanded with great reputation in the German wars, afterwards governed Africa, as proconsul, with moderation and gentleness, and, in the latter part of his life, ruled with the same equity and justice the Hither Spain. He would, to use the expression of our historian, in the opinion of all men, have passed as one capable of the empire, had he never been emperor; not that his being advanced to that high station caused any alteration in him, but because he suffered himself to be blindly governed and controuled by his freedmen and ministers; men who were continually prostituting the credit and character of their master, to their own vile gains and wicked passions. Had he been blessed with good counsellors, he would, in all probability, have proved an excellent prince. He was temperate, frugal, free from ambition, an enemy to the insolence of the soldiery, and wished well to the commonwealth. But what availed his good qualities? He himself robbed no man; but his servants and ministers set no bounds to their rapines; and he, who ought not to have employed bad men, or at least ought to have restrained and punished them, was blind to all their iniquities. As he never inquired into their behaviour, nor blamed it, they never mended it, nor feared him. The sad fate, which their corruption and his own indolence brought upon him, is a sufficient warning to princes, either never to trust implicitly to the advice and conduct of any ministers, or at least to be well assured, that they are such, if such are to be found, as may be implicitly trusted.

Otho, now honoured by the senate with the title of Cæsar and Augustus, took upon him the consulship, having for his colleague his brother Salvius Titianus; but resigned the fasces on the first of March to Virginus Rufus, as his brother did to Poppæus Vopiscus. The new emperor had scarce taken possession of the sovereignty, when he was alarmed with dismal tidings concerning Vitellius; tidings, which, before the murder of Galba, had been suppressed, with a design to have it believed, that only the army in Upper Germany had revolted. Vitellius, as we have related above, had been by Galba preferred to the command of the legions in Lower Germany, which he had entered about the beginning of December in the preceding year, and with great care visited the winter quarters of the legions there. To their ranks he restored numbers who had been degraded; many he redeemed from ignominious punishments; and cancelled the marks of ignominy inflicted upon others. Having by this means gained the affections of the soldiery, Fabius Valens, who commanded a legion under him and was highly disgusted with Galba, who, he thought, had not rewarded him according to his deserts, solicited his new general to assume the sovereignty, magnifying to him the zeal and ardour of the soldiery, by whom he was no less beloved, than Galba hated. By his speech Vitellius was, says Tacitus, excited to covet the sovereignty, rather than to hope for it. In Upper Germany, Alienus Cæcina, who commanded a legion there, had entirely captivated the affections of the soldiers by his graceful person and engaging behaviour. He exercised the office of quæstor in the province of Spain called Bætica, when Galba revolted, whom he immediately joined, and was thence by him preferred to the command of a legion. But Galba, having soon after discovered, that he had embezzled the public treasure, ordered him to be prosecuted. Cæcina, resenting this, did all that lay in his power to stir up the troops to a revolt, hoping, by an universal confusion, to escape the punishment due to his crime. Neither in the army itself were there wanting seeds of tumult and discord: for they had all to a man been engaged in the war against Vindex; nor could they be induced to acknowledge Galba, till after Nero was slain. Hence a report was maliciously raised among them, and rashly believed, that the legions were to be decimated, and the centurions, for the most part, cashiered. The cities of Treves and Langres, which lay contiguous to the winter quarters of the legions, and had been by Galba deprived of great part of their territories, were more inflamed against him than the legions themselves; and therefore assured them by their deputies, that they were ripe for an insurrection, and ready to join them, as soon as they declared against Galba. On the first of January, when the legions were, according to custom, to swear allegiance to the emperor, they refused the oath, tore the images of Galba, and declared, that they acknowledged no other sovereign, but the senate and people of Rome; not one tribune or commander daring to exert himself in behalf of the emperor, or offering to harangue the multitude from a tribunal. It is true, Hordeonius Flaccus, commander in chief, was upon the spot; but had not courage enough either to restrain such as were already rushing into rebellion, or to recover such as were only wavering, or even to rouse and animate those who still continued steady and faithful to Galba. Four centurions, viz. Nonius Receptus, Donatus Valens, Romilius Marcellus, and Calpurnius Repentinus, all belonging to the eighteenth legion, would have protected the images of Galba, but were by the furious multitude seized and confined in chains. Further than this, none of them shewed the least regard to their duty, or their former oaths: but it happened in this as in other insurrections, whether the greater part led, the rest blindly followed. The following night, the eagle-bearer of the fourth legion hastening to Cologne, where Vitellius then resided, acquainted him with what had passed, and exhorted him to lay hold of the present opportunity. Hereupon messengers were by Vitellius forthwith dispatched to acquaint the troops under his command, that the army in Upper Germany had revolted from Galba; so that they must either make war upon the revolters, or, if they preferred peace and tranquillity, join with them and create an emperor: at the same time, he desired them to consider, that, with much less danger, they might elect a prince at once, than continue in search of one. The winter quarters of the first legion lay nearest, and with it Fabius Valens, who entering Cologne the very next day, accompanied with the cavalry of his legion and a body of auxiliaries, openly saluted a Vitellius emperor, and led him in a kind of triumph through the principal and most frequented streets in the town. His example was immediately followed, with great competition, by all the legions of the same province. The army in Upper Germany no sooner heard, that Vitellius had been saluted emperor by the troops under his command, than, relinquishing the plausible names of the senate and people of Rome, they acceded to the party of Vitellius. This happened on the third of January; whence it is evident, says Tacitus, that they had been no ways attached to or concerned about the free Roman state the two days before. The zeal of the inhabitants of Cologne, Treves, and Langres was equal to that of the legions; they all offered, with great ardour, supplies of men, horses, and money, each according to the measure of his power and sufficiency. Neither was such liberality confined to b the leading men of those colonies; but the common people too signalized their zeal for Vitellius, in surrendering, instead of money, of which they were destitute, their girdles, the trappings of their horses, the silver ornaments upon their armour, &c. not doubting, but they should, in due time, be amply rewarded for their seasonable generosity; for, while Vitellius was giving away his own fortune and lavishing in bounties that of others, without measure or discernment, they bestowed, as Tacitus observes, upon this extravagance the title of liberality and good-nature ^p.

The zeal of the people in behalf.

AND now Vitellius, trusting to his strength and the zeal of the soldiery, began to act as sovereign, and disposed of several employments, which had hitherto been administered by the imperial freedmen, but were by him conferred upon Roman knights. At the same time, to gain the affections of the soldiery, he ordered the fees exacted from them by the centurions, for exemptions from duty, to be paid out of his own treasure as emperor. He could not help humouring, in many instances, the revengeful temper of the soldiers, demanding the execution of particulars: however, in some instances, he defeated it, under colour of committing the obnoxious persons to prison. Pompeius Propinquus, governor of Belgic Gaul, who had acquainted Galba with the commotions begun in Germany, was immediately put to death; but Julius Burdo, commander of the naval forces in Germany, was, by Vitellius's orders secured in prison, and afterwards discharged, when the rage of the soldiery began to abate. They suspected, that he had first inticed Fonteius Capito, of whom we have d spoken above, to revolt, and then betrayed him: hence against him chiefly the fury of the army raged; but Vitellius, who had a particular value for him, saved him by deceiving them; and indeed there was no other means of protecting and shewing mercy. Crispinus, the centurion, by whom Fonteius Capito had been put to death, was publicly executed, and with him Nonius, Donatus, Romilius, and Calpurnius, the four centurions lately mentioned; men condemned for adhering to their faith and duty; a crime ever thought most heinous by such as have renounced both ^q.

He begins to exercise the sovereign power.

Several persons put to death at the request of the soldiery.

UPON the news of the revolt of the armies in Germany, Valerius Asiaticus, governor of Belgic Gaul, declared for Vitellius: his example was followed by Junius Blæsus, governor of Gallia Lugdunensis, or that part of Gaul which took its name e from the city of Lions, and by an Italian legion and a body of horse quartered at Lions. The forces in Rhætia and those in Britain went likewise, without hesitation, over to his side. Vitellius, now become, by the accession of so many armies, mighty both in forces and treasure, appointed two generals to conduct the war, and to each assigned a different rout. To Fabius Valens, he gave orders to cross Gaul, and in his march endeavour to gain over the natives to his party; but if he could not prevail upon them to join, to over-run and pillage their country, and then make an irruption into Italy, by that part of the Alps which was called Cottian, and is now known by the name of mount Cenis. Cæcina was ordered to advance thither f by a nearer way, and to pass over the mountains called Penini, now the Great St. Bernard. Valens had under his command the flower of the army of Lower Germany, to the number of forty thousand fighting men. From Upper Germany, Cæcina led thirty thousand. Vitellius was to follow, with a numerous body of German troops, to support the whole weight of the war. But while the soldiers were urgent for action, and eager to begin their march, notwithstanding the rigor of the winter season, the general was passing his time in voluptuous sloth, in revels, and banquets. By the middle of the day, he was always intoxicated with wine, and so gorged with feasting, that he was not capable of giving any directions. But such was the zeal zeal and ardour of the soldiers, that of themselves they supplied all the duties of the leader, as effectually as if he had attended in person. As soon as they were drawn out and armed, they demanded with eagerness, that the signal might be given for marching. We are told, that on the very day the army under the command of Valens began their march, an eagle, measuring his motion by that of the troops, glided gently along, and flew just before them, as if he shewed them the way, without being frightened with the joyful shouts uttered by the soldiery, who thence concluded, that the enterprize would prove successful. They advanced with assurance to the territories of Treves, as to those of a friendly state. But at Dividurum, now Metz, tho' they were there received in a very friendly manner, they were seized with a sudden panic, ran to their arms, and would have put the inhabitants, all to a man, to the sword, without the least provocation, had not their general, with much ado, restrained their fury, and by intreaties prevailed upon them to forbear pursuing the utter destruction of the unoffending city. There were slaughtered, however, not for the sake of pillage or spoil, but from fury and madness, near four thousand persons. The rest of Gaul was so alarmed with the news of this slaughter, that thenceforward, as the army approached any city, the inhabitants crowded out to meet them, accompanied with their magistrates in the attire of suppliants, and readily supplied them with all manner of provisions. In the capital of the Leucians, that is, in the city of Toul, Fabius received tidings of the murder of Galba, and that the sovereignty was devolved upon Otho. This news did not affect the soldiers, for they were only intent upon war: as for the Gauls, they bore equal hatred to Otho and Vitellius; but as they were possessed with dread of the latter, they declared for him. From Toul, the army advanced to Langres, a city intirely attached to the party of Vitellius, and were there kindly received. The inhabitants of Autun supplied them out of fear (for they hated Vitellius) with money, arms, and provisions. What the city of Langres had done out of fear, that of Lions did through joy; for Galba had loaded them with taxes, deprived them of part of their territories, and converted to his own exchequer the revenues of their state. As animosities had been long subsisting between the people of Lions and those of Vienne, Valens, at the instigation of the former, marched against the latter, under pretence, that they had aided the conspiracy and attempts of Vindex, and had lately levied troops for the support of Galba. But the people of Vienne gained over Valens with an immense sum, and a donative to the soldiery of three hundred sesterces a man. They were commanded, however, to surrender the arms belonging to the state, and to supply the soldiers with provisions. From thence, in a slow progress, the army was led through the territories of the Allobroges and Vocontii; the general, upon every march which he made, upon every shifting of his camp, striking infamous bargains with the proprietors of the several lands, and the magistrates of the several cities, for the favour and exemptions. This he did with such open menaces, that he ordered Lucus, a municipal town of the Vocontii, to be set on fire, because they shewed some reluctance to pay the sum he had required. Lucus was, in former times, one of the chief cities of the Vocontii, or Dauphiné but has been long since utterly destroyed. Marching in this manner, Valens arrived at length at the Alps. Tacitus observes, that he had been long fordidly poor, but by this march became suddenly rich, and abandoned himself, as his appetites had been whetted by a long course of penury, to all manner of riot and excesses.

On the other hand, Cæcina rioted in greater spoil and more blood. The Helvetians, not apprised of the tragical end of Galba, refused to own the sovereignty of Vitellius. Hereupon Cæcina, who longed passionately for a pretence to plunder their country, instantly decamped, and entering their territories in a hostile manner, ravaged their fields, sacked their cities, and made a dreadful havock of the unhappy inhabitants: many thousands were cut off, and great numbers made prisoners, and sold for slaves; for the Helvetians, once renowned for their valour and experience in war, were at this time only famous for the reputation which they had formerly acquired: they were fierce and daring, says our historian, while danger was at a distance, but struck with terror when it arrived. As the army, after having committed universal ravage and spoil, was marching in order of battle to Aventicum, the metropolis of the country, deputies from thence were dispatched to offer a sur-

a render of the city, which was accepted. Julius Alpinus, a leading man among the Helvetians, was, by Cæcina's orders, put to death; the fate of the rest was referred to the judgment of Vitellius, who, moved with the tears and intreaties of Claudius Cossus, their deputy, a man of great eloquence and address, granted to all pardon and security^s. While Cæcina was waiting in the country of the Helvetians, till he had learnt the pleasure of Vitellius, and preparing at the same time to pass the Alps, he received joyful tidings from Italy, that the squadron of horse named Syl- lana, and then encamped on the banks of the Po, had declared for Vitellius. They A squadron of horse revolts to Vitellius; and brings over several cities to the same party.
b had served under him in Africa, when he was proconsul there; had been recalled from thence by Nero, in order to be sent forward into Egypt; and, upon the insur-
c rection of Vindex, detained in Italy. As the officers were unacquainted with Otho, and engaged by obligations to Vitellius, they easily prevailed upon their men, by magnifying to them the great strength of the approaching legions and the renown of the German armies, to go over to the same party, and swear fealty to Vitellius. With themselves, as a present to their new prince, they brought into his interest the strongest municipal cities beyond the Po, viz. Milan, Novara, Jurea, and Vercelli. As such an extensive country could not be guarded by a single band of cavalry, Cæcina, who had this information directly from themselves, dispatched thither forthwith the several cohorts of Gauls, Lusitanians, and Britons, with a body of German troops, and the squadron of horse called Taurina. As for himself, he was some-c time in suspense, whether it were not adviseable to bend his march over the mountains of Rhætia towards Noricum, against Petronius, governor of that province, who, having on all hands raised forces and broken down the bridges over the rivers, was suspected to act for Otho. But fearing he might lose the detachments already sent forward, and reflecting, that where-ever the decisive battle was fought, Noricum would certainly prove one of the acquisitions following a general victory, he ordered his d soldiers lightly armed to take their rout over the Apennine, and led himself the heavy body of legionaries over the Alps, still covered with snow^t. He passes the Alps.

THE arrival of these troops in Italy filled Rome with consternation. Not only the senate and equestrian order, who had some share in the administration and d some concern for the public welfare, but even the populace, loudly complained, that two men, of all the most infamous for effeminacy, profusion, and debauchery, were thus fatally chosen, as it were on purpose to rend and destroy the empire. They thought their vows for either would be alike detestable, their supplications alike impious, since such men they both were, that whosoever of the two proved the conqueror, would thence prove the worst. In the mean time, Otho, tho' hitherto entirely abandoned to his pleasures, was not at this juncture lulled asleep by them;
but, suspending his voluptuous follies and artfully dissembling his passion for luxury, conducted all things suitably to the dignity of the empire. In order to gain the affections of the people, who suspected his virtues to be assumed, and apprehended a return of his vices, he caused Celsus Marius, consul elect, to be brought before c him in the capitol. He had already rescued him, as we have related above, from the cruelty of the soldiers, under colour of committing him to prison; and now he aimed at obtaining the character of tenderness and clemency, by mercy shewn to a man so illustrious, so beloved by the Roman people, and so odious to all the partizans of Otho's cause. Celsus, when he appeared, confessed, without betraying the least fear, the imputed crime of having persevered steady in his allegiance to Galba; he even appealed to Otho, whether he ought not to approve such an example of fidelity. Otho commended his steadiness, and, in a very obliging manner, desired him rather to forget his confinement, than remember his release. Neither did he f treat him as a criminal pardoned, but forthwith admitted him amongst his most intimate friends, and presently after chose him one of his generals for conducting the war. The saving of Celsus caused an universal joy amongst men of rank, was applauded with loud acclamations to the populace, and was not ill received even by the soldiers, who now admired in him the same virtue, against which they had, in the height of their fury, been so much incensed^u. The public joy for the deliverance of Celsus was greatly heightened by the doom of Tigellinus. He had been the chief author of all the enormities committed by Nero, whom he had afterwards betrayed and abandoned; and was therefore abhorred by those who loved, and those who hated, Nero. While Galba reigned, he was protected, as we have related above, by the power and authority of Titus Vinius: hence the people were the more inflamed against him, their old detestation of Tigellinus concurring with their recent hatred to Vinius. From every quarter of the city they now flocked to the forum and the palace, and filled with their multitudes the circus and the several theatres, demanding, with bold and seditious words, the execution of Tigellinus, till at length the fatal injunction to die was dispatched to him, then at the baths of Sinuessa. There, amidst a herd of harlots, after many passionate embraces and unmanly delays, he at last cut his throat with a razor^w.

WHILE the forces of Vitellius were yet on their march to Italy, Otho, with frequent messengers and private letters, strove to divert his competitor from engaging in a war, which might prove fatal to both. He offered him immense sums, and such a place of retirement as he himself should chuse to live in, agreeable to his profuse life and taste; nay, he engaged to take him for his partner in the empire, and to marry his daughter. With the same or the like offers Vitellius tempted Otho; so that they soon proceeded to reproaches, upbraiding each other with their debaucheries and profligate lives; nor in this did either bring a false charge against the other. Otho, having recalled the embassadors sent by Galba to the armies in Germany, dispatched others in their room in the plausible name of the senate; but the embassadors continued with Vitellius. As for the prætorian guards, who, by the appointment of Otho, accompanied them, Vitellius obliged them to return back, without suffering them to mix amongst his legionaries. At the same time Valens transmitted letters to the prætorian bands and city cohorts, in the name of the German army, exhorting them to abandon Otho and embrace the same interest. He likewise upbraided them for transferring the sovereignty to Otho, when it had been so long before conferred upon Vitellius. But the German army continuing faithful to Vitellius, notwithstanding the great promises of Otho, and the prætorian bands steady in their allegiance to Otho, notwithstanding the offers of Vitellius, the two chiefs began to employ snares and ministers of death against each other: assassins were dispatched by Otho into Germany, and by Vitellius to Rome; but the attempts on both sides were defeated^x.

THE first tidings from abroad that raised Otho's hopes were from Illyricum, whence he received advice, that the legions in Dalmatia, in Pannonia, and Mæsia, had declared for him, and sworn allegiance. The army in Judæa was by Vespasian sworn to Otho, as were the legions in Syria by Mucianus governor of that province. Egypt too and all the provinces extending to the east submitted to him. The like submission was paid him in Africa, in Spain, and in Narbonne Gaul; but the latter province soon acceded to the party of Vitellius, which was the nearest and strongest. Aquitain likewise first declared for Otho; but soon after, from the same motive, swore fealty to Vitellius: for there was no true zeal, as Tacitus observes, in the people for the cause and interest of either of the pretenders, and only by the impressions of fear they were transported and changed from one side to another. Otho, in the mean time, as if full peace had reigned, applied himself to the civil administration of the empire: in the senate he made many obliging and popular harangues; upon such ancient senators as had already sustained the first employments in the state, he conferred the pontifical or augural dignities; several young noblemen, lately recalled from exile, he invested with such sacerdotal offices, as had been enjoyed by their fathers or ancestors. To Cadius Rufus, Pedius Blæsus, and Scævinius Promptinus, senators degraded in the reigns of Claudius and Nero, he restored their former dignity. By the like benevolence he attempted to gain the affections of whole cities and provinces. He supplied the colonies of Hispalis and Emerita with a fresh recruit of families, and made the whole people of the Lingons free of Rome. To the province of Bætica he submitted all the cities of Mauritania; and granted great privileges to the Cappadocians and Africans. But not forgetting, even while his sovereignty was at stake, to honour the memory of his once favoured Poppæa, he procured a decree from the senate for replacing her several statues, which had been thrown down after the death of Nero; nay, he suffered the statues of that prince to be reared in public places, and did not betray any distaste, but rather satisfaction, upon his being saluted by the people in the theatre with the name of Nero Otho. Cluvius Rufus, who wrote the history of his own times, and succeeded Galba in the government of Spain, tells us, that Otho, in his

a his first dispatches to the governors of the provinces, in his grants and letters, subscribed himself Nero Otbo; but being apprised, that this gave offence to the nobility, he omitted the former name¹.

WHILE the minds of all men were intent upon the progress and issue of the civil war, the Roxolani a people of Sarmatia, having made an irruption into Mæsia, to the number of nine thousand men, and cut off two cohorts, were unexpectedly attacked by the third legion, put to flight, and obliged to seek for shelter in the marshes, where, through the rigor of the winter, they all perished to a man. For this victory, Marcus Aponius, governor of Rome, was distinguished with a triumphal statue, as were Fulvius Aurelius, Julianus Titus, and Numisius Lupus, commanders of the legions there, with the consular ornaments. Great was Otbo's joy on this occasion; for to himself he assumed the glory, as if the success in war was owing to his auspices². The Roxolani defeated:

AT Rome, in the mean time, arose, from an unforeseen accident, a sedition, which well nigh involved the city in destruction. Otbo had ordered the seventeenth legion to be removed from Ostia, where it was quartered, to Rome, and committed the care of supplying them with arms to Varius Crispinus, a tribune of the prætorian guards. Crispinus chusing, for the execution of his orders, the close of the evening, when the camp was composed and the soldiers retired to their tents, directed the armoury to be thrown open, and the carriages belonging to the cohorts to be loaded. The lateness of the hour gave no small jealousy to the drunken soldiery. Some of the most turbulent, and most intoxicated with wine, began to cry out, That Crispinus was affected to Otbo; that the senate was arming against the person and cause of their emperor; and that those arms were to be employed, not for him, as Crispinus gave out, but against him. This report being in a trice spread over the whole camp, a general uproar ensued; they all betook themselves to their arms, and having cut in pieces Crispinus, while he was endeavouring to repress their seditious fury, and with him such of the centurions as were remarkable for severity of discipline, they instantly advanced with their drawn swords to Rome, after to the imperial palace. Otbo was then entertaining at a great banquet the chief lords and the women of the greatest distinction in the city. As they doubted whether the danger proceeded from the casual rage of the soldiery, or the premeditated treachery of the emperor, they were all seized with dread and terror, and not knowing whether they should fly or stay, they constantly watched the countenance of Otbo; who, being alarmed at the danger threatening his guests, among whom were eighty Senators, not only dispatched forthwith the captains of the guards to soften the rage of the soldiers, but ordered the company to retire with all speed by private ways; which they did accordingly, rambling in the dark here and there, few to their own home, most to the houses of their meanest dependants, where search and pursuit were least apprehended. They were no sooner gone, than the soldiers, breaking down the gates of the palace, forced their way into the banqueting room, and there, with one voice, demanded to have a sight of Otbo, having in their passage wounded Julius Martialis and Vitellius Saturninus, two officers, who strove to oppose their tumultuous entrance. On every hand arms were brandished, and terrible menaces uttered, not only against the tribunes and centurions, but against the whole body of the senate; for as they could assign no particular victim to their fury, they claimed a latitude for a general slaughter, as if the whole senate had conspired against Otbo; till the emperor, rising from his banqueting couch, by supplications, intreaties, and even tears, to the disgrace of the imperial dignity, prevailed upon them, with great difficulty, to desist and return to their camp. The next day, the houses in the city continued closely shut up; scarce a soul was to be seen in the streets; and the soldiers, with down-cast looks, shewed rather tokens of anger and rage, than remorse. Their captains therefore, Licinius Proculus and Plotius Primus, harangued them in companies apart, and endeavoured to appease their fury; but to no purpose, till they distributed among them a large sum, five thousand sesterces a man. Then, and not before, Otbo ventured to enter the camp, where the soldiers, returned at length to a sense of their duty, gathered round him, and, with a composed behaviour, required of their own motion, that the authors of the insurrection should be put to death. The emperor, ascending the tribunal, represented to them the enormity of their late conduct, enlarged on the respect due to the senate, A sedition among the prætorian guards: Their rage and fury. They are appeased with a large donation.

The consternation of the city-

senate, and the necessity of maintaining military discipline in the camp; but as he was well apprised, that a sovereignty, like his, acquired by flagrant iniquity, could never be preserved by reviving the rigid virtue and discipline of the ancient Romans, he concluded, that of the late transgression but few were guilty, and that of these few two only should bear the punishment. His speech was favourably received, and two of the ringleaders in the late tumult were immediately executed, no one shewing the least concern for them, though capital punishment was inflicted upon them in the sight of their comrades and the whole army. Thus was the sedition at length intirely quelled; but nevertheless the city still continued in the utmost consternation, from the apprehension of a civil war, and the dread of being involved in the same calamities, which had proved fatal to it in the time of Antony and Augustus. They were, on one hand, under necessity of obliging Otho, and, on the other, afraid to disoblige Vitellius, who was supported by a strong party, and might in the end get the better of his rival. The soldiers, dispersed all over the city, crept into houses in disguised habits, as spies, watching for matter of mischief and destruction against such as were signal for their nobility or wealth. Some too believed, that certain soldiers from the army of Vitellius were arrived at Rome, to sound the affections of the Roman people. Hence all places were filled with suspicion and distrust; nay, men were not exempt from caution and fear in the most secret recesses of their own houses. But, under the eye of the public, this sort of dread chiefly prevailed: there people studied with great care to frame their faces agreeable to the quality of the news that was said to be brought, that they might not seem to betray any diffidence, when affairs bore an ambiguous aspect, or be slow in rejoicing, when they appeared prosperous. The senators chiefly, when assembled, were at a loss how to preserve in all points a safe and unexceptionable conduct. They dreaded the consequences that might attend their issuing decrees against Vitellius; and, on the other hand, were afraid, that, by forbearing to issue them, they might rouse the jealousy of Otho. In this perplexity, without publishing any decrees, they contented themselves with uttering invectives against Vitellius, but such as, being common and vulgar, were not remarkable; nay, even these the most wary took care to utter under the din of a general clamour, and when many were speaking at once^a.

The general alarm heightened by several prodigies.

THE general terror was greatly heightened by several prodigies said to have happened at this time. From the hands of the statue of Victory triumphant, standing upon her chariot in the porch of the capitol, the reins dropped, as if she were grown too weak to hold them any longer. Out of Juno's chapel suddenly arose an apparition of a size more than human. The statue of Julius Cæsar, in an island in the Tiber, turned quite round from west to east, upon a day utterly free from tempests. In Ætruria an ox spoke. Divers animals were said to have produced unnatural births. But the most affecting omen of all was, a hasty and dreadful inundation of the Tiber, whose waters, swelling to an immense height, overthrew the Sublician bridge, and, having their course obstructed by the heap of ruins, not only overflowed the adjacent quarters, but covered places, which were reckoned secure against any such disaster. Many were swept away in the streets, and many drowned in their shops and beds. Amongst the populace a famine ensued, the corn and other provisions being in great part carried away by the river. As soon as the waters returned, Otho performed the solemnity of lustration, and purified the city with sacrifices. Then weighing carefully with his friends all the methods of conducting the war, he resolved to send a powerful force by sea to invade Narbonne Gaul, since the Apennine mountains, with those of the Cottian Alps, and all the other approaches to Gaul, were beset and shut up by the armies of Vitellius. With this view he reinforced the navy and the marines, with a detachment from the prætorian bands. The direction in chief of the expedition was committed to Antonius Novellus, to Suedius Clemens, both lately centurions of the first rank, and to Æmilius Pacensis a tribune, dismissed by Galba, and now by Otho re-established. Oscus, one of the emperor's freed-men, was charged with the care of the ships, and employed to inspect the fidelity and behaviour of the other officers. As for Otho himself, he resolved to march against Cæcina and Valens, at the head of the prætorian guards and the other troops, which were then quartered in the neighbourhood of Rome. Under him commanded, as his lieutenants, Suetonius Paulinus, Marius Celsus, and Annius Gallus, all men of known valour and experience, and a and capable of performing great feats, had not Otho placed his chief confidence in Licinius Proculus, captain of the prætorian guards, and suffered himself to be governed by him, though quite unexperienced in war^b.

Otho, before he left Rome, ordered Cornelius Dolabella to retire to Aquinum in Campania, where he was kept under confinement for no crime of his, but only as obnoxious on account of the ancient lustre of his name and kindred to Galba. Then the emperor ordered many of the magistrates, and a great part of such as had been consuls, to prepare for the field, with no design of allowing them any share or charge in the war, but only under colour of accompanying him. Amongst these was included Lucius, the brother of Vitellius, whom Otho did not distinguish with any new marks either of his favour or displeasure. Vitellius had likewise left at Rome his mother, his wife, and his children; and to these Otho, either through fear or from an affected moderation, shewed a tender regard, commending them to the protection of his friends. Great was on this occasion the consternation of the city; the chief senators were disabled by age from bearing the toils of war; the nobles were sunk in sloth, and through a long peace had quite forgot the military laws; the Roman knights were unacquainted with the functions and duties of a camp. The more these degrees of men strove to conceal their fear, the more apparently they discovered it. Some, to disguise their want of courage, purchased gay and glaring armour, with fine and stately horses; others provided materials for riot and feasting, as so many implements of war. The giddy and thoughtless multitude were puffed up with great hopes. Those who found their fortunes and credit desperate during peace, rejoiced in the public commotions, promising to themselves in particular most security in the general distraction; but they all soon felt the heavy evils and pressures of war, the price of provisions being doubled, and the populace at once deprived of the usual bounties of the prince, who with much-ado could find corn and money to supply his numerous armies^c.

WHEN all Otho's forces were ready to take the field, he assembled on the fourteenth of March the senate, and to their care recommended the commonwealth. In the next place he ordered the people to meet, and in a long speech to them boasted, that his interest and title were supported by the majesty of the city and the joint consent of the people and senate. Against the partizans of Vitellius he spoke with great gentleness and restraint, taxing the German legions rather with ignorance, than with insolence and rebellion. Of Vitellius himself he made no mention; but whether from any moderation of his own, or because the person who composed his speech, refrained from opprobrious and offensive words, in due caution for himself, is uncertain; for as Otho, in all military deliberations, consulted Suetonius Paulinus and Marius Celsus, so in his civil administration he was believed to employ the talents of Galerius Trachalus. Be that as it will, the emperor's speech was received by the populace with loud shouts and many acclamations, each striving to surpass the other in strains of flattery, not from any affection to Otho, but from a custom transmitted from reign to reign of flattering any emperor, whosoever he were, with empty applauses and a hollow display of zeal. Otho, upon leaving Rome, committed to his brother Salvius Titianus the charge of maintaining its tranquillity, and of managing the other affairs of the empire. When he had thus settled matters in the city, in the best manner he could, he at last set out, at the head of the prætorian cohorts, of a chosen body of such of the prætorian bands, as served under the standard of veterans, and a vast number of marines. He marched himself before the ensigns on foot, wearing a breast-plate of iron, undressed, rough, and utterly unlike his picture drawn by common fame^d.

f FORTUNE seconded his first attempts; for his fleet, having made a descent in the province of the maritime Alps, defeated the Ligurians, whom Marius Maturus, who governed that province in quality of procurator, had armed against them, plundered Albium Intemelium, now Vintimiglia, and laid waste the whole country. On this occasion a woman having concealed her son, the soldiers suspecting, that with him she had in the same place concealed her money, put her upon the rack; but could not, with all the torments which rage and cruelty ever devised, prevail upon her to discover the place where her son lay concealed. Tacitus tells us, that pointing to her belly, she replied he lay there, and could not, with all the tortures successively tried, nor nor even with the agonies of death, be brought to return them any other answer. In the mean time, news being sent in great hurry and alarm to Fabius Valens, that Otho's fleet was upon the coast of Narbonne Gaul, he sent thither two cohorts of Tungrians, four troops of horse, and the whole squadron of Treverians, under the command of Julius Classicus. To these was joined a cohort of Ligurians and five hundred Pannonians. They no sooner arrived, than they were attacked by Otho's men, who had already landed. The engagement lasted till night, and was renewed the next day, when Vitellius's forces were at length put to flight with great slaughter. However, as the victory to Otho's men proved very bloody, they retired to Albingaunum, a municipal city in Liguria, and there continued without making any further attempts upon Narbonne Gaul. At the same time, Decimus Pacarius, governor of Corfica, having declared for Vitellius, was slain by the inhabitants, who brought his head to Otho^c.

The country between the Po and the Alps submits to Vitellius.

In Italy, the whole country, which extends from the Po to the Alps, was held by the troops of Vitellius; for the squadron of horse, named Syllana, had brought over with them several cities to his party, as we have related above; and the cohorts, which Cæcina had sent thither before him, were already arrived. To them therefore several cities submitted, not from any affection to Vitellius, or that they preferred his cause to the cause of Otho; but by long peace and ease they were quite debased, ready for any bondage, and the easy acquisition of the first comer. At Cremona Vitellius's men surprised and took prisoners a cohort of Pannonians; and between Placentia and Ticinum intercepted a hundred horse and a thousand marines. Animated with this success, they passed the Po over-against Placentia, and surprising certain scouts, filled the rest with such dread, that to Placentia they carried tidings, that Cæcina approached with his whole army. Vestrius Spurinna, who commanded in that city for Otho, and had with him five cohorts of the prætorian guards, a thousand veterans, and a few horse, though he was certain that Cæcina was not yet come, determined to confine his own men within the fortifications; but they, headstrong, unmanageable, and unacquainted with matters of war, snatching up the ensigns and standards, sallied out tumultuously, turning against their own commander, while he strove to restrain them, the points of their weapons, and giving out with fierce clamours, that a plot was intended, and Cæcina treacherously called in; so that Spurinna was obliged to approve their resolution, since it was not in his power to prevent it. With them therefore he marched out of Placentia, and arriving, when night already approached, within sight of the Po, represented to them the necessity of pitching and fortifying their camp against any sudden attack. This toil, which was utterly new to men inured to the gaieties of the city, cooled their courage at once; all over the camp dutiful and submissive language was heard; they applauded with one voice the prudent care of their commander, who, for the seat of the war, had chosen a colony so strong and opulent; and, submitting to orders, suffered themselves to be led back the same night to Placentia, where the walls were forthwith strengthened, new bulwarks added, towers raised, &c.^e In the mean time, Cæcina, having passed the Alps, entered Italy, and, after attempting in vain, by many secret conferences and mighty promises, to corrupt and debauch Otho's forces, resolved to lay siege to Placentia; and accordingly incamped before the place. The first day passed in mutual reproaches, Cæcina's men marching up to the walls, and upbraiding Spurinna's upon the ramparts, as players, dancers, idle spectators of Pythian and Olympic games, men corrupted by the licentious amusements of the theatre and circus, who triumphed in the murdering of Galba, a naked and disarmed old man, but were not very forward to face an armed enemy in the field. These reproaches so inflamed them, that the next day, when Cæcina ordered a general assault, they behaved with incredible bravery, made a dreadful slaughter of his men, and obliged them to retreat in the utmost confusion. In this conflict, the amphitheatre of Placentia, which stood without the walls, and was the most stately and capacious building in Italy, was burnt down. This defeat brought great disgrace upon Vitellius's party; and Cæcina, ashamed of his disappointment, immediately repassed the Po, and bent his march towards Cremona, which had submitted to Vitellius. Upon his march, Turullius Cerealis revolted to him with a great number of marines, and Julius Briganticus with a few horse; the latter a Batavian by nation, and commander of a squadron

- a squadron of horse : the other a centurion of the first rank, who having served in that character amongst the forces in Germany, was thence well affected to Cæcina ². About the same time, Matius Marcer, who commanded under Otho a body of two thousand gladiators, having imbarqued them upon the Po, landed unexpectedly on the opposite shore, where he surprised and defeated the auxiliary troops which belonged to the forces of Vitellius, cut many of them to pieces, and obliged the rest to fly for refuge to Cremona. Macer restrained his men from pursuing them, lest the fugitives, strengthened by fresh succours from the city, might have changed the fortune of the combat. From this restraint great distrust arose amongst the suspicious soldiers of Otho, the most cowardly urging criminal imputations against their leaders, and putting a malevolent construction upon all their proceedings. Cæcina, greatly concerned to see all his enterprizes abortive, and fearing lest Fabius Valens, who was now approaching, should rob him of the whole glory of the war, hurried with more impatience than circumspection to retrieve his honour. At a place about twelve miles from Cremona, named Castores, he secretly conveyed the flower of his auxiliaries into the woods, which lay just above the great road ; the horse he commanded to march farther on, and, after having engaged the enemy, to betake themselves to a voluntary flight, and continue it, till the auxiliaries lying in the woods had an opportunity of rising at once out of their ambush and falling upon the enemy. But this stratagem being betrayed by some deserters to Otho's generals, Paulinus and Celsus, they craftily drew Cæcina's forces into the same snare ; for Paulinus taking the command of the foot, and Celsus that of the horse, they placed three cohorts in close ranks in the high-road, and on either side of it concealed among the woods the first legion, the thirteenth, six cohorts of auxiliaries, and a thousand horse. The three cohorts in the high-road were immediately attacked by Cæcina's horse, who, after having stood their ground a while, turned their backs and fled. But Celsus, who was aware of the artifice, with-held his men from pursuing them ; and, in the mean time, the forces, which Cæcina had concealed in the woods, rose out of their ambush. Then Celsus, pretending fear, retired insensibly before them, till they found themselves surrounded on all sides ; for on both their flanks they were attacked by the cohorts and the legions, and the horse, suddenly wheeling about, fell upon them in the rear. Tacitus tells us, that Cæcina's whole army had been cut off, if the legions under the command of Paulinus had come up with more expedition ; but that general moved too slowly, and with more caution than was necessary, or indeed consistent with the rules of war. Our historian charges him with two material oversights on this occasion : the first was, that, instead of founding the charge and supporting his cavalry, by falling briskly upon Cæcina, he spent his time in filling the ditches and clearing the grounds, that he might extend his front, thinking it too early to begin to conquer, till he had provided against being conquered. By this delay leisure was given to the enemy to shelter themselves amongst the vineyards ; whence they renewed the charge, and killed the most resolute and forward of the prætorian horse. The second was his not taking advantage of the disorder the enemy were in, both in the field of battle and in the camp, but causing a retreat to be sounded very unseasonably. But Paulinus was, as our historian informs us, a man by nature wary and slow, better pleased with deliberate counsels supported by reason, than with victory resulting from chance. The soldiery complained loudly of his conduct, and prevailed upon Otho to remove him together with Celsus, and to place in their room his brother Titianus and Proculus captain of the prætorian guards. Titianus therefore was sent for, and to him was committed the rule and direction of the war, though Proculus bore in all deliberations the greater sway. The two degraded generals were kept in the camp, rather as counsellors than commanders ; for Otho entertained a mighty opinion of their experience and abilities in war ^h.

In the mean time, Fabius Valens arrived with the troops under his command at Ticinum, where, while he was fortifying his camp, news was brought of the late unsuccessful battle. Hereupon his troops accusing him of treachery, as if he had, by feigned delays, detained them from assisting at the engagement, turned away, without waiting for their general's orders, to join Cæcina. Upon the conjunction of the forces of Valens with those of Cæcina, the officers of Vitellius were for coming to a decisive battle. Otho, on the other hand, advancing to a village between Cremona and Verona, called Bedriacum, had recourse to a consultation, whether it were advise-^a able to protract the war, or risk the fortune of a battle. Upon this occasion Suetonius Paulinus, the most experienced commander of his age, declared, that it was his opinion, that haste and present action were advantagious to the enemy; but to Otho procrastination and delay, since the intire army of Vitellius was arrived, and in want of many necessaries, which obliged them to offer battle, as the speediest way of supplying their present want. On the contrary, Otho's army was abundantly provided: Italy, the senate, and people of Rome were intirely at his devotion, and ready to supply him, not only with provisions, but with treasure, more prevalent than the sword in all civil dissensions. Moreover, several provinces had revolted from Vitellius; whereas all the countries, which had at first declared for Otho, con-^b tinued inviolably attached to him. In his front lay the river Po; his cities were secure in the strength of men and walls; and that none of them would yield to the attacks of the enemy, was evident from the brave defence of Placentia. He added, that were the war protracted till the summer, the Germans, of all the enemy's forces the most formidable, would never endure so great a change of country and climate, but insensibly moulder away, and utterly vanish with all their terrors. He concluded, that as the legions of Pannonia, Dalmatia, and Mæsia were upon their march and would arrive in a few days, the emperor might then resume the present delibe-^c ration; and if it were judged adviseable to engage, he might bring into the field a far greater strength. With the counsel of Paulinus Marius Celsus concurred; and Annius Gallus, who was absent, being ill of the hurt which he had received a few days before from his horse falling with him, declared to those who were sent to learn his advice, that he entertained the same sentiments, and would have the emperor by all means to wait, at least till the legions from Pannonia, Dalmatia, and Mæsia had joined him. But Otho, Titianus his brother, and Proculus were bent upon engaging. The^d two latter, hurried by rashness and want of experience, were always averring, that fortune, and the gods, and the deity of Otho attended upon his counsels, and would undoubtedly prosper his enterprizes: to such gross flattery had they betaken themselves, that no one might dare to thwart their opinion, which in the end prevailed. Many reasons are alledged by the ancients for this strange determination: some writers tell us, that the prætorian guards, disliking the strict discipline they were then under, and longing for the diversions and gaieties of the city, grew refractory, and demanded to be led against the enemy, not doubting, but they should carry all before them. Others write, that, from an aversion to both princes, the armies had deliberated about dropping their enmity, and agreeing among themselves to set up a proper emperor, or to refer the choice to the senate; and that hence Otho's generals had declared for delays and procrastination; Paulinus particularly, who considered himself as the most ancient consular, as one famous in war, and one who, by his exploits in Britain, had gained a great name. There were, no doubt, in both armies a few, in whose breasts cordial wishes were entertained for public tranquillity, instead of civil dissen-^e sion, and for a prince worthy and innocent, in the room of two, of all men the worst, and infamous for every kind of iniquity. But Paulinus, as Tacitus judiciously observes, was too wise a man to imagine, that in an age abandoned to corruption, the common herd, who, from a passion for war, had promoted civil discords and violated the public peace, would, for the sake of peace, extinguish a fire of their own kindling and relinquish the war; or that two armies, so different in manners and language, could ever be brought to agree upon a point of such importance. Besides, the gene-^f rals and leaders in both armies, being deeply involved in debt, pressed with indigence, and for the most part guilty of enormous crimes, would have taken care to make choice of such an emperor, as was most like themselves, and should be obliged to them for his electionⁱ.

WHEN an engagement was resolved upon, it was debated next in the council, whether the emperor should be present in the action, or remove elsewhere. Titianus and Proculus advised him to retire to Brixellum, now Bersello, where, secure from the uncertain accidents of battles, he should reserve himself, they said, for the direction of the whole and the great ends of sovereignty. Paulinus and Celsus, that they might not seem to advise exposing the person of the prince to perils, dared not oppose his departure. This advice, which Otho readily embraced, was attended with^{two}

- a two bad consequences ; for he considerably weakened the army, by taking with him a numerous detachment of the best troops to guard him ; and besides, the forces remaining lost all courage, since they suspected the fidelity of their leaders. In the mean time, the band of gladiators, who served under Otho, being attacked and defeated by a detachment of Germans, Macer, who commanded the former, was by the whole army required to slaughter ; nay, they had already wounded him with a lance, and were falling upon him with their drawn swords, when, by the sudden interposition of the tribunes and centurions, he was rescued. However, Otho, being obliged to remove him, sent Flavius Sabinus, brother to Vespasian, to take the charge of the forces that had been under his command, to the great joy of the soldiers, pleased with the change of leaders, while the leaders abhorred the charge of a soldiery so licentious and unruly. After the departure of Otho to Brix-
 b ellum, the name and honour of the generalship remained with his brother Titianus, but the whole authority with Proculus. As for Celsus and Paulinus, they were on no occasion consulted, but only bore the empty title of commanders, and thence served as cloaks for the faults and mistakes of others. The tribunes and centurions were under the greatest concern, to see men of superior worth and capacity thus neglected, while the very worst men bore sway. But the common soldiers, who suspected their fidelity, were cheerful and elated, though rather disposed to canvass and interpret, than to obey and execute, the orders of their commanders. The two c armies were encamped on the banks of the Po, whence Otho's forces moved their quarters, and retired within four miles of Bedriacum, which is by Tacitus, as we have hinted above, placed between Cremona and Verona, but by Sanfon between Cremona and Mantua, upon the river Oglio, where the present city of Caneto stands. Their march was so unskilfully conducted, that in it they were extremely distressed for want of water, though it was then the spring of the year, about the thirteenth of April, and there were rivers on all hands. Proculus was for continuing the march the next day, with a design to attack the enemy encamped about sixteen miles off, at the confluence of the Adda and the Po. This resolution was utterly disapproved by Celsus and Paulinus, who declared against exposing the army, fatigued with marching and d loaded with baggage, to the enemy, who, being themselves light and unincumbered, and having moved scarce four miles, would never lose the advantage of attacking them, either as they marched with their ranks broken, or afterwards while they were fortifying their camp. This point was still under debate, when a Numidian, dispatched by Otho upon a swift horse, arrived with letters to the generals, wherein the emperor, having first reproached them in a very bitter strain, with want of spirit and resolution, commanded them peremptorily to engage without loss of time. Such orders as these, sent by princes who are at a distance, prove commonly most fatal. Of this we have innumerable instances ; and the reason is very obvious : it is impossible for a man, who is not upon the spot, to make a right choice of the e ground, the opportunity, and favourable moment for engaging. This is as much as can be expected from the most able commanders, who are upon the spot. Upon the receipt of the emperor's letters, Celsus and Paulinus dropped all opposition, and the army immediately decamped^k.

The whole power devolved upon Proculus.

Otho orders them to engage without delay.

- f THE same day, two tribunes of the prætorian guards came to Cæcina, as he was intent upon building a bridge cross the Po, and desired a conference. He was already setting himself to receive their overtures, when the scouts, in great haste, apprised him, that the enemy was at hand. The discourse with the tribunes being thus interrupted, it remained uncertain, whether they intended to betray their own party, to contrive a plot against the enemy, or had some design truly worthy and honest. Cæcina, having dismissed the tribunes, immediately quitted his post upon the river, and hastened to the camp, where he found the signal of battle already given by Valens, and the soldiers under arms. While Valens was drawing up his legions, his cavalry sallied forth by themselves, but were by a party of Otho's forces, much inferior in number, repulsed, and forced to fly for shelter to their ramparts ; whence the Italic legion, with their drawn swords, drove them back to the encounter. The legions of Vitellius were ranged in order of battle, without the least consternation or alarm ; for though the enemy approached, they were prevented from seeing them by a thick coppice. In the army of Otho an universal confusion prevailed ; the generals distrusted the soldiery, and the soldiery were incensed against their generals. The carriages and retainers to the camp were mixt and crowded amongst the ranks; from a deep ditch on each hand, the way was too streight even for an army marching, where no danger from an enemy was to be apprehended. No order was observed, some thrusting themselves into the front, some retiring to the rear, as each found himself prompted by bravery or by fear. Besides, a groundless report was spread among the foremost ranks of Otho's army, that the forces of Vitellius had revolted from him and would join them. Upon this report, they accosted the enemy with the salutation of friends; but the others returned the compliment with a hostile and threatening murmur, which not only disheartened them, but gave occasion to the rest, who were unapprised of the cause of such greeting, to apprehend that they were betrayed. At the same time, the enemy attacked them with great vigor; and Otho's men, though fewer in number and fatigued, sustained the charge with great resolution and intrepidity. As the place was embarrassed with trees, hedges, and vineyards, they fought with small regularity, bearing down one upon another, body to body, buckler to buckler, with swords and axes, after a dreadful manner, each man exerting his might, as if the event of the whole war depended upon his valor. In the open plain, between the Po and the highway, two legions chanced to encounter; the one-and-twentieth belonging to Vitellius, and named Rapax; and the first on Otho's side, intituled Adjutrix. The former was famous for feats of valor; the latter till then had never been led into the field, but was fierce, resolute, and eager of acquiring renown. They engaged with incredible fury, rejecting the use of darts, and closing resolutely with swords and axes. After a long and bloody contest, the soldiers of the first having routed the foremost ranks of the one-and-twentieth, carried off their eagle; a disgrace which so enraged this legion, that they returned to the charge, slew Orphidius Benignus, commander of the first, and took several standards. In another quarter, the thirteenth legion, which fought for Otho, was defeated by the fifth. Alphenus Varius, at the head of his Batavians, having utterly routed the body of Otho's gladiators, attacked his army in flank; which struck the prætorian bands with such dread, that they betook themselves to a precipitous flight, putting in disorder such of their own men, as still kept their ranks and faced the enemy. Thus the whole army, no longer able to stand their ground, retired in the utmost confusion, bending their course towards Bedriacum. As the ways were obstructed by the bodies of the slain, (for above forty thousand fell on both sides) the enemy made a dreadful slaughter of the fugitives, it being of no advantage to take prisoners, who in civil wars were not converted into sale and gain. Suetonius and Proculus took different routs, both shunning that to the camp, out of an apprehension of the soldiery, who had already charged their commanders with the loss of the battle. Vedius Aquila, commander of the thirteenth legion, having with more courage than discretion entered the camp, while it was yet broad day, was charged by the troops that had remained there and by those who were returned from the battle, as a traitor to his cause, and abused in a most outrageous manner; not that he had really committed any crime; but such is the custom of the crowd, for every man to cast upon others his own guilt and disgrace. Titianus and Celsus durst not venture into the camp till night, when the guards were already posted, and the tumult of the soldiery repressed. The victorious army of Vitellius pursued the fugitives within five miles of Bedriacum, where they halted, not thinking it safe to attempt forcing the enemy's camp the same day; and besides, they entertained hopes of a voluntary surrender. Otho's forces seemed disposed to make a vigorous defence, boasting, that they had been overcome by acts of treachery, and by no superior bravery of the enemy. But the officers and Titianus himself, in a council which they held the day following, agreed to send deputies to Cæcina and Valens to treat of a surrender. Their proposals were accepted, and, upon the return of the deputies, the gates of the camp were thrown open. Then both armies meeting, the conquerors, as well as the conquered, burst into tears, and, at once pleased and grieved, uttered their detestations of the sad lot of civil wars. Assembling now without distinction in the same tents, they dressed with great tenderness one another's wounds; some those of their brothers, some those of their friends. There were scarce any so exempt from affliction, as not to have some dead friend to bewail. The bodies of Orphidius and other officers of distinction were sought for and buried with

Otho, in the mean time, waited at Brixellum for an account of the battle. The first rumours were melancholy, but uncertain, till the fugitives brought a certain account of the utter defeat. The first who arrived with the dismal tidings was a common soldier, who being taxed with falsehood and cowardice by some persons about the emperor, to convince them of the truth of his account, and to shew that he had not fled for want of courage, fell upon his sword at Otho's feet; who, admiring his resolution and fidelity, cried out, No more such worthy and gallant men shall on my score be brought into danger. This Suetonius the historian tells us he learnt of his father Suetonius Lenis, who, in the battle of Bedriacum, commanded in quality of tribune the thirteenth legion, which fought for Otho^m. The battle was no-ways decisive; for Otho had still with him many brave troops inviolably attached to his cause and interest; his forces beyond the Po still remained intire; there were numerous garisons in Bedriacum and Placentia; and the legions from Mæsia, Dalmatia, and Pannonia were advancing; nay, the Asiatic, Syrian, and Egyptian legions were already near the Adriatic. But nevertheless, he was no sooner informed of the defeat of his army, than he manifestly betrayed a fixed purpose of sacrificing his life to the public tranquillity. The soldiers apprised of his design, did all that lay in their power to support him under his concern. They pressed him to take courage, since there still remained fresh forces, declaring, without flattery or deceit, that they were ready for his sake to expose themselves to the greatest dangers and suffer all extremities. Those who stood at a distance signified their zeal and ardour by stretching out their hands; such as were nearest fell at his knees, kissed his hand, and with many tears intreated him to stand by them, and to accept of that duty and fidelity which could never expire, but with their last breath. But above all, the intrepidity and fidelity of an obscure and private soldier displayed itself on this occasion; for finding the emperor stood altogether unshaken and fixt in his purpose, he drew his sword; and addressing himself to Otho; From this, Cæsar, said he, judge of our fidelity; for there is not a man amongst us, but would strike thus to serve you! Having thus spoken, he turned his sword against himself, and fell at the emperor's feet. Plautius Firmus, captain of his guards, by repeated instances, besought him not to abandon an army so faithful and zealous; soldiers so singularly affectionate and loyal. In bearing calamities, said he, more greatness of spirit is shewn, than in flying from them. To support themselves with hope, even in spite of fortune, was ever the part of the magnanimous and brave, as it was that of the timorous and spiritless, to be drawn headlong by cowardice into utter despair. As during these expressions Otho happened to look chearful or pensive, there followed shouts of joy or dismal groans. Nor was this zeal confined to the prætorian guards, who were inviolably attached to the person of Otho; but those who had been sent before the rest out of Mæsia, and were now arrived, declared, that in the approaching army the the same steadiness prevailed, and that the legions had already reached Aquileia. Hence it is evident, that the war might have been renewed, and that its issue, notwithstanding the late overthrow, was altogether uncertain. But neither by persuasions and intreaties, nor by all the apparent probability of success, could Otho be prevailed upon to continue the war, or be diverted from the resolution he had taken; a resolution which no one expected from a person of his soft and effeminate temper. Having commanded silence, he spoke to them after this manner: This day, my fellow-soldiers, which gives me such sensible proofs of your affection and loyalty, is far preferable to that on which you saluted me emperor. I therefore beseech you not to deny me the satisfaction of laying down my life for the preservation of so many brave men. To expose wantonly to fresh perils such virtue and so much fortitude, is a price, which I judge too high for the redeeming of my own life. I am well apprised, that the enemy has neither gained an intire nor a decisive victory: I have advice, that the Mæssian army is not far off; that the legions from Asia, Syria, and Egypt are near the Adriatic; that the forces in Judæa have declared for us; the senate favours our cause; we have in our power the wives and children of our enemies, &c. But alas! it is not with Pyrrhus, with Hannibal, with the Cimbrians, we fight; but it is eagle against eagle, and Rome against Rome.

Italy must bleed, whether I vanquish or am vanquished; and even he who triumphs^a will have occasion to mourn. Shall I ever bear, that such a number of Roman youth; that so many noble armies be cut off, and ravished for ever from the commonwealth? With me let me carry this satisfaction, that for my cause you were all ready to die; but be content to survive me. Vitellius began the civil war, and thence sprung the source of our struggling for the empire by arms. To me will be owing the example of struggling for it no more than once. By this rule let posterity judge of Otho. Vitellius shall again possess in safety his brother, his children, and his wife. Others have held the sovereignty longer; in a manner more glorious none ever yet relinquished it. Assure yourselves, it is my free choice to die rather than to reign, since I cannot so much advance the Roman state by wars and bloodshed, as by sacrific-^bing myself to the public peace and tranquillity. Nothing but my death can seal a lasting peace, and secure Italy against such another unhappy day. But let us no longer retard one another: let not me delay your care of your own preservation, nor you me in the pursuit of a design never to be shaken or changed. To multiply words about the subject of dying, is the part of a dastardly spirit. How much I am undaunted in this my purpose, I desire you to take this signal proof, that I complain of no man; since to be blaming the gods or men, upon the approach of death, implies a mean and indirect desire of livingⁿ.

behaviour.

AFTER this discourse, he desired those who attended him to leave him, and submit without delay to Vitellius. The young men he pressed with authority, the old^c by intreaties, addressing himself to all with great courtesy, in a language suitable to their years or dignity. At the same time he rebuked, as ill-judged and unreasonable, the tears and lamentations of his friends, with a countenance calm and composed, and a speech flowing and assured. To such as were about to depart, he ordered boats and carriages to be given. To those who were absent, he sent passports, forbidding any one to stop them in their journey. All such memorials and letters, as were signal for expressions of zeal towards him, or for invectives against Vitellius, he committed to the flames. What money and jewels he had, he distributed amongst his friends. His brother's son, Salvus Coccianus, one just in the bloom of his youth, who was bewailing him with a flood of tears, he endeavoured^d to comfort with tender expressions, bidding him be in no apprehension of Vitellius, who, he said, could not, for his whole family preserved in safety, refuse a return of mercy in this single instance. The clemency of the conqueror, continued he, I have purchased by thus hastening to die, since pressed by no desperate distress, but at a juncture when so many brave men were demanding to be led to battle, I have, for the sake of the commonwealth, forborne making a last effort. To myself I have acquired sufficient fame; to my posterity sufficient lustre. Into a house newly raised, I have translated the sovereignty, after the same had been vested in so illustrious families, namely, the Julian, the Claudian, and the Sergian: but that Cæsar has been your uncle, you must neither forget, nor too zealously remem-^eber. After this, he caused all those who were about him to retire; and withdrawing into a private room, he wrote consolatory letters to his sister, and to Messalina, who had been formerly married to Nero, and whom he himself had designed to marry, recommending to her his memory and ashes. While he was thus exercising his thoughts about his last moments, a sudden tumult interrupted him; for notice was brought him of an uproar among the soldiers, who threatened with present death all who were about to depart, as traitors and deserters. Against Verginius chiefly they were enraged, and had already besieged his house, which for his security he had shut up. Hereupon Otho, appearing again, reprimanded the authors of the insurrection, gave audience to such as were departing, and continued thus employed till they were all gone in perfect safety. He then withdrew again to his chamber, which he left open till the night was far spent, allowing free entrance to all who were desirous to see him. After this, having quenched his thirst with a draught of cold water, he called for two daggers; and having carefully examined the points of both, he placed the sharpest under his pillow. He next resolved to be fully assured that his friends were all gone; which he no sooner understood, than he lay down, passing the night in perfect repose, and, as is affirmed, not without sleep. At break of day he took the dagger, and gave himself a mortal stab on the^f left a left side of the breast. Upon hearing him groan, his freed-men entered and his slaves, with Plotius Firmus, captain of his guards, and found no more than one wound. His death was no sooner divulged, than the whole place resounded with the mournful cries of the soldiers, accusing themselves, with the deepest concern, for not watching him more carefully, and striving to save a life, which was laid down to preserve theirs. His funeral was dispatched with great expedition, (for such had been his own desire) to prevent his head being cut off and exposed to public derision. The prætorian cohorts bore his corps, magnificently attired, often kissing his wound, and his hand, and even paying him divine honours. At his funeral pile some of the soldiers slew themselves; and others who were at Bedriacum, Placentia, b and in other quarters, understanding the manner of his death, were so deeply and sensibly affected, that they slew one another, not caring to outlive a prince, whom they so tenderly loved.. To him they raised a tomb of a mean structure, and thence like to remain, with this epitaph only, To the Memory of Marcus Otho; which they thought the best security against any insults from the conqueror^a. Such was the end of Otho, in the thirty-seventh year of his age, after having reigned, according to some three months, according to others three months and five days. He derived his original from the municipal city of Tarentinum in Hetruria. His father had sustained the dignity of consul; his grandfather that of prætor. His mother's line was not of equal lustre; but far from sordid. He spent his tender years in idleness, in scandalous debaucheries his youth, and grew acceptable to Nero, purely by imitating his profligate life. To him therefore, as to the chief confident of his impure pleasures, Nero committed the care of his beloved mistress Poppæa Sabina, till he could accomplish the removal of Octavia his wife; but soon suspecting him for a rival, he sent him into Lusitania; where the administration of that province furnished a pretence for keeping him from Rome. In Lusitania he governed with gentleness and popularity, was the foremost to espouse the cause of Galba, and promoted it with vigor. Thence he conceived hopes of being by him adopted and declared his successor; but finding himself disappointed, and seeing nothing but despair in the quiet and establishment of the state, (for he lived in a course of riot and expence, c which even to the fortune of a sovereign would have proved burdensome) he revolted from Galba, and seized the empire in the manner we have related. His death was much applauded, as his life was censured; for tho' he had lived like Nero, yet he left this character behind him, that no one ever died more gloriously^b: and indeed nothing can be more glorious in a man, than to sacrifice his life for the good of his country.

AFTER the death of Otho, the soldiers began anew to mutiny; nor was there any one to restrain them. They applied to Verginius, pressing him, with many intreaties and menaces, to accept the sovereignty, or at least to go as their ambassador to Cæcina and Valens. Already they were breaking into his house, when he, by a back way, stole out and escaped them. But Rubrius Gallus, a person of great note, immediately undertook the embassy to Vitellius's commanders, and obtained pardon for all the troops that lay at Brixellum; and at the same time Flavius Sabinus prevailed upon the forces under his command to go over to the conqueror; so that war had now every-where ceased, and peace was at once re-established. Many senators had accompanied Otho from Rome, and had been afterwards by him left with a small body of troops at Mutina. The senators found themselves exposed there to great danger; for news being brought thither of the defeat, the soldiers slighted it as a report void of truth; and suspecting the senate to be disaffected to Otho, they watched the words of particulars, and wrested even their countenances and behaviour to a malignant sense.
f At last they proceeded to insult them with invectives, and seemed only to want a pretence of putting them all to the sword. On the other hand, they were afraid of being deemed disaffected to Vitellius, whose brother was among them, if they seemed slow and cool in their rejoicings for the victory. They resolved therefore to return as far as Bononia, and wait there for other advices more certain and copious. They posted men upon the several roads leading to the city, purposely to examine such as passed. By these one of Otho's freed-men being questioned, why he had left his lord? answered. That he had about him his lord's last will and commands; that he had left him indeed alive, but fixed in his purpose of dying, and of sacrificing his life to the

the public tranquillity. Hereupon they immediately declared for Vitellius, whose brother now presented himself to be flattered, as did all the senators to flatter him; when on a sudden one Cæmus, a freed-man of Nero's, arriving, affirmed, that by the arrival of the fourteenth legion, in conjunction with the forces from Brixellum, the army, which had lately conquered, was entirely routed, and the fortune of the other party retrieved and changed. What prompted him to such forgery was, that Otho's warrants for post-horses, which were now neglected, might by such tidings be restored to force: and truly Cæmus was by this means with great speed carried to Rome; but there, a few days after, put to death by Vitellius's orders. The fiction, however, was believed by the soldiers, who began anew to threaten the senators for having departed from Mutina, and declared for Vitellius; insomuch, that they were obliged to conceal themselves, not daring, for fear of the incensed soldiery, to appear abroad, till letters from Fabius Valens, assuring them of Otho's death, removed their fright^a.

Rome was, in the mean time, free from all terror and alarm; the interludes sacred to Ceres, which yearly began on the twelfth, and ended on the nineteenth, of April, were celebrating, when news was brought into the theatre, that Otho had, by a voluntary death, put an end to his life. Hereupon the spectators with loud shouts applauded the name of the new emperor, uttering against Otho the same invectives which a little before they had uttered against Vitellius. The troops in the city immediately swore allegiance to Vitellius. The people carried the images of Galba round the temples, crowned with laurels and adorned with flowers, and piled up heaps of coronets, after the manner of a sepulchre, close by the lake of Curtius, where Galba had been slain. In the senate the many honours given to former princes at intervals, and during a long course of reigning, were at once decreed to Vitellius. On the German armies high commendations were bestowed, and an embassy sent to return them public thanks, and congratulate them upon their late victory. The letters addressed by Fabius Valens to the consuls Verginius Rufus and Poppæus Vopiscus, of whom the first was absent, were publicly read, and found to be conceived in terms no-ways arrogant; but more applauded was the modesty of Cæcina, who had not sent any, it being deemed assuming in any but the emperor to write to the senate and magistrates^r. In the mean time, Italy was afflicted with greater calamities than she had suffered during the war. The soldiers of Vitellius, distributed amongst the cities and municipal towns, committed most dreadful devastations, without sparing even the temple. Some, in the disguise of soldiers, killed their particular enemies; and the soldiers themselves, as they were well acquainted with the country, marking out the richest inhabitants, plundered their houses and farms, putting all to fire and sword without mercy, if any resistance was offered. Their generals durst not restrain them, being themselves equally guilty and awed by their men. Of the two Cæcina was less addicted to avarice, but courted the favour of the soldiery. Valens was himself infamous for pillage and rapine, and thence blind to the excesses of others. Thus, by so mighty a force of foot and horse, by such acts of violence, so many depredations and insults, was Italy quite exhausted, and many of the most wealthy inhabitants reduced to beggary^s.

Vitellius, in the mean time, not yet apprised of the success of his own arms, having left Hordeonius Flaccus with a sufficient force to guard the banks of the Rhine, was marching towards Italy with the residue of the German army, reinforced with eight thousand men drawn from Britain, and fresh levies hastily made amongst the Gauls. After a few days march, he received the agreeable news of the victory at Bedriacum and the death of Otho. Hereupon, transported with joy, he assembled his men, and from the tribunal acquainted them with the intelligence he had received, bestowing mighty praises upon the bravery of his victorious troops. The army, not yielding in the base arts of flattery to the senate, made him at this juncture a general request, that he would raise his favourite freed-man Asiaticus to the equestrian dignity. The emperor, with seeming indignation, rejected their demand; but what in the face of the public he had refused, he soon after privately conferred at a banquet, honouring Asiaticus, a most infamous and rapacious slave, with the gold ring, the badge of knighthood. This proceeding was not a little resented by the soldiery. As he was marching through Gaul, other messengers came with tidings, that to his party had acceded both the Mauritanias, viz. the Tingitana and Cæsariensis; Lucius Albinus, who, in quality of procurator, governed there and had declared for Otho, being killed,

- a killed by the Moors, upon a report, that Albinus, scorning the title of procurator, intended to usurp the ensigns of majesty and the royal name of Juba. With him were slain Afinius Pollio, who commanded a body of horse, Festus and Scipio, both captains of cohorts, and several other officers of distinction. Into these transactions Vitellius made no inquiry, nor took any notice of the murder of so many great men, a hasty hearing being all he afforded to any affair, however important. His army he commanded to pursue their march by land; he himself sailed down the Saône, with-

- b out the lustre and appointment of an emperor, till Junius Blæsus, governor of Lionese Gaul, a man of great generosity and proportionable wealth, furnished him with a princely train, and accompanied him with great state and magnificence. But this very behaviour provoked Vitellius against him, tho' he then disguised his aversion under many courteous expressions. At Lions he was met by the generals of both parties, the conquerors and the conquered. Valens and Cæcina he commended in public, and placed them on each side his chair of state. Soon after he ordered the whole army to march out and meet his son, yet an infant, who was brought covered with an imperial coat of armour. His father, taking him thus dressed in his arms, bestowed upon him the surname of Germanicus and all the marks of sovereignty. He freely forgave Salvius Titianus, Otho's brother, the instinct and tenderness of nature, which had prompted him to espouse his brother's cause, and his own want of abilities pleading for him. Of Marius Celsus we are only told, that Vitellius reserved for him the

- c consulship, to which he had been formerly designed, and which he was to discharge in the month of July. He long postponed admitting Suetonius Paulinus and Licinius Proculus, keeping them in suspense like criminals. At length he heard them, when they both made a defence rather necessary than honourable; nay, altogether unworthy of a man of Paulinus's character; for upon themselves they freely took the shame of treason, ascribing to a fraud concerted between them the long march before the battle, the great fatigue of Otho's soldiers, the intermixing the carriages among the troops, when drawn up in battle-array, &c. Vitellius gave credit to the confession of their treachery, and forgave them the crime of fidelity, with which they were charged. Galerius Trachalus, who composed Otho's speech, was saved by Galeria,

But all the centurions, who had signalized their faith and bravery in the cause of Otho, were by the new emperor's orders put to the sword; which estranged from him the minds of the soldiery, especially of the Illyrian legions. However, he suffered the last wills of such as died fighting for Otho to continue in force, and the law in behalf of those who died intestate. Before him he sent an edict to Rome, to signify, that he deferred receiving the name of Augustus, and would not at all accept that of Cæsar. By another he ordered the astrologers to depart Italy by the calends of October; which was no sooner published, than a libel was hung up in the same style, ordering, in the name of the astrologers, Vitellius Germanicus to quit the world by the same day; which so incensed him against all those of that profession, Dolabella falsely accused.
- e that no sooner was any of them detected, than he caused them, without further inquiry, to be forthwith executed. By a third edict he enjoined, under a heavy penalty, that thenceforth no Roman knight should debase himself to fight amongst the gladiators or with the wild beasts; a practice which had been greatly encouraged by former emperors. Before Vitellius left Lions, he dispatched orders to Rome for the execution of Dolabella, who had been confined by Otho, as we have related above, to the city of Aquinum, and, upon tidings of the death of that prince, was returned to Rome. The crimes alledged against him were, that he had broke out of prison, and, presenting himself as a new leader to the vanquished party, had attempted to corrupt the cohort quartered at Ostia. These crimes were urged against him before Flavius Sabinus, governor of the city, by Plautius Varus, a man of prætorian dignity and one of Dolabella's intimate friends. The charge of treason could not be proved; but nevertheless Vitellius, who dreaded a man of his birth and abilities, and likewise hated him on account of his having married Petronia, his divorced wife, resolved by all means to get rid of one, whom he looked upon as a competitor. Having therefore sent for him from Rome, and directed him in the letter he wrote to him, not to take the Flaminian road, but to come round by Interamna, now Terni, he placed assassins there, with orders privately to dispatch him; but they, without waiting till he arrived at the place appointed, cut his throat in an inn upon the way, while he was not under the least apprehension of danger. This instance of cruelty raised great mur-

gluttony.

FROM Lions Vitellius removed to Vienne, where he publicly administered justice and thence continued his rout to Italy. As he was a man of a most voracious appetite, which Tacitus styles quite beastly and boundless, and greatly addicted to banquetting, from Rome and Italy were brought him dainties of all sorts and every incentive to gluttony, the roads from both seas being continually filled with carriers loaded with viands for the emperor's table. The chief men of the municipal cities, through which he passed, being quite beggared by their magnificent feasts, that being the only means of making their court to the new prince. The soldiers, following the example of their leader, rioted in all manner of excesses, plundering and laying waste, without controul, the cities, villages, and farms contiguous to the road. The emperor was overtaken on his rout by Marcus Cluvius Rufus, governor of Spain, who came to clear himself of the crimes with which he was charged by Hilarius, the emperor's freed-man, who urged, that, upon advice of the contest between Otho and Vitellius, Cluvius had attempted to establish an independent principality, and to appropriate to himself both the provinces of Spain. But, the charge appearing groundless, Vitellius ordered his freed-man to be punished, and took Cluvius into the number of his chief favourites, commanding him to attend him, without depriving him of the government of Spain, which he still administered, though absent. The like honour was not shewn to Trebellius Maximus, who had fled out of Britain, frightened by the menaces of the soldiers there. In his room was sent Vettius Bolanus, then attending at court. Vitellius arriving in Italy, found the country filled with troops, those of his own army and the army of Otho, dispersed amongst the villages and municipal towns, and mixed together; which occasioned continual quarrels and innumerable disorders: for the vanquished legions continued still in their former disaffection, and breathed nothing but war. The emperor therefore resolved to separate them, and deliver Italy from so heavy a burden. The fourteenth legion was accordingly remanded back to Britain, from whence they had been by Nero called over. With them were sent the Batavian cohorts, who had fought for Vitellius; whereas the legion had espoused the cause of Otho; and hence a source of perpetual quarrels. At Turin especially a tragical battle had ensued, while a Batavian insulted an artificer, as having defrauded him, and a soldier of the legion protected the artificer, as his host, had not two prætorian cohorts quartered there, by espousing the party of the legionaries, intimidated the Batavians as the weaker. The emperor, when informed of their disagreement, ordered the Batavians, as men in whom he could confide, to be incorporated with his own army, and the legion to be led forthwith over the Alps, bending their rout so as to avoid Vienne; which city was thought to be disaffected to Vitellius. But, notwithstanding this order, they no sooner descended from the Alps, than they turned their ensigns to Vienne, and were marching thither, till such as were prone to mutiny were by the better-disposed prevailed upon to march back, in compliance with the emperor's orders, and pursue their rout to the coast of the ocean, whence they were transported in a body to Britain. In the next place, the prætorian cohorts were first separated, and then discharged; but sweetened with the rewards which were bestowed upon such as had fully served their term of warfare. The first legion of marines was sent into Spain, to be there tamed with tranquillity and repose. The seventh and eleventh were sent back to their old quarters in Dalmatia and Pannonia. The thirteenth was kept in Italy, and there employed in erecting two amphitheatres, since Cæcina and Valens were preparing each a public combat of gladiators, the former at Cremona, the other at Bononia. Thus Vitellius parted and dispersed, without the least noise or disturbance, the disaffected troops which had served under Otho; but had not authority enough to restrain the licentiousness of his own army. As the officers, and even the common soldiers, usually adopt the manners of their emperors, about Vitellius was seen only universal disorder, universal drunkenness, and all things rather resembling nocturnal revellings and the debauches of Bacchanals, than a Roman army and military discipline. In this situation a tumult arose, which derived its beginning from matter of pastime, but was not quelled without much bloodshed. Two soldiers, one of the fifth legion the other from amongst the auxiliary Gauls, having, while they sported together, provoked each other to wrestle, the legionary was thrown down, and the Gaul triumphed over him with great scorn. This immediately divided those, who had assembled only as beholders, into two parties; ino-

much,

- a much, that the soldiers of the legions, falling with fury upon the auxiliaries, put two cohorts to the sword. But this tumult was in the end composed by another; for dust and the lustre of arms being discerned at a distance, a general cry ran in an instant through the whole army, that the fourteenth legion had returned, and was approaching with hostile minds; for they were known to be disaffected to Vitellius. Hereupon they all joined to oppose the common enemy. But their fear was soon allayed; for it proved the rear of their own army. However, as they chanced, in the mean time, to meet a slave belonging to Virginus, they charged him as one employed to assassinate Vitellius; and, rushing into the banqueting-room, insisted, that Virginus should be put to death. Tho' Vitellius entertained not the least doubt about the innocence of Virginus, yet it was with the utmost difficulty that he prevailed upon the enraged soldiery, to forbear shedding the blood of one, who had borne the supreme dignity of consul, and been once their own general^a.

- THE next day, Vitellius gave audience to the ambassadors from the senate, whom he had ordered to wait for him at Ticinum, now Pavia; then he entered the camp of the victorious army, where he was received with loud shouts and joyful acclamations. After he had commended the zeal and bravery of the conquering legions, and promised them their usual rewards, he sent back to their own country the eighteen Batavian cohorts, which had attended him in his journey, having found by experience, that they were altogether ungovernable and too prone to mutiny. He likewise dismissed to their several territories all the auxiliary Gauls, who had been levied in the beginning of the war. At the same time, that the revenues of the empire, already exhausted, might be able to supply his wild extravagances, he ordered the number of men in the legions and auxiliaries to be retrenched, put a stop to further levies, and granted discharges to all who required them; which, to those who continued in the service, proved matter of great disgust, since upon them, now reduced to a few, rested all the military duties before shared amongst many. From Ticinum the emperor bent his rout to Cremona, where he beheld the public sports, exhibited with extraordinary magnificence by Cæcina. While he was there, he conceived a desire of viewing the field at Bedriacum, and surveying the scene of the recent victory. As the battle had been fought not quite forty days before, the field was still covered with bodies all rent and deformed, with torn and mangled limbs, carcases of horses and men putrified, and the ground dyed with corruption and gore; all the trees felled, the corn trod down, and the whole a shocking scene of cruelty, slaughter, and destruction. The emperor, however, persisted in his resolution, and with a great retinue set out for Bedriacum; the people of Cremona strewing the road with flowers and laurel, rearing altars, and sacrificing victims, even where the ghastly remains of their slaughtered countrymen were still to be seen. Cæcina and Valens accompanied him, and pointed out the several quarters of the combat: Here the legions began the onset; here the horse in a body rushed upon the enemy's squadrons; from thence the auxiliaries fell upon the rear; in this place the one-and-twentieth legion engaged and routed the first; in that the thirteenth was put to flight by the fifth, &c. The tribunes and commanders of the several legions recounted and heightened, by boasts and invention, their own feats of bravery. The common soldiers too, turning aside from the road to review the field, from space to space, called to mind the several conflicts passed, some with shouts of joy, but many not without concern, and even tears, in beholding the bodies of the slain, mingled in heaps with the carcases of horses and other beasts of burden. As for Vitellius, he turned not once his eyes from a spectacle so tragical, nor shewed he the least horror at the sight of so many thousand Roman citizens slain and unburied; nay, he even testified joy, and offered a pompous sacrifice to the tutelar gods of the place. Suetonius writes, that some of his train being offended with the stench of the half-putrified bodies, the emperor was so imprudent as to tell them, A dead enemy smells well, but a dead citizen better; evidently betraying, by that impious saying, his natural bent to cruelty and bloodshed. The same writer adds, that afterwards calling for a large quantity of wine, he first drank plentifully himself, and then caused the rest to be distributed amongst his soldiers. From Bedriacum, Vitellius pursued his rout to Bononia; and the nearer he advanced to that place, his march proved the more loose and debauched. Amongst his military bands were blended blended bands of the comedians and herds of eunuchs, agreeable to the genius of the court in Nero's reign: for of him Vitellius always spoke with admiration and praise. At Bononia he assisted at the combat of gladiators exhibited by Valens, which was extremely pompous and magnificent, all the decorations of the entertainment having been brought from Rome. Before he set out from thence, that he might to Valens and Cecina procure some vacant months for exercising the consulship, he abridged the term appointed for others, and Valerius Marinus, designed consul by Galba, he postponed to a farther time, for no offence given, but because Valerius was a man apt to acquiesce under any injury. As he was on his march from Bononia, he received letters from his friends in Syria and Judæa, informing him, that the provinces in the east had taken the oath of fidelity to him. As he dreaded Vespasian and upon the very mention of his name was frequently observed to start, he no sooner received these tidings, than both he and his army, having now no rival power to fear, abandoned themselves to all the excesses of cruelty, lust, and rapine. In all the great towns through which he passed, every pleasure, and every diversion, proved a bait to stop him. He entered the cities in a kind of triumph, and stirred not upon the rivers but in his painted galleys, curiously adorned with garlands of flowers, and plentifully stored with the most exquisite delicacies and incentives to gluttony. He was accompanied by threescore thousand armed men, a greater number of retainers to the camp, and an immense multitude of buffoons, mimics, players, singers, charioteers, &c. for in such disgraceful familiarities he took great pleasure. Among these there was no order or discipline; nay, their rapines and daily disorders, however insupportable, proved to the emperor matter of sport and diversion. Hence, not satisfied with free quarters where-ever they came, they enfranchised slaves, plundered the houses of their hosts, insulted their wives and children, and, where any resistance was offered, beat, wounded, and killed at their pleasure; for tho' they were constantly quarrelling among themselves, yet, in contesting with the peasants, they were always unanimous. Not only the colonies, villages, and municipal cities were consumed by furnishing such vast supplies of provision; but, as the grain was then ripe, the lands were stript and laid waste. As the emperor drew near Rome, the crowd, great in itself, was mightily increased by the arrival of the senators and Roman knights, who came out to meet the emperor; a compliment which some paid out of fear, others out of flattery. When the mighty multitude was within seven miles of Rome, Vitellius caused a quantity of meat ready dressed to be distributed among his soldiers, to every man his portion, as if he had been fattening a number of gladiators. In the mean time, the populace, who came in droves to the camp and were scattered all over it, while the soldiers heeded them not, cut and conveyed away their belts without being perceived; which it seems, was a joke in great vogue with the multitude and the rabble of the city. But the soldiers, who were strangers to such jokes and could not brook them, upon being asked by way of derision, what was become of their belts? ran to arms, and with their drawn swords falling upon the disarmed multitude, slaughtered great numbers of them, which occasioned a general alarm and consternation in the city. When the tumult in the camp was composed, Vitellius, mounted upon a stately courser and in his coat of armour, with his sword by his side, began to advance to the gates of the city, ordering the senate and people to march before him. But being advised by his friends not to enter the city in his warlike dress, as if it had been taken by storm, he put on the senatorial robe, and made an entry altogether orderly and pacific, surrounded with standards and colours, and followed by his numerous troops; the whole a glorious sight, and an army worthy of a better emperor. In this state he went to the capitol, to offer sacrifice to Jupiter; and there finding his mother Sextilia, embraced and honoured her with the title of Augusta. From the capitol, he marched in the same pomp to the imperial palace. The next day, he assembled the senate, and made a public speech, in which he promised extraordinary advantages from his administration, uttered high and pompous things of himself, and chiefly enlarged upon his temperance, tho' all Italy had seen him, during his march, wallowing in voluptuousness and continually intoxicated with wine. The thoughtless multitude, however, broke out into loud acclamations and wishes; and, as he refused the title of Augustus, they pressed him so, that he accepted it at last with a as much vanity as he had before refused it. He likewise took upon him the office of chief pontiff; but was so ignorant of the religious rites, that a few days after, that is, on the eighteenth of July, he published an edict concerning the celebration of certain solemnities, tho' that day had been always held unlucky, because on it had happened the tragical overthrows at Cremera and Allia. His chief study was to gain the good graces and applause of the rabble. With this view he frequented the theatre and circus, exhibited public shews, and did all that lay in his power to keep them in good humour. He went often to the senate, even when the deliberations were about things of small moment. As Helvidius Priscus, prætor elect, chanced to offer his sentiments against those of the emperor; he seemed at first to resent it; b but afterwards returning to himself, he answered the senators who interposed, that it was nothing new nor surprising, that two senators should be of different opinions; and that he himself had often opposed Thrasea; a comparison which was generally ridiculed. In room of the prætorian cohorts, which he had discharged, he raised sixteen new ones and four city cohorts, each containing a thousand chosen men. For captains of the prætorian guards, he appointed Publius Sabinus, raised from the command of a cohort, and Julius Priscus, then only a centurion. Priscus owed his preferment to the interest of Valens, and Sabinus his to that of Cæcina; for by these two favourites all the functions of sovereignty were discharged, and no portion of power left to Vitellius. They strove to excel each other in credit and sway, in c greatness of train, in numerous levees and dependents; and hence were ever at variance with one another, their ancient and mutual hatred, which, even during the war, had been ill-disguised, being inflamed by the malignity of their several friends. However, this their animosity did not render them more remiss in seizing for themselves fine houses and gardens, and the wealth of the empire. Asiaticus too, formerly the emperor's pathic and now his freed-man, had a great share in the administration; for, before two months were elapsed, he is said to have equalled in wealth all former imperial freedmen. As for Vitellius, he quite abandoned the functions of an emperor, resigning himself entirely to riot, luxury, and gluttony. In his court no man strove to rise by virtue or ability. One only road there was to preferment, d namely, by means of consuming banquets, to gorge the appetite of the emperor, ever craving, and never satiated. He eat constantly three, and often four and five, meals a day, having brought himself to a habit of discharging his stomach by vomiting when he pleased. All his meals were expensive almost beyond belief, but not always at his own charge; for he frequently invited himself to his friends houses to breakfast in one place, to dine in another, and to sup in a third, all on the same e day. He was every-where entertained in a most sumptuous and expensive manner: but of all these entertainments, the most memorable was made for him by Lucius his brother; in which, if *Suetonius*² and *Eutropius*³ are to be credited, two thousand different dishes of fish and seven thousand of fowl were served up; the choicest of both sorts that the sea and land afforded. His own profuseness fell not much short of his brother's at the dedication of a charger, which, by reason of its vastness and capacity, he termed the target of Minerva. It was nevertheless filled with the sounds of the fish called scari, the brains of pheasants and peacocks, the tongues of birds called phænicopteri, and the small guts of lampries, brought from the Carpathian sea and the farthest coasts of Spain. As he judged it sufficient to enjoy present pleasures, without troubling himself about future events, he squandered away in banquets above seven millions of our money in four months time^b; nay, Josephus tells us, that if he had reigned long, the whole wealth of the empire would not have been sufficient to supply the expences of his table. Besides the vast sums he consumed by his riotous living, he erected at a great charge stables for the use of charioteers, exhibited almost daily shews in the circus, combats in the theatre and amphitheatre, those of gladiators, those of wild beasts, and in the most flowing plenty wantonly scattered treasure. But nothing gave greater disgust to the virtuous, tho' it proved matter of joy to the profligate and debauched, than his solemnizing with great pomp in the field of Mars the obsequies of Nero, and obliging the Augustal priests, an order by Tiberius consecrated to the Julian family, to assist at that ceremony^c.

emperor.

WHILE Vitellius was thus wasting the wealth of the empire in voluptuousness and consuming banquets, fortune, or rather providence, was raising him a competitor in a distant part of the world. Vespasian had been sent by Nero, as we have related elsewhere, with three legions and a considerable number of auxiliaries, to make war upon the Jews, which he was carrying on with great success, when news was brought him of the death of that prince and the accession of Galba to the empire. Hereupon he immediately dispatched his son Titus to pay homage to the new emperor, and to receive his orders concerning the prosecution of the war. But receiving upon his arrival at Corinth, as he had been long stopped by contrary winds, certain advice of the murder of Galba, and at the same time understanding that Vitellius had taken up arms and designed to dispute the empire with Otho, he resolved to return to Judæa, to receive there farther instructions from his father. Having therefore left Greece, he steered his course to the island of Rhode, to that of Cyprus, and thence to Syria. In the island of Cyprus his curiosity prompted him to visit the temple of Venus at Paphos, which was at that time highly renowned amongst the natives as well as foreigners. After he had surveyed the signal wealth of the temple, the donations of princes, and other curiosities, he began to consult the oracle, first concerning the security of his voyage, and then proposed, but in dark terms, questions concerning himself. The priest, by name Sostratus, returned him in public a short answer, but desired a secret interview, wherein he disclosed to him his future grandeur. Hereupon, full of hopes, he proceeded to his father; but before his arrival the armies in the east had already sworn fidelity to Otho. In Judæa, three legions, as we have hinted above, were under the command of Vespasian; men thoroughly exercised in war. Mucianus governed Syria at the head of four legions. Between these two commanders, as they ruled in two bordering provinces, great animosities had reigned; which, however, they dropped upon the death of Nero, and agreed to act in concert for their mutual security and interest. This union was first begun by the interposition of their common friends, and afterwards accomplished by Titus. Into the same confederacy were gained the tribunes, the centurions, and by degrees the common soldiers, who, upon hearing that Otho and Vitellius were contending for the empire, began to rage and complain, that while others enjoyed rewards for bestowing the empire, they alone were doomed slaves to every emperor. The ardour of the soldiery was well known to the generals; but they judged proper to wait the issue of the war between Otho and Vitellius. Nay, even after Otho's death, Vespasian took the usual oath to Vitellius, and wished him a prosperous reign in presence of his army, as a precedent for them to follow. His troops heard him with disgust and silence, and were not without great difficulty prevailed upon to take the same oath, thinking themselves no less able to create and support an emperor, than the German legions or the prætorian bands. They were seven legions, with mighty auxiliaries, and the two provinces of Syria and Judæa were in their possession: to them lay contiguous that of Egypt, which was governed by Tiberius Alexander, by birth an Egyptian, at the head of two legions. Several forces were quartered in Cappadocia and Pontus, upon the frontiers of Armenia, in Asia, and the other provinces. The governor of Egypt, who was intirely addicted to Vespasian, accounted for his own the third legion then in Mæsia, since it had been translated thither out of Egypt. Hopes too were entertained, that the other legions in Illyricum would espouse the same interest. Vespasian, however, continued still in suspense, considering with himself, how dangerous it was to cast himself, at the age of sixty, and his two sons Titus and Domitian in the prime of their years, upon the caprice of fortune and fate of war: in private pursuit, room was always left for retreat; but to those who strive for the sovereignty, no middle lot remains; they must either reign or perish. At the same time, he had before his eyes the great strength of the German army; a thing perfectly known to him, who was a man of great experience in war. However, he yielded at length to the solicitations of Mucianus and the other officers, promising to assume the title of emperor, when a proper opportunity offered. Hereupon the two commanders, after having spent several days in private conferences, parted, Mucianus to Antioch, and Vespasian to Cæsarea, the former the metropolis of Syria, the latter of Judæa. In the mean time, at Alexandria was begun the example of acknowledging Vespasian for emperor, through the haste and zeal of Tiberius Alexander, who brought the legions there to swear allegiance to him on the first of July, which was the day ever afterwards kept

- a kept and solemnized as the first of his reign. The army in Judæa took to him in person the same oath on the third of July, with such ardour, that they would not wait the arrival of Titus, who was then on his journey back from Syria, where he had been concerting measures with Mucianus. These glad tidings no sooner reached Syria, than Mucianus administered to his soldiers, who were themselves well-disposed, the oath to Vespasian. Before the fifteenth of July the whole province of Syria had taken the same oath. To the party too acceded Sobemus king of Edessa, Antiochus king of Comagene, and Agrippa king of Ituræa, who was returned with great expedition from Rome, upon private intelligence conveyed to him by his friends concerning the transactions in the east. Allegiance was likewise sworn by all the maritime provinces, extending to Asia and Achaia, and by all the inland regions bordering upon Pontus and the two Armenias^d.

- b Vespasian, having now taken upon him the imperial authority, established in the first place, at Berytus in Phœnicia, a council for the direction of all important affairs. Thither repaired Mucianus, with a train of general officers and tribunes, and of all such centurions and private men as made a signal appearance. From the army too in Judæa came a great number of the principal officers, who, while they strove to surpass each other in pomp and parade, furnished the appearance of the court and grandeur of an emperor. The first step taken for prosecuting the war was, to enlist men, and to recal to the service the dismissed veterans. Fortified cities were allotted for forging of arms. At Antioch money was coined, gold and silver. All these undertakings were, in their several quarters, diligently dispatched by careful and capable inspectors. To the kings of Parthia and Armenia, Vologeses and his brother Tiridates, ambassadors were sent; and at the same time provision was made, that, when the legions were withdrawn to prosecute the civil war, the countries behind should not be left naked and defenceless. It was resolved in a council of all the chief officers, that Titus should carry on the war in Judæa, Vespasian seize the streights leading into Egypt, and Mucianus with part of the forces encounter Vitellius. To all the generals and armies letters were sent, with orders to invite to arms, with the promise of rewards, the prætorian soldiers who had been disbanded by Vitellius. In the mean time, Mucianus, at the head of the sixth legion and thirteen thousand veterans, began his march, acting rather like a colleague, than a minister, of the emperor. He bent his rout through Cappadocia and Phrygia to Byzantium, where he had ordered the fleet to attend him. He loaded the countries, through which he passed, with exorbitant taxes; for which, however, the craving necessities of war furnished an excuse. Out of his own treasure too he helped to support the war; thus liberal of a private sum, which he was sure to repay himself with usury out of the public. The rest contributed after his example; but few were found who recovered their share^e.

- c In the mean time, the Illyrian army, upon advice that the legions in the east had declared Vespasian emperor, espoused the same party with extraordinary zeal. The third legion, then in Mœsia, was the foremost; the eighth and the seventh, intitled Claudiana, followed the example of the third, being both devoted to Vespasian, though they had not been in the last fight. They had indeed advanced as far as Aquileia, and there hearing melancholy tidings of Otho, insulted those who brought them, rent the standards bearing the name of Vitellius, and, sharing the public money amongst themselves, acted with open hostility. Hence, considering that they might urge to Vespasian these acts of violence as matter of service and merit, whereas they must expect to be punished for them by Vitellius, they not only declared for the former, but by letters solicited the army in Pannonia into the confederacy, and were preparing to have recourse to force, if they refused. In Pannonia the thirteenth legion and the seventh, called after the name of Galba, acceded without hesitation to the cause of Vespasian, being chiefly instigated by Antonius Primus. He was a native of Tolouse; and there, while he was a youth, known by the nickname of Becco, or rather Beccoc, which, in the language of the Gauls, signified the bill of a cock. He had been degraded under Nero from the senatorial dignity, for forging a will; but restored to his rank by Galba, who likewise preferred him to the command of the seventh legion. He was believed to have made frequent applications to Otho by letters, offering to serve him in the capacity of general; but being by him neglected, he had borne no share in that war. When he found, that Vespasian was likely to prevail, abandoning Vitellius, tellius, he betook himself to him, and proved a mighty addition to the cause; for ^a he was a man of great personal bravery, daring, and enterprising, a prompt speaker, powerful in popular tumults, and, tho' rapacious, profuse, and in peace altogether wicked and corrupt, yet very useful in war. The Mælian and Pannonian armies drew after them the forces in Dalmatia. Into Britain two dispatches were sent to the fourteenth legion, others into Spain to the first; for they had both engaged for Otho against Vitellius. At the same time, letters were dispersed over all the territories of the Gauls ^e.

Vitellius was first informed of the revolt of the third legion in Mæsia; which intelligence was conveyed to him by Aponius Saturninus, who commanded in that province, but much softened and qualified. The emperor's friends too, soothing him with ^b flattering speeches, took care to put favourable constructions upon the ill tidings. Vitellius himself, in a harangue to the soldiers, inveighed against the prætorians lately discharged, as if they had published lying reports, and assured both the soldiery and people, that there was no ground to fear a civil war. The name of Vespasian he took care to suppress, and dispersed soldiers all over the city, with directions to silence the rumour among the populace; a precaution which greatly increased the public alarm. From Germany, however, from Britain, and from both Spains, he sent for succours, but in a very negligent manner, the better to conceal the necessity which pressed him. In the provinces and commanders of the provinces, no less remissness was found: Hordeonius Flaccus, who commanded in Germany, and Vettius Bolanus, go- ^c vernor of Britain, were wavering in their fidelity to Vitellius; nor in Spain was there any forwardness or expedition shewn, the commanders of the three legions there, men equal in authority, (for over those provinces presided then no ruler of consular dignity) watching the fortune of the war, and being ready to follow it. In Africa, the legion and cohort levied by Clodius Macer, and afterwards discharged by Galba, upon orders from Vitellius, returned to the service. The youth too of the province offered themselves to be enlisted with signal alacrity, Vitellius having ruled there as proconsul with great uprightness, as had Vespasian in the same quality with ignominy and public hatred. Valerius Festus, governor of the province, promoted at first the inclinations of the people with exemplary zeal; but soon after beginning to waver, ^d while he asserted in public the cause of Vitellius, by secret intelligence he encouraged that of Vespasian, being resolved, whatever party prevailed, to maintain the justice of the stronger ^e.

Antonius Primus is for invading Italy with the Illy-rian army.

THE measures concerted and agreed on by Vespasian and Mucianus were, that the Illyrian army should advance as far as Aquileia, possess themselves of the Pannonian Alps, and there wait, till their forces from all quarters behind them came up, in order to enter Italy the following year in a body. In the mean time, the fleet was to keep constantly cruizing both in the Mediterranean and Adriatic seas, in order to prevent the conveying of corn to Rome from Egypt, and provisions from Achaia or Sicily. By this means they did not doubt, but Italy would be obliged to submit without bloodshed. But these orders did not reach the Illyrian army, till it was too late to put them in execution; for the leaders of Vespasian's party in Illyricum, having held a council at Petovio, now Pettaw in Stiria upon the Drave, to deliberate, whether they should content themselves with guarding the passes of the Pannonian Alps, till the forces behind them advanced, or, by a resolution more daring, march forward and venture a struggle for Italy, some indeed thought it adviseable to wait the arrival of succours, magnifying the fame and renown of the German legions; but Antonius Primus, who was against all delay, argued, that to themselves dispatch was altogether advantageous, and to Vitellius only pernicious; since the German legions, once indeed formidable, were, by haunting the circus and theatres, and following ^f the idle diversions of the city, at present utterly softened and debauched, and dreadful to none but their hosts; whereas if time were allowed them, their ancient vigor would still return, by their application to the cares and pursuits of wars. Not far from them, added he, lies Germany, from whence a sure recruit of forces; beyond the Channel, Britain; just by, Gaul, as also both Spains; from all a ready supply of men, horses, and contributions. Italy itself is in their possession, with the immense treasures of Rome. The protracting of the war therefore to another summer will prove highly advantageous to them; but in this interval where shall we find provisions?

a fions? where money? Let us therefore delay no longer, but, with a bold push, make an irruption into the boundaries of Italy. The measures which I advise, I am resolved to pursue. You, who are yet free to follow fortune on either side, stay, and with you detain the legions. To me a few cohorts, lightly equipped, will be sufficient. You shall soon hear that I have opened my way into Italy, and shaken the power of Vitellius. You will then be glad to follow in the track of one who has conquered for you. This speech, uttered with eyes darting fire and a fierce and thundering voice, moved even such as were most cautious and wary. The common foldiers, who, together with the centurions, had conveyed themselves into the council, scorning the resolution of others as cold and spiritless, extolled him as the only b brave man, the only resolute leader. His resolution being generally approved of, His proposal approved. to render the march into Italy secure, letters were forthwith dispatched to Aponius Saturninus, who had already joined the party of Vespasian, with directions to follow in haste with his army from Mæsia. That the provinces, thus bereft of their armies, might not be exposed to the incursions of the bordering nations, the chiefs of the Jazyges, a Sarmatian nation, were taken into the service and retained in pay. Into the party too were drawn Sido and Italicus, kings of the Suevians, men noted for their attachment and fidelity to the Romans. On the side towards Rhætia guards of auxiliaries were posted, that country being governed by Portius Septimius the procurator, a man unshaken in his fidelity to Vitellius. Sentilius Felix was ordered to possess himself of the bank of the Oenus, now the Ins, flowing between Rhætia and Noricum.
c These precautions being taken, Primus marched with great expedition to invade Italy, at the head of a chosen body of infantry and part of the horse. He was accompanied by Arvius Varus, an officer of great bravery and experience in the art of war, which he had learned under the renowned Corbulo, whom he was supposed, in secret conferences with Nero, to have accused, and thereby occasioned the ruin of that celebrated commander. By favour, thus infamously gained, he was raised to the rank of a principal centurion. Primus and Varus, advancing to Aquileia, were add mitted into the city, and likewise into the neighbouring towns of Opitergium and Altinum: Padua too and Abeste, now Este, received them with great demonstrations of He seizes Aquileia, and several other cities. joy. In the latter place they learned, that three cohorts of Vitellius's army, with the squadron of horse called Scriboniana, had erected a bridge at Forum Allienum, now Ferrara, and were posted there. At break of day therefore they attacked them, before they were apprised of their approach, put some of them to the sword, and obliged the rest either to save themselves by flight, or to change their allegiance. In the mean time, two legions arriving at Padua from Pannonia, viz. the seventh, surnamed Galbiana, and the thirteenth, named Gemina, Primus, after having allowed them a few days for repose, bent his march to Verona, with a design to seize that city, and make it the seat of war, as it was situated among spacious plains, fit for encounters of horse, in which his prime force lay. In their march they became masters of e Vicetia, an acquisition, which, tho' small in itself, passed for one of great moment; since in it Cæcina was born, and from the general of the enemy the place of his nativity was snatched. The seizing of Verona was deemed a more important conquest; Takes Verona. for it was a wealthy and flourishing city, and besides, the key of Germany and Rhætia: so that that now all communication between Vitellius and those countries was cut off. In the mean time, letters arrived from Vespasian, with orders to his generals not to venture beyond Aquileia, but to wait there the coming of Mucianus. To his authority he added reasoning, viz. that since Egypt, since the magazines for supplying Italy with provisions, since the revenues of the most opulent provinces, were all under his power, the army of Vitellius, through want of grain and pay, might be f forced to come over. Mucianus in his letters urged the same counsels; but he was prompted by a passion for gaining all the glory, and reserving for himself the whole honour of the war. But from quarters of the world so distant, the counsels arrived when other measures were already taken^b.

THE dismal tidings of the irruption of the enemy into Italy no sooner reached Rome, Vitellius orders Cæcina and Valens to take the field. than Vitellius, at length thoroughly alarmed, ordered his two generals, Cæcina and Valens, to prepare with all expedition for taking the field. New levies were raised, and to all, who should voluntarily list themselves, not only dismissal was promised after the victory, but the same rewards that were paid to veterans after a long course of

of warfare. As Valens was just then recovered from a severe fit of sickness, Cæcina^a alone was sent forward at the head of the German army. But the appearance of those forces, so awful upon their late entry, proved far different upon their departure. They had, by imitating the excesses of their emperor, by surrendering themselves to the voluptuous entertainments of the city, and following other practices too abominable to be named, quite wasted their martial ardour and enfeebled their bodies. Their march was lazy and slow, their ranks thin, great numbers, especially of the Germans and Gauls, having been swept off by distempers arising from their riotous living. Their horses were quite lifeless, and the men grown too delicate to bear the sun, the dust, or the weather; but the more averse they were to military toils, the greater propensity they had to disobedience and mutiny. It was generally believed,^b that Cæcina, who commanded them, out of jealousy and hatred to Fabius Valens, Vitellius's chief favourite, had already resolved to change sides, and signified his intention to Flavius Sabinus, Vespasian's brother, whom Vitellius had not yet removed from the government of Rome. Cæcina, after Vitellius had embraced and dismissed him with high marks of honour, leaving the city, sent forward part of the cavalry to possess themselves of Cremona, ordering the rest to repair to Hostilia, a place of some strength, and about thirty miles from Verona. He himself turned away to Ravenna, to confer there with Lucius Bassus, who, from the command of a squadron of horse, had been by Vitellius preferred at once to that of the two fleets, the one riding at Ravenna, the other at Misenum; but was nevertheless highly dissatisfied, because^c he was not appointed captain of the prætorian guards. It is uncertain, whether he drew Cæcina off from Vitellius, or Cæcina him. Those who composed the relation of this war, while the Flavian family was possessed of the sovereignty, tell us, that they were both guided by a sincere concern for the public tranquillity, and affection for the commonwealth. But our historian is of opinion, that as they were men of no faith or principles, they were prompted by jealousy and spite; and that, rather than others should surpass them in interest with Vitellius, they chose to overthrow Vitellius himself.^d Cæcina having rejoined the legions, employed many devices to alienate the affections of the centurions and common soldiers from Vitellius, to whom of themselves they were strongly devoted. Bassus undertook the same task with the fleet, and accomplished it without much difficulty; for, as they had lately served under Otho, they were ready to abandon their faith to Vitellius. Cæcina advanced to Hostilia, and pitched his camp between that village and the marshes formed by the river Tartarus, being defended behind by the river, and on each side by the marsh. As he had with him six legions and a great number of auxiliaries, it was in his power to have utterly defeated Primus's two legions, (for his other forces were not yet arrived) and to have forced them, by a shameful flight, to abandon Italy. But framing delays, he privately carried on a correspondence with the enemy's generals, till, by intercourse of messengers, he agreed with them upon the articles of his treachery. In the mean time, arrived at Verona the seventh legion, named Claudiana, under the command of^e Vipstanus Messala, a man of a most illustrious family, and the only one who engaged in the war upon worthy designs. The seventh legion was soon after followed by the third and the eighth; and then it was judged proper to draw an intrenchment round Verona. In the mean time, the fleet at Ravenna, revolting from Vitellius, tore his images, and openly espoused the cause of Vespasian; which Cæcina no sooner understood, than assembling all the principal centurions and some of the common soldiers, he represented to them the deplorable condition of Vitellius's affairs, exhorted them to gain betimes the favour of the new prince, and then forthwith gave them the oath to Vespasian. Those who were his accomplices setting an example, the rest, astonished at so sudden an event, took it after them. At the same instant, the images of Vitellius^f were pulled down and defaced, and messengers dispatched to acquaint Antonius Primus with the whole. But as soon as news of the defection was spread through the camp, the soldiers flocked to the quarter where the images of Vespasian were set up, and, with the utmost indignation, flung them down, and replaced those of Vitellius; then chusing for their leaders Fabius Fabullus, commander of the fifth legion, and Cassius Longus, prefect of the camp, they put Cæcina in irons, cutting in pieces certain marines, who by chance fell in their way, abandoned their camp, and, breaking down the bridge, marched back to Hostilia, and thence to Cremona, to rejoin there the first legion named Italica, and the one-and-twentieth, surnamed Rapax^k.

- a THESE transactions were no sooner known to Primus, than he resolved to attack the enemy, thus divided in their affections, ere the leaders had recovered their authority, the soldiers their discipline and obedience, or the legions their former spirit and boldness. He imagined, that Fabius Valens, who was inviolably attached to Vitellius, and a commander of great experience, had ere now left Rome, and would, upon learning the desertion of Cæcina, travel with great expedition. With his whole army therefore he marched from Verona; and the next evening incamped at Bedriacum. The day following he sent out his auxiliaries to forage in the territories of Cremona, and marched himself at the head of eight thousand horse to support them. When he had advanced about eight miles from Bedriacum, news was brought
- b him, that the enemy approached. While Primus was consulting what measures to take, Arrius Varus rushed out with a party of the most resolute horse, and put the enemy's van-guard in confusion; but many advancing to support their comrades, the fortune of the encounter changed, and Arrius was put to flight. This hasty step Arrius Varus put to flight by the troops of Vitellius. had been taken without the approbation of Primus, who judged, that the issue would be such as it proved. He now exhorted those about him to prepare for battle; to the legions he dispatched orders to arm, and notice to the auxiliaries spread over the country, to quit their pillage, and hasten by the several nearest ways to the combat. In the mean time, Arrius's routed troops arriving, communicated their dread to the rest; insomuch, that the whole body of horse under the command of Primus betook
- c themselves to a shameful flight. During this consternation, Primus, discharging the duty of an experienced commander and a most courageous soldier, strove to animate The gallant conduct of Primus. such as were dismayed, to stop such as were flying, readily assisting here with his counsel and orders, there with his sword, where-ever the greatest efforts were required, where-ever any hope was presented. With his javelin he pierced a standard-bearer who was flying, and seizing the standard, turned it against the enemy. Hereupon an hundred horse, ashamed to desert their general, returned to the fight. With these, drawn up in close ranks, he sustained the onset, till the rest of his men, finding the bridge behind them broken and their flight interrupted, returned to the charge. Hereupon consternation and dismay seized the enemy; they began to give
- d ground, and at last, Primus pressing them with fresh vigor, betook themselves to a Vitellius's cavalry routed. disorderly flight. The conquerors pursued them within four miles of Cremona, where they met, attacked, and routed two legions, that called Rapax and that named Italica, who were advancing to the relief of their cavalry. Primus forbore pursuing them, mindful of the condition of his men and horses, quite spent with the fatigue of the day. In the close of the evening arrived the rest of Primus's forces; and as they marched over heaps of slain, they concluded from thence, that the war was ended, and demanded to be led directly to Cremona, being well apprised, that by storming the town in the dark, they should have a greater latitude for plundering; whereas if they waited the return of day, supplications would be offered, and terms
- e granted: by which means the wealth of Cremona would accrue to the commanders of the legions and principal officers; for the plunder of a town taken by storm belonged to the soldiers, but to the leaders when gained by surrender. It was with the utmost difficulty, that Primus (for they utterly slighted the other commanders) prevailed upon them to delay the attack for one night. In the mean time, some horsemen, who had advanced close to the walls of Cremona, having seized some stragglers from thence, learnt of them, that six legions of Vitellius, and the whole army that had incamped at Hostilia, having that day marched thirty miles, were just approaching in battle-array. Hereupon Primus immediately drew up his men according to the nature of the ground, and made the necessary preparations to receive the enemy,
- f who, as they wanted a leader of experience, instead of resting at Cremona, attacked, The battle of Cremona. spent as they were with a long march and fasting, Primus's forces, and began the engagement at the third hour of the night; that is, about nine in the evening. The combat lasted the whole night, fortune sometimes favouring one side, sometimes another. As they fought in the dark, and the watch-word of each, by being frequently asked and repeated, became known to the other, they could not discern friend from foe. In this dreadful confusion, the seventh legion, called Galbiana, was sorely beset. Out of it six centurions of principal rank were slain, and some of the ensigns taken. The eagle, however, was preserved by Atilius Varus, the chief centurion, who, in defending it, slew heaps of the enemy, and at last fell himself. Primus's men were chiefly annoyed by a balista of amazing bulk, which, being placed upon the ridge of the highway, swept away whole ranks, by discharging against them great, massy ^a stones; but at length two common soldiers, passing undiscovered through the midst of the enemy, cut the springs of the engines, and by that means, at the expence of their own lives, (for they were immediately cut in pieces) saved part of the army from utter destruction. To neither side was fortune yet leaning, when, the night being near spent, the moon rising discovered the two armies to each other. More favourable, however, she proved to that of Vespasian, as she shone upon their backs, and full in the enemy's faces. Primus, now that he could distinguish his own men and be by them distinguished, applied himself to animate them, some by shame and reproof, others by applause and exhortation, all by hopes and promises. There ensued from every quarter cries and shoutings; and just then the third legion, according to the custom ^b in Syria, where they had been long quartered, paid their adoration to the rising sun. This incident gave birth to a report, which flew in an instant through the whole army and reached the enemy, that Mucianus was arrived, and between his forces and the third legion mutual salutations had passed. This disheartened the troops of Vitellius; which Primus perceiving, made a last effort, pushed them with great vigor, and utterly broke their ranks; which they attempted indeed to restore, but in vain, being embarrassed by their own carriages and engines. Being therefore no longer able to keep their ground, they betook themselves to a precipitous flight, and strove to gain Cremona, Primus's men pursuing them with great slaughter. Vitellius is said ^c to have lost, what in the engagement what in the flight, about thirty thousand men. But the sight of so many dead bodies laying together in heaps, and covering the fields and ways, did not occasion so much horror, as the death of a father slaughtered by his own son. The fact is thus related by our historian, upon the authority of Vipstanus Messala, who, in this engagement, commanded the seventh legion, named Claudiana: Julius Mansuetus, a native of Spain, lifting in the legion called Rapax, left behind him a son, then a boy, who afterwards being under Galba, inrolled in the seventh legion called Galbiana, happened in this battle to engage his father and ^d killed him; but being known by his parent just expiring, as he was rifling him, and knowing him again, he embraced with a flood of tears his pale corpse; charged with a sad and doleful voice the public with the crime of parricide; and lifting up the body, digged a grave, and, under the utmost affliction, discharged towards his parent the last duty. Those who were nearest observed what had passed, and in a moment the tragical accident was divulged throughout the whole army, with many lamentations and bitter execrations upon a war thus unnatural and barbarous; yet they continued to butcher and spoil their kinsmen, their relations, nay, their brethren, at the same time relating what a crying iniquity had been committed, and committing it themselves ^e.

As the conquerors approached Cremona, they found the enemy incamped quite round the walls, and defended by a deep ditch, which had been dug in the war against Otho, and since strengthened with fresh works. To proceed to the assault ^e with an army already weary with the continued toil of a day and a night, seemed to the leaders an enterprize full of danger and difficulty; but the soldiers, more apt to brave perils than bear delays, demanded to be forthwith led on to the attack; and Primus, yielding to this humour, ordered them, in the form of a ring, to invest the intrenchments, and begin the assault; which they did with a fury hardly to be expressed, raising their shields over their heads, and thence forming a testudo, under the shelter of which they advanced to the foot of the ramparts. But Vitellius's men, by hurling down upon them huge stones, loosened the testudo, beat to the ground the men beneath, and made a dreadful havock of them, thus naked, and exposed to volleys of stones and arrows. The onset began to slacken, when the leaders, finding ^f their men exhausted and unmoved by exhortations, pointed to Cremona as the price of their victory. Thus encouraged, they renewed the assault, all obstinately combined to succeed or die: regardless of wounds and blood, they strove to demolish the rampart, battered the gates, stood upon the shoulders of one another, and upon the testudo now restored, and thence seized the weapons in the hands of the enemy, and the hands too which held them; so that the hale and the maimed, such as were half-dead, and such as were just expiring, tumbled headlong together and perished. When Vitellius's men were no longer able to sustain the shock, and found that all the discharges

a discharges from the balista were rendered ineffectual by the testudo below, they at last hurled down the engine itself, huge and ponderous as it was, which failed not to crush those upon whom it fell; but at the same time drew with it the battlements, the upper part of the rampart, and the adjoining tower. In this confusion, Caius Volusius, a soldier of the third legion, having mounted the rampart, pushed down all who resisted, and cried aloud, That the camp was taken. The rest then having broke the gate with their swords and axes, burst in, Vitellius's men being utterly dismayed, and leaping with great fury from the battlements. The whole space between the camp and Cremona, whither the enemy retired, was covered with dead bodies. And here again was presented a new scene of difficulties, the walls of the city very high, strong towers of stone, the gates secured with vast bars of iron, the garison numerous, the inhabitants devoted to the party of Vitellius, and at this time a great part of Italy assembled in the town on occasion of a fair. Primus ordered fire to be immediately set to the most sumptuous and beautiful buildings in the neighbourhood of the city, hoping by that means to oblige the people of Cremona to abandon the party of Vitellius. At the same time, he conveyed all his bravest men into such houses as stood near the walls, from whence, with volleys of darts, arrows, and stones they drove away all who made opposition, while the legions, forming a testudo, advanced to the foot of the walls. Vitellius's men sustained the attack with great intrepidity, till their officers, fearing that, were the city taken by storm, all the fury of the conquerors would vent itself upon them, began to deliberate about surrendering. Having therefore agreed to throw themselves upon the mercy of the conquering army, they razed the name and defaced the images of Vitellius; then discharging Cæcina from his bonds, besought him to plead in their behalf. Thus were so many brave men reduced at length to implore the aid and protection of a traitor. At his request Primus granted them their lives, ordering them to surrender their arms and march out of the town; which they did accordingly, Cæcina, who was then consul, walking before them, attended by his lictors, and arrayed with the ensigns of the consular dignity. This the conquerors could not bear; they upbraided him in bitter terms with his pride, with his cruelty, nay, and with his treason, and would have proceeded to violence, had not Primus checked them, and furnishing Cæcina with a guard, sent him away to Vespasian^m. For the city of Cremona; as it had, even in the war against Otho, supported the cause of Vitellius, and ever shewed a passionate zeal for his interest, both Primus and his army were highly incensed against it; but nevertheless the general did not think it advisable to deliver it immediately up to be plundered, great part of the wealth of Italy being at this time lodged in it on occasion of the fair. In a speech therefore which he made to his soldiers after the surrender of the place, he commended their bravery, exhorted them to use mercy towards their fellow-soldiers, who had submitted; but purposely avoided making any mention of the city, or its inhabitants. Having ended his speech, and dismissed the troops, he went to a bath to wash off the blood with which he was still stained; for he had, during the several engagements and attacks, commanded as a general, and fought like a common soldier. In the bath he happened to drop a word, which was remarked and quickly divulged; for finding the water somewhat too cool, he complained of it, adding, It will soon prove abundantly hot. This saying, though pleasantly uttered to his slaves, was instantly spread all over the camp, and by the soldiery, greedy of plunder, interpreted as the watch-word for setting fire to Cremona. Accordingly forty thousand soldiers rushing into it, and a greater number of servants and retainers to the camp, more abandoned to acts of cruelty and licentiousness than the soldiers themselves, pillaged, murdered, ravished, &c. without restraint for four days together, and then setting fire to the empty houses, reduced them to ashes. Such was the end of Cremona, two hundred and eighty-six years after its foundation (W). Primus, ashamed of the barbarities committed

(W) Cremona was founded, according to Tacitus (58), Polybius (59), and Livy (60), in the consulship of Tiberius Sempronius and Publius Cornelius, when Hannibal was ready to invade Italy, as a barrier against the Gauls on the other side of the Po, or any other power meditating an irruption from beyond the Alps. It grew and flourished by the convenience of rivers, the richness of its territory, and affinities with other nations of Italy. In no foreign war it had ever been hurt, but, in the civil dissensions, suffered more than any other city.

committed by his soldiers, issued an order, that no one should presume to hold captive any citizen of Cremona. Hereupon such as had any, began to murder them; which inhumanity obliged their relations to redeem them. Soon after, such of the inhabitants as had outlived the general massacre, returned to Cremona, and rebuilt the city, being therein countenanced by Vespasian. Josephus tells us, that of Vitellius's men there fell in the battle thirty thousand and two hundred, and four thousand five hundred on Primus's side^a; and Xiphilinus writes, that, what in the field what in the city of Cremona, there perished fifty thousand persons. The conquerors, not able to bear the stench of the putrified carcases, having lodged one night on the ruins in which the city was buried, retired the next day three miles from thence. The soldiers of Vitellius, scattered and dispersed over the country, were assembled again, placed under their former banners, and, as the war still subsisted, sent into Illyricum. Messengers were immediately dispatched into Britain and both Spains, to acquaint the troops there with the victory, as was Julius Calenus, a tribune, into Gaul, and Alpinus Montanus, commander of a cohort, into Germany, two officers chosen for ostentation, as the latter was of Treves, the former an Ædian, and both partizans of Vitellius. At the same time, guards were posted upon the passes of the Alps, to cut off all communication between Germany and Italy; for it was reported, that the Germans were arming with a design to assist the vanquished party^b. Let us now return to Vitellius.

Vitellius resigns himself up to voluptuousness.

HAVING dismissed Cæcina in the manner we have related, and a few days after ordered Fabius Valens to take the field, he buried himself in the bowers and alleys of his gardens, striving to smother all his cares in voluptuousness and all manner of excesses. From Rome he retired to the grove at Aricinum, where, while he passed his time intirely resigned to sloth and gluttony, he was alarmed with tidings of the defection of the fleet at Ravenna. Soon after came another melancholy account, yet blended with joy, that Cæcina had revolted, but was by the army put in irons. Hereupon he returned to the city, and in a full assembly extolled the fidelity of the soldiery; but ordered Publius Sabinus, captain of the prætorian guards, to be cast into bonds, on account of his intimacy with Cæcina, and named in his room Alphenus Varus. The senate, informed of the desertion of Cæcina, inveighed against him in a style of indignation well studied; for not a man dropped a bitter expression against the leaders of the opposite party, and all with great circumspection avoided mentioning Vespasian. Tho' one day only remained of Cæcina's consulship, he was deposed, and Roscius Regulus named in his room, who, upon the last day of October, began his magistracy, and with the day ended it. In the mean time, Valens, who was upon his march to join the troops at Hostilia and Cremona, being informed, that the fleet at Ravenna had revolted to the enemy, instead of quickening his march, halted, and wrote to Vitellius for succours. The emperor immediately dispatched after him three cohorts, with the squadron of horse from Britain. These Valens sent forward to Aricinum; but he himself turning aside bent his course to Umbria, and from thence to Hetruria. Having there learnt the issue of the battle at Cremona, he conceived a design, which, had it been put in execution, would have been attended with very dreadful consequences, he proposed to imbarque for Narbonne Gaul, and landing upon any part of that coast, rouse those powerful provinces and all the Roman forces there, as also the several nations of Germany, and thence renew the war. With this design he imbarqued in the port of Pisa; but was, by contrary winds, forced to land at Monaco, where he was kindly received by Marius Maturus, procurator of the maritime Alps, who, though all the country round espoused the opposite party, had never swerved from his allegiance. By him Valens was informed, that Valerius Paulinus, procurator of Narbonne Gaul, an officer of known bravery and Vespasian's intimate friend, had declared for him; and held with a strong garison the city of Forojulium, now Frejus, which commanded all access from the sea. Upon this intelligence Valens returned directly to his vessels, with four soldiers of the prætorian guards, three friends, and as many centurions, leaving to Maturus and the rest full liberty to stay, and swear, if they pleased, fidelity to Vespasian. As he roamed about, hovering on the coasts of Gaul, he was, by contrary winds, driven upon the Stæchades, islands near Marseilles, and there by some galleys belonging to Paulinus taken prisoner; which was no sooner known, than first the neighbouring, and soon after the a the more distant provinces, espoused, without hesitation, the cause of the conqueror. In Spain, the first legion, named Adjutrix, which had served under Otho, declared for Vespasian, and drew over with it the tenth and the sixth. In Britain the second legion, which Vespasian had commanded there in the reign of Claudius, acceded to his party, though not without some opposition from the other legions, in which many centurions and many soldiers had been promoted by Vitellius. However, they were all brought at length to acknowledge Vespasian^p.

In the mean time, the dismal tidings of the overthrow at Cremona reaching Rome, Vitellius ^{others all bad tidings.} instead of deliberating with his friends about the most proper measures in so critical a conjuncture, with a stupid dissimulation, smothered the news of the calamity, feigning that all his proceedings prospered, and by such false representations leaving his condition quite desperate. About his person was observed a wonderful silence concerning the war; and through the city all discourses about it were prohibited, which for this very cause grew more frequent. However, he privately sent persons, in whom he could confide, to view the enemy's camp; but upon their return, when he had secretly examined them, he caused them all to be murdered, that they might not divulge what they had seen. Julius Agrestis, a centurion, having attempted in vain to awaken the emperor out of his lethargy, at last prevailed with him, that he himself might be sent to survey the forces of the enemy, and to learn the transactions at Cremona. Agrestis did not assume the behaviour of a spy, nor attempted to escape the notice of Primus; but declaring to him the instructions from the emperor and his own design, he demanded to view the whole in person. Primus readily sent certain persons with him to shew him the field of battle, the desolation and remains of Cremona, and the legions taken prisoners. Agrestis having carefully examined the whole, returned to Rome; but as Vitellius gave no credit to his accounts, nay accused him of corruption and infidelity; Since then, said he, some remarkable confirmation is necessary, and since neither my life nor my death can avail you, I will furnish you with an evidence which you may credit. Having thus spoken, he left his presence, and fell upon his own sword at the gates of the palace^q.

b In the mean time, some of Vespasian's troops, under the conduct of Cornelius Fuscus, advancing as far as Ariminum, besieged that place, and possessed themselves of the plains of Umbria and the territories of Picenum, all along the Adriatic sea. Thus between Vespasian and Vitellius all Italy was shared, and the ridges of the Apennine become the common boundary. As winter approached and the plains were flooded by the overflowing of the Po, Primus sent the legions back to Verona with the aged and wounded; and passing the Po at the head of the auxiliary cohorts and cavalry, advanced as far as the temple of Fortune, at present a city on the Adriatic gulph, known by the name of Fano. There he halted, upon intelligence, that the prætorian cohorts had already left Rome, and that guards were posted upon the Apennine to oppose his passage. And truly Vitellius, roused at length, as it were, out of a profound sleep, had ordered Julius Priscus and Alphenus Varus, with fourteen prætorian cohorts, a legion of marines, and other forces, to seize the passes of the Apennine. They were all chosen men, and able to have made an offensive war, had they been under the command of a different general. They encamped at Mevania, now Bevagna, in the neighbourhood of Toligno; but Vitellius, without departing in the least from his wonted course of debauchery, continued at Rome, where he settled a succession of consuls for ten years, discharged some nations from all tribute, conferred upon others fresh immunities, and, in short, without any regard to futurity, rent and exhausted the empire with such wild bounties, as could neither be granted nor accepted by men of sense, but were highly applauded by the unthinking herd. At length, moved by the repeated solicitations of the army, he left Rome, and repaired to the camp at Mevania, attended by a great number of senators, which only served to expose him to public contempt and derision (X). For as he was quite unacquainted with the military art, he was continually applying for information how to draw up the army, how to procure intelligence, by what measures he might defeat the designs of the foe, &c. Upon every flying report of the approach of the enemy, he was sure to betray great fear, and never failed to get drunk. In the end, surfeited with the camp and learning the revolt of the fleet at Misenum, he returned to Rome in the utmost consternation. The fleet was drawn to revolt by Claudius Faventius, who was only a centurion, and had been degraded by Galba with marks of ignominy. By forging letters from Vespasian, and in his name tempting the officers with great rewards, he prevailed upon them to change their allegiance. To reclaim them, Vitellius made choice of Claudius Julianus, who had lately commanded the fleet, and was highly esteemed by the marines. But he, without hesitation, went over to the party of Vespasian; and, putting himself at their head, took the city of Terracina. Hereupon Vitellius dispatched messengers to the army, with orders to retire from Mevania, and drawing nearer Rome, to encamp at Narnia, now Narni. From it he detached six cohorts and five hundred horse, whom he sent under the command of his brother Lucius, to make head against the soldiers of the fleet. He himself remained at Rome, where he assembled the people by their tribes, and to all, who desired to be listed, administered the oath of fidelity. As he moved compassion by his sad countenance, his doleful expressions, and many tears, and was liberal, nay extravagant, in his promises, vast multitudes gave in their names; and to this dastardly crowd, only daring in words, he gave the awful name of legions. To himself he assumed, at this juncture, the title of Cæsar, which he had hitherto rejected, as if the Cæsars alone were destined to hold the sovereign power.

Primus passes
the Apennine.

THE army no sooner left Mevania, than the Samnites, the Pelignians, and the Marssians embraced the cause of Vespasian. At the same time, Primus, informed of the enemy's motions, hastened to pass the Apennine, where, while his troops were sorely annoyed with the cold, and struggling with difficulty out of the deep snow, he considered what dangers he must have undergone, had not Vitellius's army abandoned their post. Primus, having past the Apennine, encamped at Carfulæ, between Mevania and Narnia, and there waited the arrival of the legions from Cremona, which were in full march to join him. As the forces of Vitellius were only ten miles distant, the troops which Primus had with him were for attacking them before the legions arrived, whom they considered rather as sharers in the prey, than partakers in the peril. But Primus found means to calm their fury, and in the mean time the legions arrived, and soon after their arrival possessed themselves of Interamna, now Terni; which so terrified Vitellius's army, that they began to fly over to the enemy in whole companies and troops, being encouraged thereunto by their tribunes and centurions. However, some of the common soldiers persisted inflexible in their adherence to Vitellius; and a report was industriously spread all over the camp, that Valens had escaped into Germany, and was there assembling a mighty army. confute this rumour, and prevent their cherishing any farther hopes, Valens was put to death at Urbium, where he was detained in prison, and his head sent to the camp, and displayed to the view of Vitellius's troops. At this sight, they sunk into utter despair; and seeing themselves on all sides bereft of hope, passed over in a body to the party of Vespasian. Upon this general defection, Primus and Varus neglected not, by repeated messages, to make offers to Vitellius of safety to his person, of revenues, of any private retirement in Campania, or elsewhere, if he would resign the sovereignty and submit to Vespasian. Mucianus likewise sent him letters with the like offers; to which he would have yielded, had he not been dissuaded by his friends from ever leading a private life, after he had been emperor. To him now remained only the city of Rome, which Flavius Sabinus might have easily raised against him; but he, either out of a natural abhorrence to the spilling of blood, or because he envied the grandeur of his brother's fortune, neglected to act with any warmth or alacrity. It is true, he often conferred with Vitellius about the means of restoring public peace, but could not be prevailed upon to use violence. In one of these conferences, he agreed to resign the empire upon certain conditions, which Sabinus assured him should be ratified by his brother Vespasian; which was no sooner known, than his followers exerted their utmost efforts to divert him from his resolution; representing to him, how ignominious, how insecure the terms of peace were, since

- a since the performing them entirely depended upon the wanton humour of the conqueror. But, notwithstanding all their endeavours to rouse him to some attempt daring and brave, having learnt on the eighteenth of December the defection of his army at Narnia, he went forth from the palace in deep mourning, attended by his domestics, with his little son, a helpless infant; and passing in this forlorn condition through the streets of the city, arrived at the place where the people used to assemble; and there to the multitude, which had flocked from all quarters, declared his resolution in few words, such as suited his present condition, that he voluntarily withdrew for the sake of the public peace and the good of the commonwealth; and that he only desired they would remember him, and to his brother, to his wife, and to his innocent and tender children, shew compassion and mercy. At the same time,
- b extending his arms, with his little son in them, he recommended him now to one, now to another, then to all. At last, bursting into tears, he ungirt his sword from his side, and presented it to the consul Cæcilius Simplex, who stood just by him, as thus resigning the power of life and death over the citizens. As the consul refused to receive it, and the assembly with loud clamours opposed his resignation, he departed, declaring, that he intended to divest himself of the badges of the imperial dignity in the temple of Concord, and thence to seek a private retirement in his brother's house. But the people, sensibly affected with this doleful scene, declared But is not permitted. with one voice against his withdrawing to a private dwelling, called him back to the palace, and even shut up every other way. Hereupon, not knowing what to
- c do, nor how to proceed, he returned to the palace. But as the rumour had already flown all over the city, that Vitellius had abdicated the empire; all the principal senators, great numbers of knights, with the city guards and those of the night-watch, crowded to the house of Flavius Sabinus. Thither news was brought them, that Vitellius, encouraged by the people and his German guards, was returned to the palace. As Sabinus had advanced too far to retreat, all who were about him Flavius Sabinus takes arms, but is defeated. advised him to take arms, and force Vitellius to stand to the treaty he had made. Sabinus, though of himself hesitating and backward (Y), yielded to their advice; but some of the boldest of Vitellius's men, meeting him as he advanced to the palace, attacked
- d with great resolution, and put him to flight. Sabinus under this distress had no other resource but to shut himself up in the capitol; which he did accordingly, with He retires to the capitol. a small number of soldiers, some senators, and a few Roman knights. The soldiers of Vitellius immediately invested the capitol, but with stations so loose and ill-guarded, that Sabinus, during the dead of the night, found means to acquaint Primus with his danger, and to cause his own children Sabinus and Clemens, and his brother's son Domitian, to be brought to him. The next morning, as soon as day began to dawn, before hostilities were committed on either side, Sabinus sent Cornelius Martialis, a centurion of the first rank, to put Vitellius in mind of the treaty, and expostulate with him about his thus violating such solemn stipulations. Vitellius threw the whole fault upon the soldiers, whose ardour, he said, it was not in his power to restrain.
- e He even warned Martialis to retire by a private way, that he might not be assassinated by the soldiers, as the mediator of a peace which they abhorred. He was scarce

(Y) The nobility of Rome did all that lay in their power to rouse Flavius Sabinus, and encourage him to share with the other generals of the party the glory of placing his brother upon the throne. As he was governor of Rome, the cohorts there immediately depended upon him, and consequently would not fail to join; most of the senators offered to assist him with their slaves. The cohorts remaining with Vitellius were few, and those quite disheartened with dismal tidings from all quarters. The populace were wavering; and from them, if he once presented himself as their head, he would find the same flattery and zeal, which they had shewn for Vitellius, instantly turned upon Vespasian. With these and the like reasonings, the grandees of Rome strove to rouse Sabinus, but could not by any means prevail upon him to take arms; and hence some entertained private suspicions against him, as if through malignity and emulation he studied to thwart the designs formed in behalf of his brother. For Flavius Sabinus was both elder than Vespasian, and greatly surpassed him in wealth and reputation. He was even believed to have upheld his brother's credit otherwise sinking, and for the money lent him to have received in pledge his house and possessions. Hence, though between them an appearance of unanimity subsisted, private grudges were apprehended to remain. But our historian is of opinion, that Sabinus, naturally merciful and gentle, abhorred all slaughter and spilling of blood; and therefore frequently conferred with Vitellius about the means of restoring public peace, and laying down arms by mutual agreement and treaty (62).

scarce returned to the capitol, when Vitellius's soldiers approached, and began the attack with great fury. The besieged, with showers of stones and tiles, strove to overwhelm the aggressors; but the latter, advancing boldly to the very gates of the citadel, set fire to them, and must have entered, had not Sabinus pulled down the statues on all hands, and, with these glorious monuments of antiquity, raised in the very entrance a new wall. Then they strove to force a passage from the opposite avenues of the capitol, climbing over the contiguous buildings, which, during a long peace, had been suffered to be raised to the height of the foundations of the capitol. Here the assault was close and fierce; and the adjoining roofs being set on fire, whether by the assailants or the besieged is uncertain, the flame spread from thence to the porticos of the capitol; and being there nourished by the timber, which was very old, spread every way with terrible impetuosity; nor did the conflagration cease, till that glorious and stately edifice was burnt to the ground and laid in ashes; the most deplorable misfortune, says Tacitus, that had happened since the founding of the city, and to the Roman people the most reproachful, since by them, and not by a foreign enemy, the sacred seat of the great Jupiter, reared by their ancestors with solemn benedictions and auspices, as the pledge and centre of future empire, was thus impiously profaned and reduced to ashes.

While the capitol was yet burning, Vitellius's bands, bursting in, put all who opposed them to the sword: of these the most signal were Cornelius Martialis, Æmilius Pacensis, Casperi Niger, and Didius Scæva. Flavius Sabinus and Quinctius Atticus the consul were taken and loaded with irons. The rest, by divers stratagems, escaped, having learnt the word by which the soldiers of Vitellius were distinguished by one another. Young Domitian was saved by the contrivance of one of his freedmen, under the disguise of a linen robe, as if he had belonged to the tribe of the priests who offered sacrifices in the capitol (Z). Sabinus and Atticus were carried to Vitellius, who did all that lay in his power to appease the fury of the populace and soldiery, crying aloud for their execution. They were chiefly incensed against Sabinus; and therefore, instead of hearkening to the emperor's intreaties, they run him through in his presence; then cutting off his head, dragged his trunk through the streets to the Scala Gemoniæ, where the bodies of malefactors were usually exposed. He had, for the space of five-and-thirty years, carried arms for the commonwealth, had governed Mæsia seven years, and Rome twelve, bearing both in peace and war a signal reputation. The only failing, which even his enemies could object to him, was his talkativeness. As to the innocence of his life and justice of his actions, he was altogether blameless. All agree, that before Vespasian became emperor, Sabinus was looked upon as the chief ornament of the Flavian family, and the support of Vespasian himself, who was his younger brother: When the people demanded the doom of the consul Atticus, Vitellius persisted in opposing them, being entirely reconciled to him, in regard of his openly confessing, that he had set fire to the capitol; and by thus assuming the odium of the crime, though the whole was by some thought a fiction, acquitted as innocent the party of Vitellius. About the same time, Lucius Vitellius, the emperor's brother, defeated in Campania the marines, who had declared for Vespasian, and retook Terracina. Six small galleys escaped, and in one of them Apollinaris commander of the fleet. All the other vessels were seized by the shore, or, surcharged by the flying crowd, sunk to the bottom. Julianus, who had been sent by Vitellius to reclaim the fleet, and had gone over to Vespasian, was taken prisoner, and by Lucius's orders first inhumanly scourged and then executed. Had Vitellius's men, now elated with success, proceeded directly to Rome, a dreadful struggle must have ensued; nor could it have been decided without the destruction of the city. But while Lucius was deliberating, whether he should return forthwith to Rome, or pursue the reduction of Campania,

(Z) Domitian passing among the sacrificers undisturbed to the house of Cornelius Primus, a dependent of his fathers, near the place called Velabrum, lay there concealed, till Rome was taken by Primus. He afterwards, in the reign of his father, demolished the house where he had lain concealed, and raised upon the place a small chapel dedicated to Jupiter the protector, with an altar, and the account of his adventure engraved upon marble. When he arrived at the sovereignty, he erected a vast temple sacred to Jupiter the guardian, with himself held in the arms of the god (63).

(63) Idem, c. 74.

- a Campania, the troops of Primus, informed of the danger of Sabinus, hastened to his relief. Petilius Cerealis, one nearly allied to Vespasian and a commander of no mean character, upon the first news that the capitol was besieged, was sent forward with a thousand horse, and ordered to cross the Sabine territories, and enter Rome through the Salarian way. Primus himself advanced along the great Flaminian road, and when the night was far spent, arrived at a place called the Red Rocks. There he received dismal tidings, that Sabinus was murdered, the capitol reduced to ashes, the city under dreadful consternation, the populace and slaves all under arms for Vitellius, &c. (A). Petilius Cerealis, meeting not far from the city a party of the enemy, attacked them briskly, but was by them received with equal resolution, and, after a long and bloody contest, put to flight and pursued as far as Fidenæ. This success heightened the zeal and partiality of the people for Vitellius; they betook themselves to arms, most of them snatching up whatever fell first in their way, and, thus armed, demanded to be led out against the enemy. Vitellius commended their zeal, but at the same time sent ambassadors both to Cerealis and Primus to renew the former treaty. The soldiers of Cerealis insulted the deputies, and even wounded the prætor Arulenus Rusticus, a man of great merit and distinction, and slew his principal lictor, for daring to open a passage through the crowd. Those who went to Primus were better received. They were attended by the Vestal virgins, who brought letters from Vitellius to Primus, wherein the emperor desired, that the battle, which was to be the last, might be suspended for one day, since during that interval all things might be easily accommodated. Primus dismissed the virgins with all demonstrations of honour; but to Vitellius returned answer, that, by the murder of Sabinus and the burning of the capitol, all means of ending the war by treaty were cut off (B). The ambassadors were scarce gone, when the whole army moved, advancing in three bodies to the walls of Rome, where the forces of Vitellius expected them, divided likewise into three bodies. The weak and unwarlike populace was routed at the first onset; but Vitellius's other troops, rallying out against the enemy as they approached the walls of the city, attacked them with a fury hardly to be expressed. Primus's men stood their ground with equal resolution and intrepidity; so that the most cruel and bloody battle ensued that the Romans had ever sustained. The conflict lasted several hours with various success; but in the end proved favourable to Primus's men, as superior in the abilities of their leaders. The Vitellians were with great slaughter driven into the city, where they assembled again; and, though vanquished and routed, renewed the battle with fresh vigor, and continued it to the close of the day. The people gathered about the combatants as spectators; and as if they had been only attending the representation of a fight exhibited for public amusement, they sometimes favoured one party, sometimes another, with theatrical shouts and clappings: nay, as often as either side turned their backs, or particulars fled into houses, or concealed themselves in shops, they insisted upon their being dragged out and slain. The people, as Tacitus observes, were so little affected with this tragical spectacle, that at the same time were seen in one place cruel conflicts and bleeding wounds; in another luxurious banqueting and voluptuous revellings; every-

(A) Primus's forces might have reached Rome before the capitol was besieged; but, instead of pursuing their march to the city after they had left Narnia, they diverted themselves at Oriculum, now Otricoli, in celebrating the annual feast of Saturn, which lasted many days. There were not wanting some, who on this occasion entertained suspicions of Primus, and charged him, as if, through treachery, he thus lingered in consequence of the letters secretly sent him from Vitellius, with offers of the consulship and of his daughter then marriageable, and with her a mighty fortune, as the rewards of revolting from Vespasian. Others alledged, that all this charge was no more than a fiction, and that it was a resolution concerted amongst all the leaders, rather to terrify the city with a terrible display of war, than to carry the war thither, since the chief strength of the prætorian bands had already deserted Vitellius, who was likewise precluded from receiving any reinforcements; so that it was presumed he would quietly yield up the empire. But the true cause of so preposterous delay was, according to our historian, their waiting the coming of Mucianus, who was advancing full march with the forces of the east, and by frequent letters retarded the motion of the conquering army, being stung with envy at the success of Primus, and thinking that he should be deprived of all share in the glory of the war, were he not present at the entry into Rome. But the news, that the capitol was besieged, roused Primus, and put the whole army in motion (74).

(B) Musonius Rufus, by rank a Roman knight; by profession a Stoic, joining himself to the ambassadors, endeavoured, by philosophical discourses about the advantages of peace and the dangers attending war, to quell the fury of men in arms; but was derided by some, outrageously insulted by others, and at last, partly by menaces, partly by the persuasions of the more moderate, prevailed upon to forbear his unseasonable lessons of wisdom (75).

every-where streams of blood and heaps of carcases; and hard by wanton debauches and lewd harlots: in short, all the abominations of a most dissolute and riotous peace, and all the barbarities of a most dreadful and cruel captivity. Primus's men, having in the end prevailed and made themselves masters of the city, marched in the next place to storm the camp of the prætorian guards, whither the most determined amongst the enemy had retired. As they considered the camp as their last hope and resource, they exerted their utmost efforts in defending it; and, though in number inferior, often repulsed the aggressors; and at length, when the gates, in spite of all opposition, were burst open, uniting together, they made a last effort; but being overpowered by numbers, they all fell, facing the enemy and wounded only before^a.

Vitellius, seeing the city taken, caused himself to be conveyed in a chair through the back part of the palace to his wife's house upon mount Aventine, with a design to lie there concealed during the day, and fly by night to his brother, then at Terracina. But as to one who is under dread and fears all things, the present affairs seem most dangerous, he soon changed his mind and returned to the palace. Suetonius writes, that he altered his resolution upon a groundless and uncertain report, that a treaty and a peace was concluded. Be that as it will, he found the palace now quite desolate and abandoned; all his slaves and domestics having slipped away, or carefully avoiding to meet him. Terrified with the dismal solitude and silence, he tried to enter several apartments; but finding them all shut, and being at last weary with such miserable and solitary wandering to and fro, he thrust himself into the porter's lodge, and concealed himself behind the bed. In the mean time, a party of Primus's men entering the place, searched all places and corners, till at last they discovered the emperor and dragged him out. As they knew him not, they inquired who he was, and whether he could acquaint them what was become of Vitellius. He deceived them at first; but being soon known by Julius Placidus, tribune of a prætorian band, he pretended to have matters of the utmost importance to impart to Vespasian, and with great earnestness begged to be kept, though it were in prison, till his arrival. But the tribune and soldiers, deaf to all intreaties, tied forthwith his hands behind him, threw a halter about his neck, rent all his apparel, and dragged him half-naked into the forum through the great street called the Sacred Way, forcing him, with their swords pointed at his throat, to hold up his head, and present his face to the indignities offered him by the rabble, who now reviled him in a most outrageous manner. They forced him to behold his own statues thrown down, and to view the place where Galba had been murdered. While he was thus haled along, a German soldier meeting him, drew his sword and discharged a violent blow, whether at Vitellius to revenge some former injury, or at the tribune, or to release the emperor from insults and derision, is uncertain. The tribune's ear he actually cut off, and was himself instantly slain. Vitellius they pushed forward, the populace the whole time upbraiding him with his gluttony, his target of Minerva, his lewdness, and even the imperfections of his body; for he was enormously tall, corpulent, and somewhat lame, having been hurt by a chariot, while he was attending Caligula at the races in the circus. He bore all the insults and indignities offered him without uttering a single word, except to the tribune, to whom, while he treated him in a manner altogether unbecoming, he answered, that nevertheless he had been his emperor. They dragged him at last to the Germania, the common charnel of malefactors, where the body of Flavius Sabinus had lain exposed, and there with many wounds put an end to his unhappy life. His head was cut off, and carried on a pole through the chief streets of the city. His body was dragged with a hook, and with all possible ignominy thrown into the Tiber, but afterwards buried by his widow Galeria Fundana. Thus died Aulus Vitellius, the ninth emperor of Rome, according to some in the fifty-fourth, according to others in the fifty-eight, year of his age, after having reigned a year, wanting ten or twelve days, from the time he was proclaimed emperor at Cologne, and eight months and a few days after the death of Otho. He was raised to the first dignities in the state by no parts or merit of his own, but in regard of the lustre of his family, which was one of the most conspicuous in Rome. By his extravagant bounties and largesses, he gained the affections both of the soldiery and people. Of the former,

a former, many adhered to him with unshaken fidelity to the last, tho', in the opinion of our historian, he had not one good quality to recommend him to such as wished well to the republic, having been stained, even from his tender years, with all manner of crimes and most infamous and abominable iniquities^w. The day being already far spent, the senate could not be assembled, the senators and magistrates having either privately withdrawn from the city, or concealed themselves in the houses of their dependants. Domitian, apprehending now no further danger, presented himself to the leaders of the party, and was by the soldiers thronging about him saluted Cæsar, and by them conducted in a kind of triumph to his father's house.

b In the mean time, Lucius Vitellius was with his cohorts advancing from Terracina to the relief of his brother. The cavalry was therefore sent forward to Aricia, and the legions ordered to advance to Bovillæ. But Lucius was no sooner informed of the unhappy doom of the emperor, than he surrendered himself and his bands to the pleasure of the conquerors. The soldiers were disarmed and led through the city, guarded on each side by files of armed men, without betraying a suppliant look, or dropping a mean expression, though outrageously insulted by the mocking and petulant vulgar. They were all committed to prison, but soon after released.

c As for Vitellius, he was put to death; a punishment which he well deserved, being no less addicted to all kinds of vices than his brother. But, for all his vices, he wanted neither courage nor activity, and supported the cause with great resolution and vigilance^x. By the death of the emperor and his brother, war was rather seen to cease, than peace to commence; for the conquerors, continuing in arms, hunted all over the city after the conquered, filling with carnage and mangled bodies the streets, the places of public resort, the temples, and even the private houses, which they burst open and pillaged, pretending, that there some Vitellians were concealed. The indigent part of the populace failed not to join the soldiers in the general violence and spoil; so that on all hands nothing was heard but dismal complaints and outcries, and nothing seen but the dreadful calamities of a city stormed and sacked.

The miserable condition of the city.

d Domitian, who already enjoyed the name and residence of Cæsar, instead of striving to check the insolence of the soldiery, attended his infamous pleasures, and only by his dissolute life shewed himself the son of an emperor. Primus, in whose hands the whole power was lodged, made use of it only to plunder more freely, being wholly taken up in conveying from the palace treasure, moveables, and domestic slaves, as if he were still seizing the spoil of Cremona. When the fury of the soldiers began to abate, the senate met, and confirmed the sovereignty of Vespasian, decreeing to him with great alacrity all the titles and prerogatives ever invested in former princes. They declared him consul, giving him his son Titus for colleague in that dignity: Domitian they honoured with the prætorship and consular authority: they presented Primus with the consular ornaments, and Cornelius Fuscus and Arrius Varus with those of the prætorship. All these decrees were passed at the motion of

DURING these commotions in Italy, the Batavians revolted, under the conduct of the celebrated Claudius Civilis; but of the causes and events of this war, which continued long, we shall speak in the following reign. The people of Dacia too rose up in arms; a people never well-affected to the Romans, and then by no forces restrained, since the army was withdrawn out of Mæsia. They stormed the winter quarters of the auxiliary cohorts, passed the Danube, and were proceeding to demolish the entrenchments of the legions, when Mucianus happened to march through Mæsia with the forces of the east. As that commander was already apprised of the victory at Cremona, he detached the sixth legion to oppose the barbarians, and appointed f Fonteius Agrippa governor of Mæsia, with part of the troops which had surrendered at Cremona, and which it was thought adviseable to engage in a foreign war, that they might not disturb domestic peace. Agrippa obliged the enemy to repass the Danube; and, to prevent any farther attempts of the like nature, built a great number of forts on the banks of the Danube, and strengthened them with numerous garisons. In Pontus likewise great disturbances were raised by one Anicetus, formerly freed-man to king Polemon, under him in great power, and commander of the royal navy. As he was highly provoked against the Romans for changing the kingdom into a province, which happened in the reign of Nero, and by that means depriving him of all his authority, he laid hold of the present opportunity, and, levying forces under colour of assisting Vitellius, seized the city of Trebizond, burnt the fleet which guarded the coasts, and, entering into an alliance with the neighbouring barbarians, scoured the sea with scorn and insult, and committed dreadful ravages on the coasts of Asia. Against him Vespasian sent a choice body of legionaries, under the command of Virgilius Geminus, an officer distinguished in war; who, attacking the enemy while they were roving about in quest of booty, drove them into their vessels; then, with some galleys built with great expedition, chased Anicetus into the mouth of the river Chobus, where he relied upon the protection of Sedochus king of the Lazians, a people of Colchis. That prince seemed at first determined to defend his ally; but, as soon as a reward for his treachery was proposed and a war threatened, he betrayed Anicetus and all his followers to the conqueror. Thus ended that servile war; and Vespasian received an account of the success which had attended his arms, a few days before the joyful tidings were brought him of the great victory gained by his forces at Cremona.

C H A P. XIX.

From the death of Vitellius, to the death of Domitian, the last of the twelve Cæsars, in whom ended the Flavian family.

The descent,
birth, and actions of Vespasian,
before he attained the sovereignty.

THE Flavian family, now raised to the highest pitch of grandeur, was no-ways conspicuous, either for its lustre or antiquity. Titus Flavius, the emperor's grandfather, was a citizen of Reate, now Rieti, in the country of the Sabines; and in the civil wars between Cæsar and Pompey, served under the latter in quality of centurion, but returned home after the battle of Pharsalia; and, having obtained his pardon, betook himself to the mean employment of collecting taxes, under the farmers of the public revenue. His son, Titus Flavius Sabinus, followed the same profession, and acquitted himself in it with such integrity, that by several cities of Asia, where he was collector of the tax called quadragesima, statues were erected to him with this inscription, To the honest publican. Afterwards he withdrew into the country of the Helvetii, where he acquired a considerable fortune by lending money upon interest. He married Vespasia Polla, whose father had been military tribune and prefect of the camp; and had by her two children, Sabinus, of whom we have spoken above, and Vespasian, who was born on the seventeenth of November of the ninth year of the common christian æra; that is, five years before the death of Augustus; so that he was raised to the empire in the sixtieth year of his age. He was, amongst many other new men chosen from the municipal towns, from the colonies, and even from the provinces, admitted into the senate by the emperor Caligula. He indeed at first declined that dignity, but was at last, in a manner, constrained by his mother to accept it. He afterwards served in quality of military tribune in Thrace, was quæstor of the provinces of Cyrene and Crete, ædile, and prætor. He attended the emperor Claudius into Britain, where he distinguished himself, though only tribune of a legion, in a very eminent manner, as we have related in the reign of that prince. He was consul during the two last months of the eleventh year of Claudius's reign, and by Nero appointed governor of Africa in quality of proconsul. He married Flavia Domitilla, a native of Africa, at first slave to Statilius Capella, but afterwards manumised and made free of the city. By her he had two sons, Titus and Domitian, who reigned after him, and one daughter, named Domitilla, who died, as did also her mother, before his accession to the empire. Vespasian was, as Tacitus observes,

^a of all the emperors the only one by power changed for the better. While he was in a private station, he used to court the favour of the princes by the meanest flattery. During his prætorship he begged leave to exhibit extraordinary sports in honour of Caligula, on account of the pretended victory in Germany. He was one of the few sycophants who were of opinion, that those who were said to have conspired against that prince should be publicly executed, and that their bodies should be left unburied. In the presence of the whole senate he returned Caligula thanks for having done him the honour of inviting him to his table. He was chiefly indebted to Narcissus, the freedman of Claudius, for the consulship, and the two sacerdotal dignities which he enjoyed; what dignities these were, we are no-where told. After the death of Narcissus, his great patron, he withdrew and led a private life, dreading the violent spirit of Agrippina, who bore an irreconcilable hatred to that minister and all his friends. It was therefore probably after her death, that he was by Nero appointed proconsul of Africa, in which government he acquitted himself, according to Suetonius ^a, with honour and integrity; according to Tacitus ^b, with ignominy and public hatred. The former writer acknowledges, that, during a sedition at Adrumetum, he was outrageously insulted by the populace; and, on the other hand, it is well known, that no province espoused the cause of Vitellius, and opposed the preferment of Vespasian, with more ardour than that of Africa; a manifest proof that his government had not been popular. Soon after his return from Africa, his affairs being in a bad condition and his credit at stake, he was obliged to mortgage his house and possessions to his brother Sabinus, and in the mean time to support himself and his family with the mean gain he earned by selling and changing horses, nay, and by other means still more unworthy; for he was convicted of having extorted from a young knight the sum of two hundred thousand sesterces, for employing his interest in procuring him a place in the senate, against the inclination and express will of his father. He attended Nero into Achaia, where he incurred that prince's displeasure, and was forbid the court, for his inattention while the emperor was singing; a crime, which had nigh cost him his life at Rome, as we have related elsewhere. Hereupon he withdrew into the country, and there led a life altogether private and retired, expecting every moment his last doom, when he was, contrary to his expectation, named by Nero to command in the war against the Jews, as a person of great military abilities, and one who, on account of his mean extraction, gave him no umbrage. He was therefore sent into Judæa with three legions, eight squadrons of horse, and ten auxiliary cohorts, his son Titus serving under him in quality of his lieutenant. In the course of that war, which proved so fatal to the Jewish nation, Vespasian acquired signal reputation. In every duty incumbent upon a leader, or even a soldier, he was indefatigable: it was he who always led the march; he who always chose the ground for incamping. Upon consultations and dispatches he spent nights and days, and was ever ready upon any exigency to encounter the enemy hand to hand. His diet was such as chance presented. In his garb and dress he varied little from a common soldier. In short, had he been exempt from avarice, he would have equalled the most famous commanders of ancient times. With that vice he is charged by most writers; among the rest by Tacitus, who owed to him his first promotion in the state; but nevertheless declares, as becomes an impartial historian, against admitting personal hatred or affection in the characters of men. After the death of Nero and Galba, while Otho and Vitellius were contending for the sovereignty, he began to cherish hopes of obtaining it himself, relying on several prodigies, prophecies, and propitious responses of oracles (C). Of the many predictions, that of Josephus the historian is the

(C) The ancients take notice of many prodigies prefaging his future grandeur. In his grounds, says Tacitus (10), while he was in the bloom of his age, a cypress-tree, signally tall, fell suddenly; but the day following rose again, and resumed fresh growth and verdure; which was, according to the concurring testimonies of the soothsayers, an omen of extraordinary grandeur in the state; yet at first the whole preface seemed to have been literally fulfilled by his being honoured with the triumphal ornaments, which he acquired by his conduct in Britain; by his bearing the dignity of consul, and by his renown in vanquishing the Jews. But when he had passed through these honours, he began to believe, that the empire was the thing prefaged. He was confirmed in this belief by the answer returned him by Basilides, priest of the god Carmel, so called from mount Carmel, on which stood the altar of that deity; a deity, as Tacitus observes, not distinguished by any statue or temple, but only by an altar. As Vespasian

the most famous, who saluted Vespasian with the title of emperor even in Nero's reign, and assured him, he should be soon invested with the sovereign power. His prediction is mentioned not only by himself^c, but likewise by Suetonius^d, who tells us, that Josephus, being by Vespasian's orders put in irons, boldly affirmed, that in a short time he should by him be set at liberty; but that he should be emperor first. However, that the empire was by the dark laws of fate, by predictions, and prophecies, foretold and ordained to Vespasian and his sons, was, says Tacitus, what we believed, after we had seen them emperors^e. Vespasian, being encouraged by Mucianus, governor of Syria, by Tiberius Alexander, governor of Egypt, and by all his officers, not to neglect the present opportunity, while two competitors, of all men the most unworthy, were contending for the empire, he at length yielded, as we have already related, and was proclaimed emperor at Alexandria on the first of July of the sixty-ninth year of the christian æra; on the third of the same month in Judæa, where he then was; on the fifteenth in Syria; and a few days after in all the provinces of the east. He was not in himself any-ways changed by so sudden and so mighty a turn of fortune: no loftiness appeared in his aspect, no arrogance, nor any new behaviour, under his new character. He immediately rewarded his friends, raising some to military commands, others to be governors of provinces, several to the rank of senators, most of them men of signal merit and renown, and who afterwards acquired the highest honours in the state. As he thought it below him to court the soldiers by largesses, he promised them no greater donative in the heat of the civil war, than had been given them by others during full peace. In the council which he established at Berytus for the direction of all momentous affairs, it was resolved, that Titus should pursue the war against the Jews, and Mucianus march with part of the forces against Vitellius. But Titus undertook nothing till the next year; and Antonius Primus, with the Illyrian army, defeated the troops of Vitellius before the arrival of Mucianus, made himself master of Rome and all Italy, and caused the unhappy emperor to be publicly executed as a common criminal: all which transactions we have already related at length. In the mean time, Vespasian, having passed some time at Antioch, the capital of Syria, proceeded from thence to Egypt, where he received the joyful tidings of the victory gained by Primus at Cremona. Hereupon he hastened to Alexandria, with a design to distress Rome by famine, since from Egypt chiefly the city was supplied with corn. He was at the same time preparing to invade Africa by sea and land, in order to bring upon the enemy, by intercepting their provisions, the calamity of hunger, with that of dissention. But, in the mean time, many persons of all ranks and degrees arrived from Italy, to acquaint him with the fate and fall of Vitellius; which were no sooner known, than multitudes flocked from all quarters, notwithstanding it was then winter, to court the favour of the new emperor; inso-much, that Alexandria, the greatest city of the empire after Rome, proved too small for the vast numbers of ambassadors, deputies, noblemen, officers, &c. who flocked thither. Among the rest, ambassadors arrived from Vologeses king of Parthia, who offered to assist him with forty thousand Parthian horse. Vespasian returned him thanks, and, desiring he would send ambassadors to the senate, acquainted him, that the commonwealth was re-established in peace^f. The news of the death of Vitellius made Vespasian alter his measures; for instead of distressing the city, which had already proclaimed him emperor, with famine, he dispatched thither a great number of vessels laden with corn; which arrived very seasonably, there not being at that time remaining in all the public stores above ten days provisions of grain^g. As the winter-season was far advanced, Vespasian continued some months at Alexandria, waiting a safe passage from the gentle weather returning with the summer.

Vespasian offered sacrifice there, and was entertaining great hopes and views, Basilides the priest, having diligently surveyed the intrails, addressed him thus: Whatever design it is which you meditate, O Vespasian, whether to build a house, or extend your domains, or to enlarge your train of slaves, to you is granted a mighty and large settlement, infinite bounds, and multitudes of men. These mysterious words were immediately spread abroad by fame, and by all explained as presaging the empire to Vespasian. Many responses of oracles and prodigies of the like nature, are related by Suetonius (11) and Dion Cassius (12); but we shall not trespass upon the patience of our readers with a detail of them.

- ^a In the mean time, Mucianus arrived at Rome, according to Josephus, the day after the death of Vitellius, and in a moment drew to himself, as he had been invested by Vespasian with an uncontrouled power, the whole sway. Licinius Mucianus was, according to the character which Tacitus has drawn of him, a man remarkable for a strange combination of good and bad qualities; luxury and vigilance, haughtiness and complaisance; when unemployed, excessively voluptuous; of infinite abilities and activity, when business required them. Hence his equal share of praise and reproach; as a public minister admired, as a private voluptuary condemned. He was a great master in the several arts of engaging, an able orator, well versed in civil affairs, prompt in foreseeing events, dextrous at concerting schemes, mighty in credit with those who were above him, under him, or in equal authority with him; in short, such a man as could easier create an emperor than be one. Vespasian, as he was chiefly indebted to him for the empire, upon his departure for Italy, invested him with an unlimited power, and is even said to have trusted him with his signet, as if he had been his partner in the sovereignty. Hence, upon his arrival at Rome, he was by all looked upon and revered, rather as the emperor's colleague, than as a subordinate minister. Quite sunk was the power of Antonius Primus and Arrius Varus, whom Vespasian had already appointed captain of the prætorian guards. As Mucianus could not well dissemble his animosity towards them, the city immediately turned her back upon her late favourites, and devoted herself to the new minion. To him alone court was paid, to him all addresses were made: neither was he wanting to his own grandeur; for he never appeared in public but encompassed with guards, and attended with an equipage becoming a sovereign. He forbore indeed the name, but performed all the functions of sovereignty. Soon after his arrival, he caused Asiaticus, the late emperor's freed-man, to atone for his late wicked sway, by suffering the death of a slave. His doom was by every one expected and even wished for; but the death of Calpurnius Galerianus occasioned a mighty and general dread in the city. He was the son of Caius Piso, who, in the reign of Nero, had aspired at the sovereignty; but had himself no share in that conspiracy, nor had ever offered to disturb the state. However, as he was of an illustrious family, of a graceful person, and greatly beloved by the people, he was, by order of Mucianus, committed to the custody of a band of soldiers, sent forty miles from Rome, and there put to death by having his veins openedⁱ.
- ^b Mucianus was thus ruling with absolute sway in Rome, the Batavians were carrying on the war against the Romans with stupenduous success in Lower Germany. Of that war we shall here, as in its proper place, (for it was happily concluded this year, the first of Vespasian's reign) briefly recount the causes and events. The Batavians, originally the same people with the Cattans, who dwelt beyond the Rhine, being driven thence by a domestic insurrection, settled at the extreme borders of Gaul, in an island formed by the mouths of the Rhine and the Ocean. According to this description, the Batavians possessed South Holland, part of the country of Utrecht, and the island of Betaw, in the dukedom of Guelderland. They were not subjects, but allies, of Romans, being obliged to assist them only with troops commanded by men of the first rank amongst them. They had at this time eight cohorts, men thoroughly exercised in the wars of Germany and Britain. These Vitellius had gained over to his party, and a great share they had in the victory at Bedriacum; but proving afterwards refractory and ungovernable, the emperor thought it adviseable to remand them back to their own country. Julius Paulus and Claudius Civilis, both men of royal descent, greatly surpassed the rest in credit and quality. The former was slain by Fonteius Capito, who falsely charged him with rebellion. The latter was put in irons and sent to Nero; but by Galba declared innocent, and set at liberty. Under Vitellius he was again in danger of his life, being charged with treason: and hence his hatred to the Romans, which prompted him to arm his countrymen against them. However, as he was a man of great address, lest the Romans should look upon him as a public enemy, if he once appeared to have revolted from them, in the beginning of the war between Vitellius and Vespasian, he pretended an attachment to the latter, and was, by letters from Antonius Primus, ordered to stop and drive back the forces summoned to succour Vitellius. Civilis therefore, determined to revolt, but, concealing for the present his main drift, contented himself with diverting the

Batavian youth from lifting themselves, pursuant to the orders of Vitellius. Soon after, pretending only to celebrate a banquet, he assembled the chiefs of the nation and the most daring amongst the populace, in a sacred grove, where, when they had caroused till far in the night, and were warmed and bold, he acquainted them with his real design, displayed the praises and renown of their nation, enumerated the insults they had suffered, the oppression they groaned under, and all the miseries attending upon a state of servitude. As he was heard with great applause, he bound them all with many barbarous ceremonies in a combination. He then dispatched messengers to the Caninefates, who inhabited part of the island, to engage them in the same cause and association. The Caninefates fell readily into his measures; and choosing for their leader one Brinno, famous for brutal bravery, took the field; and being joined by the Frisians, a people beyond the Rhine, forced the winter incampment of two cohorts, burnt down all the strong holds in the island, and massacred all the Roman victuallers and traders, whom they found confidently rambling about, as in time of peace. Hereupon Civilis, pulling off the mask and openly joining the Caninefates and Frisians, marched to attack the Romans, who, under the conduct of Aquilus, had retired to the upper part of the island. The conflict was scarce begun, when a band of Tungrians, who served under the Romans, went over to the enemy. At the same time, the Roman fleet, consisting of twenty-four vessels, the rowers being for the most part natives of Batavia, rowed away directly to the enemy's shore. By this means the Roman forces were easily defeated, put to flight, and inhumanly butchered, both by the enemy and their own companions. Upon the news of this victory, the Germans immediately dispatched ambassadors to Civilis, with offers of succours. On the other hand, Hordeonius Flaccus, who commanded the army in Upper Germany, ordered Memmius Lupercus to march out forthwith against the enemy with two legions, all the cavalry of the Ubians and Treverians, and a squadron of Batavian horse, men long since debauched in their fidelity to the Romans, but feigning great zeal for their cause, purposely to betray them in the very heat of the fight. Accordingly the two armies having joined battle, the Batavian cavalry, deserting the legions while they were fighting with great bravery, fled over to Civilis; then instantly, like enemies, turned upon the Romans. Yet the legionaries, though pressed on all sides, still kept their ranks and stood their ground, till the auxiliary Ubians and Treverians betook themselves to a scandalous flight, dispersing all over the fields. Against them the Batavians bent their fury and pursuit; which gave the legions an opportunity of retiring with safety to the old camp, which, as we have observed in the reign of Tiberius, is placed by most geographers near the present city of Stanten in the duchy of Cleves. About the same time, the eight Batavian cohorts, which, in obedience to the orders of Vitellius, were upon their march to Rome, being informed of the revolt of their countrymen and the advantages by them already gained, returned, and took their rout towards Lower Germany, there to join Civilis. Herennius Gallus, who then governed Bonna, now Bonn, attempted to oppose the passage of the Batavians at the head of three thousand legionaries and some cohorts hastily raised; but was by them defeated with great slaughter. The conquerors, avoiding Cologne, pursued their march, without committing any hostilities, and joined Civilis, who seeing himself now at the head of a regular army, but still dreading the formidable power of the Romans, obliged all who were with him to swear allegiance to Vespasian, and dispatched ambassadors to the two legions in the old camp, requiring them to take the same oath. The answer they returned was, That they would not follow the counsels of a known traitor, nor those of a public enemy: and that a Batavian fugitive must not interfere in the affairs of the Roman state, but prepare to meet the doom due to his enormous crimes. Civilis, highly provoked at this answer, roused to arms the whole Batavian nation, and, being joined by the Bructerans and Tencterans, attacked the camp with a numberless multitude and a fury hardly to be expressed. But the Romans, though scarce five thousand men, made so vigorous a defence, that Civilis, despairing of success by the method of force and storming, changed his measures, and blocked them up on all sides, not doubting, but they would be soon constrained by famine to capitulate. In the mean time, Hordeonius Flaccus, understanding that the camp was besieged, immediately dispatched Dillius Vocola, commander of the eighteenth legion, and Herennius Gallus, with powerful succours to the relief of the two legions. But while these two commanders were still incamped at Gelduba upon the Rhine, now Gelnub, a small village near Ordingen, in the territory

Put the Romans to flight.

Eight Batavian cohorts go over to Civilis.

^a of Cologne, news was brought him of the defeat of Vitellius at Cremona; whereupon the officers immediately declared for Vespasian, forced the foldiers to swear allegiance to him, and sent Alpinus Montanus to acquaint Civilis with the victory, and desire him to lay down his arms and disband his troops, if with them he meant to assist Vespasian, since they all had already acknowledged him emperor. But Civilis had something else in view, and therefore openly declared, that he would never sheath his sword, till he had redeemed both his own country and Gaul from the tyrannical yoke of the Romans; and that instant dispatched against Vocula the veteran cohorts and the flower of his German forces, under the command of Julius Maximus and Claudius Victor, husband to his sister. These coming upon the Romans quite unpre-
^b pared, put them to flight and made a dreadful havock of them. But, in the mean time, some Gascon bands, lately raised by Galba, arriving at Gelduba, fell upon the enemy in the rear, whilst earnestly pursuing the defeat, filled them with dismay, and inspired the Romans with fresh courage; so that they returned to the charge, and, with the assistance of their allies, put the enemy in their turn to flight, and gave them a total overthrow. All the bravest men of the Batavian infantry were cut off; but their horse escaped with the Roman standards and prisoners taken in the beginning of the encounter. Vocula, encouraged with this success, marched against the enemy besieging the old camp, and, after a most bloody conflict, forced them to abandon the enterprize. In the heat of the engagement, Civilis, being thrown by the fall of his horse, was throughout both armies believed to have been dangerously
^c wounded, or slain: and to this report chiefly was owing the victory gained by the Romans. Vocula, instead of pursuing the enemy, when broken and in disorder, applied himself to fortify the old camp; and, having strengthened it with some new works, returned to Gelduba, and thence proceeded to Novesium, now Nuys, where Hordeonius Flaccus lay incamped with part of the army. But Vocula was scarce gone, when Civilis again laid siege to the old camp, and advancing with a strong detachment to Gelduba, made himself master of that place; but was put to flight by the Roman cavalry near Novesium. But, in the mean time, the foldiers began to mutiny, and claim present payment of their donative; for they had learnt, that the money
^d was already sent thither by Vitellius. Hordeonius immediately complied with their demand; but distributed the money in the name of Vespasian. The foldiers no sooner received it, than they abandoned themselves without controul to debauchery and good cheer, to nocturnal revellings and cabals; and, when intoxicated with wine, renewed their ancient fury and rage against Hordeonius, who was by them suspected of favouring Civilis, because, from a mind well-disposed towards Vespasian, he had not opposed his first attempts. As none of the general officers dared to check or reprimand them, in the height of their rage they violently burst into the bed-chamber of their general, dragged him out, and then butchered him. Vocula would have undergone the same fate, had he not made his escape in the disguise of a slave. They then restored the images of Vitellius, tore those of Vespasian, and committed, during ^e that night, innumerable disorders. But their rage being appeased upon the return of day, dread and consciousness took place; the first, the fourteenth, and the eighteenth legions were easily reclaimed by Vocula, and led by him, after they had again taken the oath to Vespasian, against Civilis, who had laid siege to Magontiacum, now Mentz. Before their arrival the besiegers were withdrawn; but the Romans coming up with them, as they marched carelessly and apprised of no danger, fell upon them sword in hand, and made a dreadful havock of the dispersed and disorderly multitude^k.

The Roman soldiers mutiny.

Murder Hordeonius Flaccus their general.

The Gauls revolt.

^f In the mean time, the death of Vitellius, the murder of Hordeonius, and the burning of the capitol, being divulged through Germany and Gaul, both these nations rushed into open hostilities against the Roman people. A motly multitude of Cattans, Usipians, Mattiarians, and other German nations, joined Civilis. The Gauls too, laying hold of the present opportunity, while the Romans were weakened and broken by such successive civil wars, combined to attempt the recovery of their ancient liberty, being strongly moved by the burning of the capitol to believe, that the dissolution of the empire was at hand. The city, they said, had of old been taken by the Gauls; but the mansion of Jupiter having escaped, the empire had thence continued to subsist. The Druids too animated them with vain oracles, that to nations beyond the Alps the empire of the world was portended. The chief sway among the Gauls was borne at this time by Classicus, Julius Tutor, and Julius Sabinus; the two former Treverians, and the latter a native of Langres. These three, having in private conferences founded the minds of the rest, and engaged in their designs such as they judged proper, came at length to a resolution of throwing off all disguises, and openly declaring against Rome. The only hesitation which occurred was, how to dispose of the Roman forces then in Gaul. Some were for massacring them all, others for putting to the sword only their commanders, since the common herd, bereft of their leaders, would be easily inticed into the confederacy. The latter opinion prevailed; and this was the substance of their first consultation. The conspirators then dispatched incendiaries into all the regions of Gaul, to rouse them to war; but, in the mean time, feigned great obsequiousness and respect to Vocula, who was well apprised of their designs; but thought proper, as he wanted force to thwart them, to dissemble in his turn, and to pursue the same artifices which were pursued against him. With this view he repaired to Cologne; but Classicus and Tutor, who were both commanders of the Treverian horse, incamping by themselves and separating the first time from the legions, he returned back, and with the legions alone proceeded to Novesium, a numerous body of Gauls having pitched in the open fields about two miles from that place. To the camp of the Gauls, as hostilities were not yet begun on either side, daily resorted great numbers of Roman soldiers; and there, as they found themselves surrounded with terrors on all sides, they agreed to purchase their own safety, by committing an iniquity till then unknown among the Romans, which was to swear allegiance to the Gauls, and promise either to murder or deliver up in chains their officers. Vocula was not unapprised of what passed in the camp of the Gauls; but, judging it beneath him to fly, assembled the soldiery, and having in vain attempted to divert them from so monstrous an iniquity, he retired with a design to put a present period to his life; but being restrained by his freed-men and slaves, he was soon after murdered by Æmilius Longinus, a deserter from the first legion, sent by Classicus for that purpose. His lieutenants, Herennius and Numisius, were only put in irons. After this, Classicus, assuming the badges of a Roman magistrate, entered the camp, and administered the new oath to the legions there, every one swearing allegiance to the sovereignty and empire of the Gauls. Between Tutor and Classicus was shared the charge of managing the war. The former laid siege to Cologne, and forced the inhabitants to take the same oath, as he did all the soldiers who lay farther up the Rhine. Classicus strove to gain over by fair promises the two legions that were shut up in the ancient camp, and were obliged, for want of provisions, after having consumed in food their horses and other beasts of burden, to support themselves by plucking shrubs and plants, and picking the herbs which sprouted amongst the stones of the walls. But at length, upon so much glory and patience, they brought a foul stain, by sending deputies to Civilis to beg their lives. Neither were their supplications received, till they had sworn homage and fidelity to the Gauls. Then he granted them their lives; but reserved the plunder of the camp to himself, appointing guards to secure the money, slaves, and baggage, and others to convoy the soldiers thus departing divested of all. When they had marched about five miles, the Germans rushed upon them out of an ambush, and cut the greater part of them in pieces. The remainder fled back to the camp; which the Germans, by throwing in firebrands, set on fire, so that such of the unhappy Romans, as had survived the late slaughter, were now all to a man consumed by the flames. Civilis, elated with the success of his arms, soon reduced all the neighbouring cities, some of them being willing to follow his fortune, and others awed by his power¹.

In the mean time, Julius Sabinus, having pulled down and broken the public tables containing the confederacy with Rome, caused himself to be proclaimed Cæsar; and, leading a huge host of his countrymen the Lingones, suddenly invaded the adjacent state of the Sequanians, who continued faithful to the Romans; but being by them put to flight, in order to raise a report that he had perished, he set on fire the country-dwelling whither he had fled, and by that means saved his life yet for nine years. We shall have occasion to speak of him in the sequel of this history. By this victory of the Sequanians the fury of the war was stayed in Gaul. The several states began by degrees to recover coolness and judgment, the rest following the example of the people a people of Rheims, who published all over the provinces of Gaul an invitation for assembling their several deputies, to consult which conduced most to the good of the whole, war or peace. The assembly was held at Rheims, where Tullius Valentinus, one of the embassadors of the Treverians, with great vehemence promoted the war; but was opposed by Julius Auspex, one of the chiefs in the state of Rheims, who displayed at length the power of the Romans and the blessings of peace. They all extolb led the courage and resolution of Valentinus, but followed the counsel of Auspex, most of them being deterred from pursuing a general confederacy, by the mutual jealousy and competition of the several provinces. It was asked, Where must be the head of the war? whither must they recur for supreme authority? and, should all their pur-c suits prosper, what place would they chuse for the seat of empire? Some boasted their alliances, some their wealth and forces, others their antiquity; and from all these each claimed superior prerogative and rule. At length, after long and warm debates, they agreed to acquiesce in their present condition. To the Treverians letters were immediately dispatched in the name of the states of Gaul, advising them to lay down their arms, while their pardon was yet to be procured, and their friends were ready to intercede for them, if they shewed remorse. But Valentinus, a better speaker than commander, opposed this counsel, and shut the ears of the nation against it. What chiefly disposed the Gauls to peace was, the news they received, that an army was advancing full march against them, consisting of four legions from Italy, two from Spain, and one from Britain, under the conduct of two signal commanders, d Annius Gallus and Petilius Cerealis, whom Mucianus had dispatched from Rome to put a stop to the further conquests of Civilis and Classicus. Sextilius Felix arrived before them, having at the head of some auxiliary cohorts forced a passage through Rhætia. To him joined themselves the twenty-first legion, and the squadron of horse furnished the Singular, commanded by Julius Briganticus, nephew to Civilis; but hated by his uncle, and hating him. With these forces Felix attacked and routed

e the Treverians commanded by Tutor near Bingium, now Bingen, and in a few days obliged the Tribocians, the Vaugiones, the Cercatians, and the Nemetians, to desert their countrymen, and return to the Romans. After he had thus made himself master of the countries bordering on the Rhine, from Mentz to the present city of Basle, the legions, who had revolted to the Gauls, renewed of their own accord the oath of allegiance to Vespasian; and leaving Treves, where they were then quartered, retired to Mets, a city confederate with the Romans. In the mean time, Petilius Cerealis arriving at Magontiacum, and being informed there, that Valentinus was posted at Rigodulum, now Rigol, with a numerous band of Treverians, he drew into one body whatever soldiers he found at Magontiacum, with the forces he had brought over the Alps; and, having reached Rigodulum in three marches, attacked the enemy's intrenchments, tho' inclosed by the mountains and the river Moselle, and strengthened with deep trenches and barricades of huge stone. The Treverians fought for some time with great resolution; but were in the end forced to abandon their camp, and save themselves by f flight over the mountains. The Romans pursued them, and in the pursuit took many persons of great distinction, and amongst them Valentinus their general. The next day Cerealis entered Treves; which city the soldiers were passionate for razing, as the birth-place of Classicus and Tutor; but Cerealis, dreading to inure his soldiers to licentiousness and cruelty, checked their rage; for since the civil wars had ceased, the soldiery were more tractable in such as were foreign. Their attention was likewise diverted by another object, the arrival of the legions which had sworn allegiance to the empire of the Gauls. They appeared sad and dejected, keeping their eyes immoveably fixed upon the ground, and imploring their pardon by silence and weeping, till Cerealis comforted them, ascribing their desertion to the inevitable operations of fate, and assuring them, that neither he nor the emperor would remember their past offences. At the same time he caused an order to be published throughout the camp, that no one should, upon any dispute, reproach his fellow soldier with mutiny or desertion^m.

this general rout and havock being brought to Cerealis, while yet in his chamber, nay in his bed, (for he passed not the night in the camp) he started up, and, undaunted by all this confusion and distress, strove with his own hand to stop the fugitives; animated them, tho' void of armour, with his own example; and heading such as were remarkably brave, recovered the bridge, and secured it by a guard of armed men. Then hastening to the camp, and there rallying the dispersed legions, he not only drove out the enemy, but the same day forced their intrenchments, and recovered the city of Cologne, where he found the wife and sister of Civilis with the son of Classicus. Civilis, having after this unhappy fight recruited his forces with incredible expedition, posted himself in the old camp, where he was attacked by Cerealis, reinforced by the accession of three legions. But as the fields round about were naturally marshy, and Civilis had by a great dam diverted the course of the Rhine, which thence flooded all the neighbouring grounds, the Romans were easily repulsed, and their cavalry put to flight by some German squadrons sallying out against them. By the issue of this encounter, both the leaders were prompted, tho' from different motives, to put the whole to the issue of a general battle; Civilis eager to pursue his good fortune, Cerealis to cancel his dishonour. Accordingly the next day both armies appeared early in the field, and engaged with equal fury and resolution. After the conflict had lasted many hours, the Germans were in the end put to flight, and the war had been finished that day, had not the conquerors been prevented, by night approaching and a sudden storm, from pursuing the flying foe. After this overthrow, Civilis withdrew to the island of the Batavians: Classicus, Tutor, and a hundred and thirteen senators of Treves crossed the Rhine to raise new forces; wherein they were attended with such success, that soon after they returned with a vast multitude, and at the same time made a fourfold assault upon the Roman forces posted at Avenacum, Vada, Grinnes, and Batavodurum, now Arnhem, Wageningen, Rhenen, and Duerstede. They were every-where repulsed with great slaughter, and forced to cast themselves precipitately into the river. Notwithstanding this disappointment and defeat, Civilis, a few days after, entered in the dead of the night the camp of Cerealis, upon the bank of the Rhine, made a dreadful havock of the Roman soldiers, while, apprised of no danger, they were reposing in their tents, and carried off a great number of captives. The general, half awake and almost naked, escaped through a mistake of the enemy; for they had carried off the admiral's ship, distinguished by its flag, from a belief that Cerealis was in it. But he had passed that night elsewhere, as many believed, in the embraces of Claudia Sacrata, a native of Cologne. The centinels borrowed an excuse for their negligence from the dishonour of their general, alledging, that they were enjoined to keep silence for fear of interrupting his repose; so that, as speaking was restrained, they had dropped asleep. But, notwithstanding this advantage, Civilis was in the end obliged even to abandon his own island, and retire beyond the Rhine. Cerealis committed dreadful ravages all over the island of the Batavians; but, through policy usual to generals, left all the lands and dwellings of Civilis untouched, tempting at the same time the Batavians with an offer of peace, and Civilis with a promise of pardon, which he resolved to accept, finding his countrymen tired of the war, and inclined to prevent the desolation and ruin of the whole nation, by devoting him to punishment. Having therefore desired a conference, the bridge upon the river Wabal was broken down in the middle; and the two generals stepping forwards on each side, stood upon the opposite extremities. The issue of this conference was, as we learn from Josephus, the rest of Tacitus's history being lost, an entire submission on one side, and an unreserved pardon on the other. The Batavians remained in the same condition they were in before the war broke out, that is, exempt from all manner of tributes, and only obliged to supply the Romans with troops when required; a condition this, bordering upon liberty.

DURING these transactions in Germany, Vespasian and Titus commenced consuls, the former the second time, and both absent. The senate was therefore assembled on the first of January by Julius Frontinus, city-prætor, when they decreed, that public thanks should be returned to the general officers, to the armies, and to the confederate kings, for having espoused with so much zeal the cause of Vespasian. From Tertius Julianus they took away the prætorship, for having forsaken his legion, when

- a when it was about to declare for Vespasian, and transferred that dignity to Plotius Griphus. Upon Hormus, Vespasian's freed-man, they conferred the equestrian dignity. Soon after, Frontinus resigned, for what motive we are no-where told, his office, which was assumed by Domitian, whose name was prefixed to all letters and edicts, but the whole sway remained in Mucianus. The young prince, however, boldly exerted many acts of power, at the instigation of his intimates, or his own wanton will^a. Nay, Suetonius tells us, that in one day he disposed of above twenty offices in the city and provinces; and adds, that he was on that account gently rebuked by the emperor, who, in a letter to his son, returned him thanks for not having displaced him too, and sent one to succeed him. But Antonius Primus and
- b Arrius Varus gave Mucianus far greater umbrage: they were both renowned for their late famous exploits in war, in great credit with the soldiery, and beloved by the populace. Antonius was besides reported to have solicited Scribonianus Crassus, the brother of Piso whom Galba had adopted, to assume the sovereignty, Mucianus therefore, seeing he could not openly crush Primus, pretending a great friendship and value for him, heaped publicly mighty praises upon him in the senate, made him great promises in private, put him in hopes of the government of Hither Spain, void by the departure of Cluvius Rufus, &c. Having thus intirely gained him, he dismissed the seventh legion, which was inviolably attached to him, to their winter quarters, at a great distance from Rome; and at the same time sent the third
- c legion back into Syria, and the rest of the forces into Germany, to serve there under Cerealis. Having by this means quite broken the power of Primus, and disburdened the city of those who were apt to raise tumults and disorder, Rome returned to her former tranquillity, the laws resumed their force, and the magistrates their wonted functions^r.

- Domitian*, appearing now for the first time in the senate, spoke, in few words and with great modesty, of the absence of his father and that of his brother, and also concerning his own youth and insufficiency. Then he proposed, that all the honours which had been bestowed on Galba, but afterwards abrogated by Otho, should be restored. Curtius Montanus moved, that some public honour should be likewise
- d paid to the memory of Piso. The fathers ordained both; but of what regarded Piso nothing was executed. In the next place were drawn by lot commissioners, who were to cause restitution to be made of whatever had been usurped by violence during the war, and to restrain the public expences. To Tertius Julianus, as soon as it was known that he had fled to Vespasian, the office of prætor was restored; but Griphus still retained the ensigns of that dignity. Before the assembly broke up, one of the senators, by name Junius Mauricus, made suit to Domitian, that he would impart to the senate the registers of the late emperors, that they might thence discover who had been solicited to be admitted accusers, and against whom. But the young prince judiciously replied, that in an affair of this sort the sentiments
- e of the emperor must be first learnt. However, P. Egnatius Celer, the accuser of the celebrated Sorranus Borea, was condemned; but Mucianus haranguing in behalf of the informers, and exhorting the fathers to obliterate the impressions of all repentment, and forget the grievances arising from the necessity of the late times, all further prosecutions were dropt^s. This year Mucianus ordered the son of Vitellius to be put to death, pretending, that civil discord would never cease, unless the seeds of war were utterly extinguished. He treated Antonius Primus with such haughtiness, that he forced him to retire from Rome and recur to Vespasian, by whom he was received without any great marks of friendship or disfavour, the emperor's mind being under a conflict, on one side swayed by the great services of that commander,
- f by whose conduct the war was accomplished, on the other by letters from Mucianus. The other courtiers at the same time combined to disgrace him, charging him with arrogance, over-bearing and heightening the charge with the enormities of his former life. Neither failed he to raise to himself new enemies by his haughty carriage; for with excessive ostentation he used to recount his own exploits and deserts, treating the other commanders with the utmost contempt, especially Cæcina, whom he used to revile as a captive, and a man of no spirit, who had tamely submitted. Hence by degrees he sunk in his character; but from the emperor retained to the last some appearance of favour. Of him we find no further mention made by

by the ancient writers. Mucianus likewise displaced Arrius Varus, commander of the prætorian guards; and to make him some amends for the loss of this employment, bestowed upon him another, that of supplying the city with grain, which had been formerly discharged by persons of the first quality. To soften Domitian, who had a great kindness for Varus, he bestowed the command of the guards upon Arretinus Clemens, who was nearly allied to the house of Vespasian, and very dear to Domitian. The father of Arretinus had discharged the same trust with great credit under Caligula, whence his name was well-pleasing to the soldiery. The guards had been hitherto commanded by a Roman knight; but Arretinus was, as Tacitus informs us, by rank a senator ^t.

miracles.

Vespasian, in the mean time, continued at Alexandria, where he is said to have worked some miracles. A blind man, commonly known at Alexandria, prostrating himself at his feet, implored a cure for his want of sight, telling the emperor, that he had been warned by the god Serapis to recur to him, and beseech him, that with his spittle he would condescend to wash his cheeks and the balls of his eyes. Another, lame in his hand, by the direction of the same god, prayed him to tread upon it. Vespasian at first derided them; but, as they continued to importune him, he began to waver, fearing on one side the imputation of vanity, and on the other drawn into hopes, through the intreaties of the suppliants and the arguments of flatterers. At length, considering himself as an instrument chosen by the gods to accomplish the cure, he undertook the task with a cheerful countenance, before a vast multitude intent upon the issue. Instantly the lame hand recovered full strength, and upon the eyes of the blind light broke in. Tacitus assures us, that even in his time both these events continued to be recounted and averred by those who had been eye-witnesses of them, and could reap no advantage from their flattery. Vespasian was hence seized with an eager desire of visiting the residence of the deity, in order to consult him about the state and fortune of the empire. He therefore commanded all to retire from the temple, and then entered himself. While he was there, he suddenly perceived one of the grandees of Egypt, named Basilides, standing by him, tho' he knew him to be then at a great distance from Alexandria and confined by sickness. However, he examined the priests, whether Basilides had that day entered the temple; asked such as he met, whether he had been seen in the city; then by horsemen, purposely dispatched, he fully learnt, that Basilides was at that instant eighty miles from thence ^v. St. Austin, without questioning the truth of these facts, attested by several writers of great authority, observes, that Vespasian, according to Tacitus's account, ordered the physicians to examine first, whether such lameness and blindness were curable by human aid; who reported, that in the one the power of sight was not wholly extinct, but would return, were the obstacles removed; and in the other the joints were only distorted, and might be restored with regular pressure. Hence St. Austin concludes, that such cures were not above the power of men, and much less above that of the evil spirits, endowed with a superior knowledge, and on this occasion exerting it, to eclipse, if possible, the miracles wrought by the apostles and their disciples ^w. As for the vision in the temple, it might well have been the effect of a warm and strong imagination.

Arrives in Italy.

Vespasian, imbarquing at last in the port of Alexandria, sailed for Italy; and, having visited in his passage the island of Rhodes and several cities of Asia Minor, landed, according to Josephus, on the south side of the promontory of Iapygia or Otranto. At Brundisium he was met by Mucianus and a great number of senators and Roman knights; and at Beneventum by his son Domitian. On his rout to Rome, he was received every-where with loud shouts of joy, with applauses, and acclamations; for every one entertained a mighty opinion of his virtues, and looked upon him as one sent by the gods to restore the empire to its former lustre and tranquillity. As he drew near the city, the far greater part of the inhabitants flocked out to welcome him, and conduct him in a kind of triumph to the capitol, the streets through which he passed being strewed with flowers, and the whole city, like a temple, filled with precious odours and perfumes. Altars were every-where raised and victims slain, with supplications to the gods, that Vespasian might rule the empire many years, and his son Titus after him; that the sovereignty might for ever remain in his family, and Rome flourish under them ^x.

- ^a GREAT things were expected of Vespasian by all ranks of men, and no one was disappointed in his expectation : for he made it his whole business to re-establish the commonwealth, and restore the empire to its former grandeur ; to conform to the laws, and see that all others conformed to them ; to consult the good of the whole and of particulars ; to prevent oppression, and to punish it ; to promote virtue, and reward it ; to enforce the observance of the laws by his example, as well as by his judgments ; and to merit the affections and fidelity of the people by his faithful care of them. His first care was, to revive the ancient discipline in the army ; for the soldiery had abandoned themselves to all manner of licentiousness, and committed innumerable disorders, not only in the colonies and municipal towns, Revives the ancient discipline.
- ^b but in Rome itself. He therefore discharged great numbers of them, especially of such as had served under Vitellius, and had been long inured to rapine and licentiousness ; in the others he punished the least transgressions with the utmost severity, not sparing even those to whose valour he owed the empire, nor omitting any opportunity of reforming the ancient discipline ; of which Suetonius gives us the following instance : A young nobleman, to whom he had given a considerable command, waiting upon him to return him thanks, and smelling fragrantly of rich oils and perfumes, the emperor, with a voice expressing his indignation, told him, that he had rather he had smelt of garlick, and took away the commission, which he had given him a few days before. He was no less severe with the marines, who
- ^c were appointed to carry letters and dispatches from Puteoli and Ostia to Rome ; for upon their petitioning him to have some allowance besides their usual pay for shoes, instead of complying with their request, he ordered, that for the future they should discharge their duty bare-foot, and caused this ordinance to be immediately put in execution ^y. He scarce ever failed to assist at the debates and deliberations of the senate, without assuming to himself any authority above the other senators, whom he frequently exhorted to speak their sentiments with freedom, telling them, that he had called them not blindly to approve what was his will and pleasure, but to receive their counsel, to trust and to follow it. Having taken upon him, soon after his arrival at Rome, the office of censor, he degraded such of the senators and knights His conduct towards the senate.
- ^d as he found unworthy of their dignities ; and supplied their places with such persons, either from the colonies or provinces, as were recommended to him by men of known integrity. By this means he increased the number of senators to a thousand, which by infinite massacres had been exhausted and reduced to two hundred ^z. He likewise strictly examined into all the courts of judicature, and there reformed innumerable abuses and grievances, appointed new judges, and caused the laws to be reduced and digested into a far less compass. He frequently administered justice himself in the forum, with great impartiality and universal applause. As Rome had lost much of its splendour by the late conflagration, and many houses lay still in ruins, he ordered the proprietors of the ground to rebuild them in a limited time, Imbellishes the city.
- ^e allowing any one to take possession of the ground, if the edifices were not raised within that term to a certain height. The capitol he had ordered to be rebuilt before he left Alexandria, and appointed Lucius Vestinus, a Roman knight, to direct and oversee the work. By him were assembled the soothsayers, who declared, that the remains of the former temple should be removed into the marshes ; that upon the same foundations the new one should be raised ; and that to the temple nothing new, except height, should be added. With this variation alone, the new temple was raised in a short time ; and this alone was judged wanting to the magnificence of the former. As the late fire had destroyed many public records, he restored three thousand tables of brass, which had been burnt, having with indefatigable pains
- ^f found out their true copies. In these were recorded all the decrees of the senate, all the ordinances of the people, all treaties, alliances, and privileges granted to any person or city, and all remarkable occurrences from the foundation of the city. In these and the like works, he expended vast sums. He was so far from seeking the destruction of any man, that he could not behold, without many sighs and tears, even the greatest criminals led to execution. To all he was courteous and affable, allowing persons of every rank to accost him with freedom, the gates of his palace being kept constantly open. He was so far from concealing the meanness of his former condition, that he frequently discoursed of it himself, and used to deride those

those who, to flatter him, undertook to derive his pedigree from the founders of Reate and the companions of Hercules. He despised titles, and with much ado was prevailed upon to accept that of the father of his country; a title to which no one had ever a better claim. The king of Parthia having wrote to him thus; Arsaces, king of kings, to Flavius Vespasianus; he, without finding fault with the title, or resenting it as an affront, directed his answer thus; Flavius Vespasianus to Arsaces, king of kings; shewing thereby in what contempt he had such titles. He was so far from taking delight in public honours, that when he triumphed with his son Titus over the Jews, being quite tired with the length of that ceremony, he was heard to say, that he deservedly suffered for having at his age desired a triumph, as if such an honour had ever been due to his ancestors, or hoped for by himself. He bore with incredible patience the many lampoons, that were dispersed all over the town, reflecting upon his avarice; and the invectives of the philosophers, whom he had banished the city. One of these, by profession a Cynic, by name Demetrius, meeting him one day out of town, reviled him in a most outrageous manner; but the good emperor, instead of chastising him for his insolent behaviour, contented himself with telling him, that he was a Cynic indeed! He gave no ear to whisperers, nor ever put any one to death, whose crimes were not notorious and plainly proved. His friends having one day admonished him to beware of Metius Pomponianus, who was born, they said, under a constellation that promised him the empire, he immediately named him consul, adding pleasantly, When he is invested with the sovereignty, he will, I hope, remember this good turn and requite it. Tho' several conspiracies were formed against him, yet he could never be prevailed upon to punish the conspirators with death, saying, that they deserved rather pity than punishment, since they knew not what a weight and burden the empire was. He took the daughter of Vitellius, his inveterate enemy, under his protection, married her into a noble family, and allowed her a rich dower. He never sought to revenge the affronts which he had suffered in the reign of Nero, but generously forgave all who had injured or reviled him. Being in that prince's reign forbid the court, and not knowing what to do, he had recourse to Phæbus, the emperor's freed-man, asking him, whither he should go. Phæbus returned him no other answer, but that he might go hang himself, and thrust him out of his room. The freed-man coming to beg his pardon after he was made emperor, Vespasian was provoked no farther than to bid him be gone in the same terms. Tho' Mucianus assumed far greater authority than was suitable to the rank of a private man, and behaved with great haughtiness towards the emperor himself, bragging, that in his own hands he had had the empire, but freely bestowed it upon Vespasian; yet the emperor never rebuked him but in private; and having once complained of him to a common friend, he ended his complaints with these remarkable words; Yet I myself am but a man, and consequently not free from blame^a.

Is generally charged with avarice.

Several instances of it.

THE only fault with which he is charged by the ancients is, his immoderate love of money, which he was not ashamed to procure by means altogether unworthy of an emperor. He not only revived the old impositions and taxes, which had been suppressed by Galba; but loaded the provinces with new tributes, bought commodities, that he might sell them to advantage, and descended to some very low and unusual imposts, laying one even upon urine, which gave occasion to his son Titus to remonstrate to him the meanness of such an imposition; but he presenting to his son the first money that thence accrued to him, asked him, whether the smell offended him? Neither did he scruple the selling of any office, nor pardoning any criminal, however enormous his crimes were, provided he could with a sum of money redeem himself from the deserved punishment. He is said to have preferred to the most profitable employments such of his officers as were noted for their avarice and rapaciousness, and to have made use of them as sponges, by wetting them when they were dry, and squeezing them when they were wet^b. He often strove to disguise his shameful avarice by some humourous joke. Thus certain ambassadors having acquainted him, that by the council of their nation a considerable sum of money was decreed for erecting him a statue in the form of a colossus, Here is the basis, said he, stretching out his hand; lay the money down here, and the statue is reared. One of his chief favourites having one day begged of him the superintendence

- a ence of his household for one, whom he pretended to be his brother, the emperor put him off for the present; and sending afterwards for the person whom he had recommended, he received of him the sum which was to have been paid to the other for his interest, and bestowed on him the employment. When the favourite returned to solicit in behalf of his pretended brother, You must find out another brother, answered the emperor; for the person, whom you recommended, proves in the end to be my brother, and not yours. One day while he was travelling in a litter, the muleteer stopped, under pretence of having his mules shod, but in reality to give an opportunity to one of accosting the emperor and craving some favour. Of this Vespasian was apprised, and therefore having pleasantly asked the muleteer what he had received for shoeing his mules, he obliged him to pay to him half the sum^c. Some writers
- b think, that he was covetous by nature, and tell us, that he was upbraided with avarice by an old herdsman, who earnestly intreating the emperor, upon his accession to the empire, to grant him his liberty without ransom, and being denied it, cried out so as to be heard by the whole multitude, The wolf may change his hair, but not his qualities. But other authors excuse him on account of the urgent necessities of the state, and the emptiness of the exchequer when he first came to the government; for he then publicly declared in the senate, that the republic could not possibly subsist without a supply of a hundred and forty millions of sesterces. This is by the generality of writers thought the most probable opinion, because he always employed his revenue to great and noble purposes, and laid it out with uncommon generosity. His
- c public works and edifices were very expensive; his presents and pensions numerous; his feasts and entertainments frequent and magnificent, &c. He supported a great number of poor senators; allowed five hundred sesterces a year to every decayed consular; restored to their former lustre a great many towns, that had been ruined by fire or earthquakes; repaired the public roads and aqueducts, &c. He was likewise a great encourager of learning, and the first who settled salaries upon the professors of rhetoric both Greek and Latin, to be paid yearly out of the exchequer. He invited to Rome, with great allowances, not only the most celebrated poets, but such artificers and workmen as were famous in any part of the world. Of the latter, one, well skilled
- d in mechanics, having offered to convey certain columns of vast weight into the capitol at a very small charge, the emperor rewarded him for his invention; but would not employ him, saying, We must not debar the common people from earning their livelihood^d. Such was in general the conduct of Vespasian. We shall now proceed to the most remarkable actions of his reign, digested according to the order of time.
- THO' Vespasian had, during his first consulship, restored Rome to her former tranquillity, yet he did not resign the fasces on the first of January; but, chusing for his colleague M. Cocceius Nerva afterwards emperor, continued to discharge that office till the calends of March, when he was succeeded by his son Domitian, as was Nerva by Q. Pedius Castus. This year Titus, having, by the taking of Jerusalem, quite
- e reduced the Jewish nation, returned to Rome, where he was received with all possible demonstrations of joy, and soon after honoured with a triumph, which was decreed by the senate both to him and his father; for Vespasian had begun that war with great success. They both triumphed about the latter end of April, displaying on that occasion all the wealth of the Jewish nation. To Titus was likewise decreed a triumphal arch, describing his noble exploits; which continues to this day almost intire, as a lasting monument of his victories over the Jews. The triumph was no sooner over, than Vespasian commanded the temple of Janus to be shut, a profound peace now reigning in every part of the empire. Soon after the temple of Peace was begun, but not finished, or at least not consecrated, till four years after; that is, till the year
- f 75 of the christian æra, when the rich spoils of the temple of Jerusalem were deposited there. Titus, before his arrival at Rome, had been by his father honoured with the title of emperor, and taken for his colleague in the tribunitial power; so that being, in a manner, his partner in the empire, he discharged all the functions of sovereignty. He even took upon him the command of the prætorian guards, by which means that office became, as Aurelius Victor observes, the most honourable employment in the whole empire. It appears from several ancient inscriptions, that Vespasian this year built some aqueducts, repaired the streets of Rome, and at a vast charge made highways in Spain^e.

THE following year, Cesennius Pætus, whom Vespasian had appointed governor of Syria in the room of Mucianus, having wrote to the emperor, that Antiochus king of Comagene and his son Epiphanes had held private conferences with Vologeses king of the Parthians, and were disposed to revolt from the Romans, the emperor, without examining the charge, which Josephus suspects to have been quite groundless, allowed Pætus to take what measures he thought most proper. Hereupon Pætus, who bore some private grudge to Antiochus, entered his dominions in a hostile manner; and, being joined by Aristobulus king of Chalcis and Sobemus king of Emesus, seized Samosata, the metropolis of Comagene, defeated Epiphanes and Callinicus, the two sons of Antiochus, and obliged the king himself to take shelter in Cilicia, where he possessed some domains. The young princes found a safe asylum at the court of Vologeses, who entertained them in a manner suitable to their rank; but Antiochus was by Pætus's orders seized in Cilicia and loaded with chains; which Vespasian no sooner knew, than he commanded him to be set at liberty. His kingdom, however, was reduced to a Roman province, known by the name of Augusteuphratesiana, or Euphratesiana, because it extended along the Euphrates. Antiochus was allowed to retire to Lacedæmon, whence he removed soon after to Rome, where both he and his two sons, whom Vespasian took under his protection, at the recommendation of the Parthian king, were supported suitable to their rank at the publick charge^f. The same year, the Alani, a people dwelling between the river Tanais and the Palus Mæotis, made a sudden irruption into the territories of the Medes and Armenians. Tiridates king of Armenia narrowly escaped being taken, while he attempted to oppose them; and Pacorus king of the Medes was obliged to abandon his kingdom to the mercy of the barbarians, who carried off an immense booty and a great number of captives; among the rest the wife of Pacorus. Vologeses king of the Parthians, alarmed at this sudden irruption, wrote to Vespasian, begging succours against so formidable an enemy, and desiring one of the emperor's sons to command them. Domitian earnestly solicited his father for that command; but the emperor did not think it adviseable to succour the Parthians, who rivaled the Romans themselves in power; and the barbarians retired of their own accord, without offering to invade the Parthian dominions. However, the refusal of the emperor occasioned some misunderstanding between the two powers; and on this occasion it was, without all doubt, that Vologeses wrote to Vespasian, styling himself king of kings, as we have hinted above; without deigning to give Vespasian even the title of emperor^g.

Comagene reduced to a Roman province.

The Alani invade Media and Armenia.

Helvidius Priscus banished.

THE following year, Domitian being consul, the second time, with Valerius Messalinus, Vespasian reduced Greece, which Nero had declared free, and likewise Lycia, Rhodes, Byzantium, Samos, Thrace, and Cilicia, to Roman provinces, alledging, that they were no longer capable of liberty, since they only made use of it to undo themselves by their intestine dissentions. Pausanias seems to acknowledge the truth of this charge^h. Rhodes, Samos, and the other islands were made one province, called, The province of the islands, or, of the Cyclades, of which the city of Rhodes was the metropolis. Eusebius speaks of a sedition, which, according to him, was raised at Alexandria, in the beginning of this year, by some Jews, who had fled from Jerusalem. Vespasian treated the authors of it with great mildness; but ordered Lupus, governor of Egypt, to demolish the temple, which the Jews had built in the territory of *Heliodopolis*ⁱ. This same year, Vespasian condemned to banishment the celebrated Helvidius Priscus. He was a native of Terracina, and the son of a centurion; but, by his bright and signal parts, soon distinguished himself in Rome. When he was yet very young, he applied himself to the study of philosophy, not, as many did in those days, to disguise indolence under a pompous name, but in order to engage in the public administration with a mind thoroughly fortified against all disasters. Ere he had risen higher than the quæstorship, he was chosen by the famous Thrasea Pætus for a husband to his daughter. From the character of his wife's father he copied nothing so studiously, as his undaunted liberty in speaking his sentiments, never to be shaken by fear, and ever unmoveable in what he judged conducing to the publick welfare. When Thrasea was condemned, he was driven into exile, but recalled by Galba, and honoured by Vespasian in the first year of his reign with the prætorship. As he was a zealous stickler for liberty, he spoke with great freedom in the senate against the arbitrary proceedings of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius; neither did he spare Vespasian, but inveighed against

- a against him with as much bitterness as his father-in-law had ever done against Nero. The emperor, however, patiently bore with him, till he began openly to solemnize the birth-day of Brutus and that of Cassius, and to encourage the people to follow their example, and attempt the recovery of their ancient liberty; then Vespasian caused him to be seized, but soon after dismissed him untouched, contrary to the opinion of all his friends. Helvidius, forgetful of the kindness the emperor had shewn him, pursued his former course; and was thereupon again accused and condemned to banishment. As he could not refrain, even in the place of his exile, from inveighing with great bitterness against the emperor, he was at length by the senate sentenced to death. Vespasian strove to save him, and sent to countermand the executioners; but his orders came too late, Mucianus having detained the messengers, under various pretences, till the sentence was put in executionⁱ. Helvidius, notwithstanding this his unaccountable behaviour, is greatly cried up by Tacitus^k, Pliny the younger^l, and Juvenal^m. As many other philosophers, following the example of Helvidius, strove to stir up the populace to sedition, they were all driven out of *Rome*ⁿ. His strange behaviour.

- THE following year, Vespasian was consul the fifth time, and Titus the third. Nothing memorable happened during their administration, except the census, which was performed by them in quality of censors, the emperor having assumed his son for his colleague in that dignity. This is the last census we find mentioned in history. They both retained the fasces till the calends of April of the following year, when Vespasian resigned them to Domitian, and Titus to Mucianus. This year the emperor consecrated the temple of Peace, and raised a colossus of brass one hundred and ten feet high, which had been designed for Nero; but instead of his head, that of Titus was placed upon it, or, as others will have it, the figure of the sun^p. The two following years, Vespasian being consul the seventh and eighth time, and Titus the fifth and sixth, nothing happened at Rome, or in any part of the empire, which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity. We read indeed in the chronicle of Alexandria, that in the eighth consulship of Vespasian, a woman, by name Alcippe, was delivered at Rome of an elephant; and in the chronicle of Eusebius, that a plague raged in the city with such violence for some time, as to sweep away above twenty thousand persons a day. But neither of that extraordinary birth, nor of so dreadful a plague, any notice is taken by the ancients, not even by Pliny the elder, who flourished under Vespasian and was in great favour with him. The last census.

- THE next year, L. Ceionius Commodus and D. Novius Priscus being consuls, the celebrated Cneius Julius Agricola was sent into Britain to govern that province, in the room of Julius Frontinus. As we shall have frequent occasion to speak of this renowned commander, we shall here briefly recount his course of life and pursuits, before he distinguished himself by his mighty exploits in this island. He was born in the colony of Forojulium, now Frejus, in Narbonne Gaul; and both his grandfathers were procurators to the emperors; a dignity peculiar to the equestrian order. His father, Julius Gracinus, was a senator, famous for his eloquence and philosophy, but put to death by Caligula, for refusing to accuse Marcus Silanus. His mother, Julia Agricola, a woman noted for her modesty, brought him up in his tender years under her eye and with great care. In his early youth he studied philosophy and law in the city of Marseilles, with more avidity, as he himself used to declare, than became a Roman and a senator, till the discretion of his mother checked his ardour. Reason and age afterwards qualified his heat; so that he contented himself with a limited measure of philosophy. He learnt the first rudiments of war in Britain, under Suetonius Paulinus, one of the greatest commanders of his age, by whom he was distinguished with particular marks of friendship and esteem. He was not one of those young men who turn warfare into riot, but studied to acquaint himself with the province, to be known to the army, to learn of such as had experience, to follow such as were worthy and brave, to seek for no exploits out of ostentation, to refuse none through fear. He would not assume the title and office of tribune, till he thought himself well qualified for that command: neither did he make use of it, as many did in those days, to indulge his pleasures with more liberty, to Julius Agricola sent into Britain.

or to absent himself from duty; but to encourage others, by his example, to bear with patience the toils attending the profession of arms. As Paulinus was engaged in a mighty war with the Britons, of which we have spoken in the reign of Nero, Agricola had an opportunity of improving himself in the knowledge of military affairs under so great a master. Departing from Britain to Rome, to enter there upon the public offices, he was first sent into Asia as quæstor, where he had Salvius Titianus for proconsul. But neither the province, in itself very rich, nor Titianus, though bent upon all acts of rapine, and ready, upon the smallest encouragement, to have purchased a mutual connivance in iniquity, corrupted his probity. He was afterwards created tribune of the people, but passed the year of his tribuneship in repose and inactivity, being well apprised, that under Nero sloth and heaviness served for wisdom. With the like indolence he held the prætorship, exhibiting, however, as was incumbent upon the prætors, public sports, according to the measure of his wealth, and in a manner no-ways favouring of prodigality, but still deserving popular applause. Being afterwards appointed by Galba to survey the gifts and oblations belonging to the temples, by a diligent search he procured full restitution of all, save what had been sacrilegiously taken away by Nero. The year following, his mother was killed by the soldiers of Otho, upon her estate at Intemelium, now Vintimiglia; and the estate itself plundered, with great part of her treasure, which had proved the cause of the murder. As Agricola hastened from Rome, to pay her the last duty and solemnize her funeral, he had tidings upon the road, that Vespasian had assumed the title of emperor, and instantly espoused his party. Upon his return from Intemelium, he was employed by Mucianus to levy forces; and soon after, as he discharged that trust with great uprightness and fidelity, preferred to the command of the twentieth legion, then in Britain, their own commander being found void of authority to controul them and keep them to their duty. Vettius Bolanus was at that time governor of Britain; but as he ruled with great gentleness, Agricola had no opportunity of distinguishing himself by any military exploits. Bolanus was succeeded by Petilius Cerealis, who at his first entrance attacked the Brigantes, reckoned the most powerful people of the whole island; and, after many encounters, some of which proved very bloody, held most part of their country as his conquest, or continued to ravage it by war. Under him Agricola had room to display his valour and abilities. For trial of his skill and courage, Cerealis often committed to his conduct part of the army; and sometimes, according to the measure of his success, set him at the head of forces still larger, sharing with him both the dangers and the glory. But Agricola was so far from vaunting his own exploits, that, on the contrary, he ascribed to his general, as to the author of all, his success and good fortune.

UPON his return from Britain, where he had commanded a legion, he was by Vespasian raised to the rank of a patrician, and afterwards appointed governor of Aquitain; which trust he discharged with great uprightness and general satisfaction. He was after three years recalled, and honoured with the consulship; which office he discharged during the two last months of the preceding year. While he was consul, it was generally said, that for his province Britain would be assigned him, from no words that had dropped from him about it, but because he was deemed equal to that office: and common fame, as Tacitus well observes, does not always err, but often directs the public choice. Before he ended his consulship, he contracted his daughter to Tacitus the historian, who was yet very young, and gave her to him in marriage as soon as he had resigned the fasces. He was then forthwith promoted to the government of Britain, and at the same time honoured with the pontifical dignity. He succeeded Julius Frontinus, who had not only maintained the conquests made by Petilius Cerealis, his predecessor, but had himself fought with great success, having intirely reduced the warlike nation of the Silures, though, besides the bravery of the enemy, he had been likewise obliged to struggle with the difficulties of places and situation. Agricola arrived in Britain about the middle of summer, when the Roman soldiers, supposing the service of the season to be concluded, were bent upon inaction and repose, as were the enemy upon an opportunity to harass the Romans. The Ordovices, that is, the inhabitants of North-Wales, had, not long before his arrival, cut in pieces a band of horse stationed upon their confines,

^a and by so notable an essay roused to arms the whole province. The summer was already near over; the Roman troops were severed, and lay dispersed over the province; and the soldiers had assured themselves of rest for the remaining part of the year. But, notwithstanding these discouragements, and the remonstrances of some, who judged it better only to guard the places that were threatened, Agricola resolved to march against the enemy without delay. Having therefore drawn together the flower of the legions and a small body of auxiliaries, he led them against the Ordovices. But, as the enemy kept themselves upon the ridges of the mountains, and dared not descend into equal ground, Agricola, in order to inspire his men with equal courage, by sharing with them equal danger, marched in person at the head of his army, and led them to the encounter upon the ascent. The soldiers, animated by the example of their general, attacked the enemy with great resolution, put them to flight, and made such a dreadful havock of them, that almost the whole nation was cut off. Animated with this success, in order to maintain the fame he acquired by this action, and to strike the enemy at once with general terror, he resolved to reduce the island of Anglesey, which had been formerly conquered by Paulinus, but lost again by the general revolt of Britain. As this counsel was suddenly concerted, and consequently ships were wanting, he detached a chosen body of auxiliaries, such as knew the fords, and, according to the usage of their country, were dextrous at swimming, and able to manage in the water themselves, their horses, and arms. These, unincumbered with baggage, made a descent and onset so sudden, that the enemy were quite struck with consternation, as they apprehended nothing but a fleet and transports, and believed no enterprise difficult and unfurmountable to men, who began the war with such resolution. Thus they sued for peace, and immediately surrendered the island to Agricola, whom they already considered as a renowned commander, since at his first entrance into the province, a time which other governors were wont to spend in shew and parade, he had achieved such feats, and under so much toil and danger, with amazing success. Agricola was so far from being elated with this conquest, that he would not so much as bestow upon it the title of victory, nor by letters acquaint the emperor with the good fortune that had attended his arms, in the recovery of an island which had been formerly subject to Rome. But, by thus suppressing the fame of his actions, he acquired a far greater reputation, than if he had studied to divulge them, every one considering how vast must his views be, since he thus smothered in silence such great exploits already performed. As he was well acquainted with the temper of the people in his province, and had also learnt from the conduct of others, how little arms avail to settle a province, if victory is followed by grievances and oppressions, he resolved to cut off all the causes of war. Beginning therefore with himself and those about him, he regulated his own household; a task which to many proves no less difficult than that of governing a province. By none of his domestics was transacted any thing concerning the public. In preferring the soldiers to a higher rank, he was swayed by no personal interest or partiality, nor by the recommendations of centurions, but by his own opinion and knowledge. He would know all that passed; but would not punish all that was amiss. He readily pardoned small faults; but such as were great, he punished with proportionable severity. In conferring offices and employments, he rather chose men who would not transgress, than such as he must afterwards condemn for transgressing. Tho' the tribute had been augmented, yet he softened it by a just and equal distribution of all public burdens, and utterly abolished whatever exactions had been devised for the gain of particulars, and were therefore borne with more regret than the tribute itself. For the publicans used, under colour of securing the tribute, to seize all the corn of the inhabitants, lock up their barns, and oblige them to purchase their own grain at a high price, and afterwards sell it back again to them at a low rate: besides, the unhappy people were enjoined to take long journies; and carry grain cross the several countries to places extremely distant; insomuch, that several communities, instead of supplying the winter-quarters, which lay adjoining, were obliged to furnish such as were remote, unless they redeemed themselves from that trouble with considerable sums. All these grievances were utterly suppressed by Agricola in his first year; by which means the Britons began to be reconciled to the Roman government, and to live in a state of peace; a state which, through the neglect and connivance of former governors, had been till then no less dreaded than

THE following year, Vespasian being consul the ninth time, and Titus the seventh, Julius Sabinus, who, as we have related above, had stirred up the Gauls, and caused himself to be proclaimed Cæsar, was at length discovered, seized, and put to death. After his defeat, he had fled to his country-dwelling, and set it on fire, in order to raise a report, that he had perished: and truly he was there believed to have suffered a voluntary death; but, in the mean time, lay concealed with his treasures (for he was immensely rich) in a cave which he had caused to be dug in a solitary place, and which was known only to two of his freed-men, upon whose fidelity he could depend. He might have easily withdrawn into Germany; but could not prevail upon himself to abandon his wife, whom he tenderly loved. She is called by Dion Cassius, Peponilla; by Tacitus, Eppenia; and by Plutarch, Empona; which name, according to that writer, in the ancient language of the Gauls, signified a heroine. Sabinus, that no one might doubt of his death, did not for some time even deceive his wife, who solemnized his exequies with great pomp, bewailed him with many tears, and at least, no longer able to bear the loss of a husband whom she so tenderly loved, resolved not to outlive him, and began to abstain from all food. Hereupon Sabinus, by means of Martialis, one of his freed-men, informed her, that he was still alive, and acquainted her with the place where he lay concealed, warning her at the same time to suppress her joy, lest the secret might be thence betrayed. Empona, tho' in the utmost transports of joy, continued to bewail him as dead; but, in the mean time, passed great part of the night with him, and sometimes whole weeks, pretending business in the country. She had even two children by him, who were born and brought up in the cave, Empona concealing the whole with exemplary fidelity and wonderful address; nay, she found means even to convey him to Rome, upon what motive we know not, and from thence back to his cave, so well disguised, that he was by no one known. But, after he had passed nine years in this condition, he was at length discovered by some persons, who narrowly watched his wife, upon her frequently absenting herself from her own house, and followed her to the cave, without being discovered. Sabinus was immediately seized and sent to Rome, loaded with chains, together with his wife, who throwing herself at the emperor's feet, and presenting to him her two tender children, strove with her tears and entreaties to move him to compassion. Vespasian could not forbear weeping at so moving an object; but nevertheless condemned both her and her husband, and caused them to be soon after executed. The two children were saved, and with great care brought up at the public expence. One of them died some time after in Egypt; and Plutarch tells us, that he saw the other, named Sabinus, at Delphos, while he was writing his book of love, in which he has inserted this adventure^k. That writer tells us, that nothing more tragical, nothing more displeasing to the public, happened during the whole reign of Vespasian, than the death of Sabinus and his wife; nay, to this his unseasonable severity, he ascribes all the misfortunes which afterwards befel him and his family. What diverted the emperor from exerting his usual clemency and good-nature, when he might have done it with general applause and universal satisfaction, we are no-where told.

He is discovered.

And put to death, with his wife.

NOT long after the execution of Sabinus, Alienus Cæcina, of whom we often spoke in the reign of Vitellius, and Epirus Marcellus, an abandoned accuser in the reign of Nero, entered into a conspiracy against the emperor, and drew into it great numbers of the prætorian guards. But, before the conspiracy was ripe for execution, one of the conspirators betrayed the whole to Titus, and even delivered to him a copy of the speech, which Cæcina was to pronounce to the soldiers after the assassination, written with his own hand. This was sufficient evidence; and therefore Titus, the night after this discovery, having invited Cæcina to sup with him, caused him, without any farther inquiry or trial, to be murdered in the banquetting-room. As for Marcellus, he was tried and condemned by the senate; but prevented the execution of the sentence, by cutting his throat with a razor^l. Before Vespasian resigned the consulship, he was seized with a pain in his bowels, which obliged him to repair from Campania, where he then was, to Rome; and from thence to Cutylæ,

- ^a Cutylæ, his paternal estate in the neighbourhood of Reate, which he usually visited every summer, in order to drink certain waters, in great request on account of their extreme coolness. Here he was seized first with a fever, and afterwards with a flux, occasioned by the immoderate use of the cold waters, which brought him to such weakness, that all about him began to despair of his recovery. However, he still attended the dispatch of business, received ambassadors, and gave audience to his ministers. Once, as he found himself ready to faint away. If I am not mistaken, he cried out, I am going to be a god, ridiculing the custom of the Romans, who placed their emperors, after their death, in the number of their gods, and honoured them with divine worship. Upon the approach of death, he cried out again with his usual bravery and resolution, An emperor ought to die standing: but, while he endeavoured to rise, he expired in the hands of those who sustained him. His death happened on the twenty-fourth of June, in the seventy-eighth year of the Christian æra, after he had lived sixty-nine years, seven months, and seven days, and reigned ten years wanting six days, from the time he was proclaimed emperor in the city of Alexandria. His death was universally lamented; and his memory gratefully preserved, by such as were true friends to their country. In war, he was next to Julius Cæsar, and to Augustus in peace; and seemed to have been by providence raised on purpose to preserve so vast an empire from utter destruction. Greatness and majesty, says Pliny, worked no alteration in him, save that of making his power of doing good answerable to his will. He was the second Roman emperor, if not the first, who died a natural death; and the first who was succeeded by his son. And here we cannot help observing the rashness of some blind zealots, in ascribing to divine vengeance the fate of such as slew Cæsar the dictator. Not one of the assassins, they cry, died a natural death. But neither did Cæsar, who destroyed the state, nor any of his successors, except Augustus, of whom it is also doubted, to the present emperor. Tiberius was smothered by Macro his favourite, Caligula was slain by the officers of his guards, Claudius was poisoned by his wife Agrippina, Nero stabbed himself, Galba was murdered by the soldiers, Otho fell by his own hand, and Vitellius was executed like a common malefactor. Augustus was thought to have been poisoned by his wife Livia ^w. Such was the end of these usurpers; and may the like doom overtake all who tread in their footsteps! Vespasian is said to have been so confident, that the empire was by the laws of fate destined to him and his posterity, that he affirmed in the senate, he should, in spite of all plots and conspiracies, retain the sovereignty to his death, and be succeeded in it by his two sons. His obsequies were performed with extraordinary pomp by Titus. The Romans were at this time so preposterously fond of mimics and farces, that they were exhibited even at the funerals of persons of quality, when the pantomimes used to personate the deceased, counterfeit their speech, and imitate their actions. At the obsequies of Vespasian, a celebrated pantomime, by name Favor, personating the deceased emperor, demanded aloud, what the whole expence of the ceremony amounted to; and being told, to one hundred thousand sesterces, Give me the money, said he, stretching out his hand and counterfeiting the emperor's speech, and throw my carcase, if you please, into the Tyber ^x. Vespasian founded various colonies in different parts of the empire, viz. one at Emmaus, about sixty furlongs from Jerusalem, to which place he gave the name of Nicopolis, or the city of victory; one at Cæsarea, which was from him called Flaviana, with the addition of Prima, as being the first in dignity of all the cities in Palestine. Develte, or as some call it Deülte, in Thrace, Sinope in Pontus, and Flaviobriga in Spain, now Bilboa, are by some writers reckoned among the colonies founded by Vespasian ^y. Neapolis in Samaria, called formerly Sychem; Samofata, the capital of Comagene, Tripolis in Phœnicia, Chalcis and Philadelphia in Syria, Cyrene in Libya, Critia in Bithynia, and Eumeneæ in Phrygia, bore each the name of Flaviana; whence some writers conclude Roman colonies to have been settled in all these cities, either by Vespasian himself, or one of his children ^z. Several writers flourished in Vespasian's time, but of them we shall speak in our notes (D).

studies &c before his accession to the empire.

Vespasian was succeeded in the empire by his eldest son Titus, who was born the thirtieth of December, about the time of the death of Caligula, that is, in the year 40. of the Christian æra; so that he was now thirty-nine years of age. He was brought up with Britannicus in the court of Nero, and is said to have tasted the poison which was given to the young prince at the emperor's table. We are told, that an astrologer being consulted by Narcissus, the celebrated freed-man of Claudius, about the lot of Britannicus, returned answer, that by the laws of fate the empire was not destined to him, but to Titus, who happened to stand by him. He lived in great friendship with Britannicus; whence, soon after his accession to the empire, he erected two statues to his memory, one of gold in the palace, and another of ivory, which was by his orders publicly carried among other statues at the Circensian games. Titus, from his tender years, attended with great application the study of rhetoric and poetry, and made great progress in both, being commended by the ancients as an excellent poet, and an eloquent speaker upon any subject whatever, and without premeditation. He served first in quality of tribune in Germany, and afterwards in Britain; and in both provinces gained no less reputation by his modest and engaging behaviour, than by his courage. Upon his return from Britain, he betook himself to the bar, and pleaded some causes of great importance with uncommon applause. While he was yet very young, he married Arpicidia Tertulla, whose father was only a Roman knight, but had been captain of the prætorian guards. Upon her death, he married Martia Furnilla, descended of an illustrious family, but divorced her after he had one daughter by her, named Julia Sabina. After his quæstorship, which he discharged with great applause, he was advanced to the command of a legion, and attended his father into Judæa in quality lius, and was without all doubt one of the best commanders of his age. He left behind him an account of an expedition; which he undertook beyond mount Atlas, in the year 41. of the Christian æra, and the last of Caligula's reign, against the Moors, who took up arms to revenge the death of Ptolemy their prince, murdered by Caligula, as we have related in the reign of that prince. This account has not reached our times; but is quoted by Pliny (9). He outlived Otho, whose cause he had espoused; but from Pliny it appears, he was dead in the year 77. that is, in the eighth year of Vespasian's reign (10). Some writers, through a strange mistake, have confounded Suetonius Paulinus with Suetonius Lenis, the father of Suetonius the historian, who served only as a military tribune in the army of Otho, which Suetonius Paulinus commanded in quality of general (11). Licinius Mucianus, who is often quoted by Pliny in what relates to the history and geography of the eastern countries (12). In the year 75. the seventh of Vespasian's reign, he was busy in collecting the discourses and letters of the ancient Romans, and had already published eleven volumes of speeches, and three of letters (13). He is supposed to have died in the eighth year of Vespasian's reign. Pliny tells us, that he always carried about with him a living fly, which he superstitiously looked upon as a preservative of the fight (14). Julius Secundus, who is one of the persons introduced in the dialogue of orators, commonly ascribed to Tacitus, wrote the life of one Julius Asiaticus, and promised the lives of other illustrious persons. He likewise published some speeches or orations highly commended by Quintilian (15). In the same dialogue, Vipsanius Messala acts the chief part. He was tribune of the seventh legion, sprung from an illustrious family, and the only one, as Tacitus informs us, who engaged in the civil war between Vespasian and Vitellius upon worthy designs. He pleaded with great eloquence in the senate, tho' not yet arrived at the age of a senator, in behalf of his brother Aquilius Regulus, charged as the accuser and destroyer of many illustrious citizens in the reign of Nero (16). He wrote, as appears from Tacitus (17), an account of the war between Vitellius and Vespasian; and is supposed to have published some other histories (18). Modycratius, the Pythagoric, a native of Cadiz, lived about this time, and published several philosophical tracts (19). St. Jerom commends him on account of his eloquence (22); and Origen, if Porphyrius is to be credited (21), perused with attention his writings, and improved by them. Curatius Maternus, a famous civilian and poet, flourished under Vespasian, and wrote several tragedies; one of which, intitled Cato, made a great noise, and would have given great offence to any of the emperors who preceded Vespasian. He is introduced in the dialogue of orators, speaking in defence of poetry (22). Salvius Bassus wrote several poems in the reign of Vespasian, which were highly esteemed by Quintilian, and Vespasian himself, who countenanced and with great generosity rewarded the poet (23). Cluvius wrote the history of Nero's reign, and of the civil wars preceding that of Vespasian (24), and is frequently quoted by Tacitus. Most writers take him to be the same person with Marcus Cluvius Rufus, who governed Spain in the reigns of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius. Of him Tacitus observes, that he was in great favour with Nero, and acquired mighty wealth, without injuring any man either in his life or fortune (25). He was, as the same writer observes, an eloquent man, and well qualified for affairs in time of peace, but void of experience in war (26). None of the writings of these authors have reached our times, except some sentences quoted by the ancient grammarians.

a lity of his lieutenant. In that war, he distinguished himself, as appears from Josephus, in a very eminent manner; reduced, while he served under his father, some strong holds; and gained the reputation both of a brave and prudent leader. Being sent by Vespasian to congratulate Galba upon his accession to the empire, and to receive his directions concerning the prosecution of the war against the Jews, it was rumoured abroad by the populace at Rome, that Galba had sent for him in order to adopt him. Ground for this report was administered, as Tacitus observes, by the condition of the emperor, ancient and childless, and the great character of Titus, who was judged equal to any degree of fortune, however elevated. But having received at Corinth certain advice of the murder of Galba, he returned to his father,

b and reconciled to him Mucianus governor of Syria; for between Vespasian and him, as the one ruled over Judæa and the other over Syria, great animosities reigned, occasioned by their governing two neighbouring provinces^a. He was left by his father in Judæa to prosecute the war against the Jews. Upon their parting, Titus gave a signal instance of his good-nature and affection towards his brother Domitian. For the emperor, being informed that Domitian had already abandoned himself to all manner of debauchery, and assumed more authority than was suitable to a son only, was highly incensed against him. Titus therefore, upon the departure of his father for Italy, pleaded with great affection and earnestness in favour of his brother, warning the emperor to beware of being rashly incensed by intelligence from such as brought criminal representations. To your own son, said he, it is but just you should bear a spirit of gentleness, free from all prejudice. Not from fleets, not from legions, are such powerful bulwarks found for the support of the imperial dignity, as from a numerous issue in the imperial house. The number of our friends is diminished with time; they often desert us to follow fortune; or because we cannot gratify their desires. But from our own blood we may always promise ourselves ready assistance, and unshaken fidelity. In our good fortune many will partake with us, but our nearest in kindred alone will bear us company in our adversities. Even between brothers, added he, concord and unanimity will not prove lasting, if their common parent sets them not first an example. Vespasian, who by this reasoning

c was not so much reconciled to Domitian, as charmed with the tender affection of Titus, desired him to be of good cheer, and to study how to aggrandize the commonwealth by war and the exercise of arms; adding, that it should be his task to insure the public peace, and that of his family^b. Of the conduct and warlike achievements of Titus, during the war which he carried on with stupendous success against the Jews, we have spoken at length in our history of that nation. After the reduction of Jerusalem, instead of returning to Rome, he went to Alexandria, where he assisted at the consecration of the ox Apis, wearing a diadem; which, together with his putting off from time to time his journey for Italy, and his giving a private audience at Zeugma to the ambassadors of the Parthian king, occasioned a report, as if he designed to revolt from his father, and make himself emperor of the east. This rumour obliged him to hasten his departure for Rome, where he was received with loud shouts of joy, and a few days after honoured with one of the most magnificent triumphs the city had ever beheld. He was dignified by the senate with the title of Cæsar, and by his father taken, in a manner, for his colleague in the empire; for with him he exercised the censorship, the tribunitial power, seven consulships, and managed all the affairs of the empire, writing even letters, and drawing up all edicts in his father's name. Tacitus tells us, that he was more strict and reserved in his own reign, than in that of his father; and Suetonius charges him with pride, cruelty, and even avarice. When any one, says the latter writer, gave him, by his unguarded conduct, the least umbrage, he hired people to demand his doom in the theatre, and in the camp of the prætorian guards, and then condemned him without further proof or trial. In administering justice, he was easily

d biaised by presents, sold several employments of great trust unknown to his father, and indulged himself in festivity and pleasures, spending great part of the night in riotous banquets, with the most dissolute of the Roman youth, with young eunuchs, and a numerous herd of catamites and prostitutes. His passion for Berenice, the daughter of Agrippa the great and sister of Agrippa II. king of Ituræa, was highly highly censured by the Roman people, who looked upon him as a second Nero; ^a so that scarce ever any man arrived at the empire with a more sullied reputation, or more abhorred by the populace^c. But, upon his accession to the empire, all these accusations turned to his praise and advantage, no prince having ever governed with greater moderation, humanity, and good-nature. Soon after his father's death, he dismissed the beautiful queen Berenice, who had followed him to Rome with her father Agrippa, the last king of Judæa; and obliged her not only to withdraw from the city, but from Italy, tho' he was passionately fond of her; and this merely out of complaisance to the senate and people, who were displeased to see their emperor thus captivated with the charms of a foreign woman^d. Tho' his brother Domitian pretended to an equal share in the government, and raised great disturbances in the city, by giving out and arrogantly maintaining, that his father had left him partner in the empire, but that the will had been falsified; yet he could not prevail upon himself either to punish or banish him, but on the contrary treated him as his colleague in the empire, conjuring him often in private, with tears in his eyes, not to hate a brother, who bore him a sincere and tender affection, and was willing to allow him a due share in the administration^e. Pliny observes, that Julius Bassus dreaded Titus on account of his intimacy with Domitian; but that he received no injury at the hands of the former, whereas he was banished by the latter. The emperors, ever since the reign of Tiberius, had paid no regard to the ordinances of their predecessors granting to cities, or particular persons, privileges, immunities ^c or exemptions, till such grants were confirmed by themselves; which they did with great reserve, causing the charters to be first carefully examined, as if they had been first granted by themselves. But Titus, without suffering any one to apply to him, confirmed them all by one general edict; and his example was followed by most of his successors. He could not prevail upon himself to dismiss any who applied to him dissatisfied, or without some hopes of success; whereupon, being admonished by some of his friends, that he promised more than he could well perform, he replied, that no man should depart dissatisfied from the presence of a prince. It is well known, that being told one night he had bestowed no favour that day, he expressed his dissatisfaction and regret, with that memorable saying, My friends, I have lost a day. He treated the people with extraordinary kindness and complaisance: having designed to exhibit a shew of gladiators, he signified by a proclamation, that it should be exhibited, not according to his own taste and pleasure, but that of the people; and he was so far from refusing what they desired, that he earnestly solicited them to declare what they liked best, complying with their taste, tho' disagreeing with his own. He allowed free access to him, even while he was bathing, and received all with great affability and condescension, yet so as to maintain the dignity of his rank and the majesty of an emperor. No man's property he ever coveted; nay, he often refused the usual presents and such contributions as were due to him: and nevertheless, of all his predecessors, none was more generous than he, nor expended larger sums in private bounties, in shews, in buildings, &c. After he dedicated the famous amphitheatre, and finished with incredible expedition certain baths close to it, he exhibited, at an immense charge, a shew of gladiators, a naval battle in the old naumachia, and brought into the arena five thousand wild beasts of all kinds. When he entered upon the office of chief pontiff, he solemnly declared, he took upon him that dignity in order to preserve his hands undefiled, and pure from the shedding of blood; and truly from that time he never was accessory to any man's death, though he might have exerted his revenge with great justice: but, however provoked, he spared the criminals, declaring, that he had rather die himself, than put another to death. Of this his great clemency he gave the following instance: two patricians having conspired against him, were discovered, convicted, and sentenced to death by the senate. But the good-natured emperor freely forgave them, admonishing them only in private, that in vain they aspired to the empire, which was given by destiny, exhorting them to be satisfied with the rank in which by providence they had been placed, and offering them any thing else which it was in his power to grant. At the same time he dispatched a messenger to the mother of one of them, who was then at a great distance, and under great concern about the fate of her son, to assure her, that her son

- a son was not only alive, but out of danger. He invited them the same night to his table, and having the next day placed them by him at a shew of gladiators, when the weapons of the combatants were, according to custom, presented to him, he desired them to survey them^e. The law of majesty he utterly abrogated, and would not suffer any person to be prosecuted for speaking disrespectfully of himself, or the other emperors his predecessors, saying, If they blacken my character undeservedly, they ought rather to be pitied than punished; if deservedly, it would be a crying piece of injustice to punish them for speaking truth. As for my predecessors, if they are truly gods, they are in a condition to revenge, when they think fit, the injuries done them, and stand in no need of my assistance and power^f. The accusers were the only persons against whom he proceeded with unrelenting severity, causing them to be publicly whipt, to be exposed to public view, and to the insults of the populace in the forum, the amphitheatre, and the circus, and then to be either sold for slaves, or banished to desert islands^g. In short he was a prince, according to Suetonius, in whom all virtues centred, without the alloy of one single vice.

- TOWARDS the end of the year 79. of the christian æra, and first of Titus's reign, Campania was alarmed with a most dreadful and almost incredible eruption of mount Vesuvius, which laid waste the country to a great distance, and utterly consumed a great many cities with their inhabitants, and among the rest Pompeii and Herculanum. The former had suffered much by an earthquake in the year 63. of the christian æra; but had been rebuilt and embellished with several stately edifices, especially a theatre, in which the people were assembled, and intent upon the public shews, when the city was swallowed up by an earthquake, which attended the eruption of the flames from the mountain. The cities of Puteoli and Cumæ were greatly damaged, what by the earthquake, what by the burning ashes; which, if the ancients are to be credited, reached Africa, Egypt, and Syria, and at Rome turned suddenly, to the great terror of the inhabitants, day into night. Pliny the elder, who was then at Misenum, where he commanded the fleet riding there, having discovered this cloud on the first of November, and not yet knowing whence it issued, went immediately on board one of the galleys, and sailed towards mount Vesuvius. He was soon met by great numbers of persons, who, in small boats, were flying from the dreadful conflagration; but nevertheless, prompted by his curiosity, he pursued his course, tho' stones, ashes, and earth began already to shower down upon his vessel; nay, we are told, that, to his great surprize, he found a new cape formed by the earth and huge stones, thrown out by the mountain. However, he proceeded with great intrepidity, and reaching Stabiae between Pompeii and Surrentum, tho' the inhabitants had all abandoned the place, passed the night there, the better to observe, during the darkness, the mountain, which seemed all on a blaze. The same night a dreadful earthquake happened at Stabiae, and such a huge quantity of stones fell, that Pliny resolved to put to sea, but was prevented by contrary winds. At length the fire approaching, he attempted to save himself by flight; but, tho' supported by two of his domestics, he soon fell, suffocated, as is supposed, by the thickness of the air and the insupportable stench of sulphur. His body was found three days after, and interred by his nephew Pliny the younger, who was then at Misenum, and narrowly escaped the same fate, as he himself relates at length in his epistles^h. On this occasion the poet Cæsius Bassus was consumed, with his house, by the flames; and likewise Agrippa, the son of Claudius Felix, formerly governor of Judea, and of Drusilla, daughter to Agrippa, the last king of the *Jews*ⁱ. This is the first eruption of mount Vesuvius we find mentioned in history.

The death of Pliny the elder

- THE same year, Titus assumed the title of emperor with the usual solemnity, on account of the advantages which the brave Agricola had gained in Britain, during his second campaign in that island; for having applied himself in the winter with great care to the redressing of the grievances, of which the Britons but too justly complained, in the beginning of the summer he assembled his army, and marched farther into the country, commending such of his men as in marching observed duty and rank, and checking such as were loose and straggling. He himself always chose the ground for incamping; the friths and woods he himself always first examined; and to the enemy, in the mean time, allowed not a moment's quiet, but was ever harassing them with sudden incursions. Then having sufficiently alarmed and terrified them, he used to spare spare them, in order to tempt and allure them with the sweets of peace. By this conduct several communities, which till that day had held out upon equal terms, and maintained themselves in a state of independency, came to lay down their arms, gave hostages, and suffered fortresses to be erected in their territories; which was done with so much care and skill, that no part of Britain conquered by the Romans till that time escaped being annoyed by them^k. This is the account which Tacitus gives us of what Agricola performed in the second summer's expedition; but as he speaks in general, without naming any particular place, it is no easy matter to determine through what part of Britain Agricola marched his army, and how far into the country; what friths he passed over; what communities submitted and gave hostages, and in what places the fortresses were erected which Tacitus mentions. However, a modern writer^l, whom our readers may consult, endeavours by many learned conjectures to prove, that Agricola in his second campaign marched directly from Anglesey into Scotland, and penetrated as far as the frith of Edinburgh; that he bent his rout through the county of Annandale and the adjacent counties, where remains of ancient Roman camps are still to be seen, some of which the learned antiquarian concludes, from Tacitus's account of them, to have been made by Agricola; that the friths he passed were those of Dee, Ribble, Liverpool, and Solloway; and finally, that the communities or cities, which suffered themselves to be begirt, as Tacitus expresses it, with garisons and fortresses, were those on the isthmus between Clyde and Forth. We refer our readers to the above-mentioned writer for a more distinct explanation of these particulars.

THE following year, Titus, now consul the eighth time, with his brother Domitian the seventh, gave many remarkable instances of his humanity and good-nature, in repairing, at his own expence, the losses which the unhappy inhabitants of Campania had suffered by the late eruption of mount Vesuvius. He sent into Campania two consulars with large sums, to be employed in rebuilding the cities which had been overturned, and applied to the relief of the poor sufferers the goods and estates of such, as had perished on this occasion and left no heirs; nay, went in person into Campania, and with his own hand distributed immense sums among those, who seemed most worthy of his compassion^m. While he was in Campania, a dreadful fire broke out in Rome, which lasted three days and as many nights, and reduced to ashes a great many private and public buildings, the library of Augustus, with all the books lodged in it, great part of the capitol, the theatre of Pompey, &c. Titus was no sooner informed of this calamity, than he hastened back to the city, and publicly declared, that the whole loss should fall upon him, and that, at his own charge, he would repair the damage suffered by particulars. He was as good as his word; for tho' many cities and foreign princes, by whom he was no less beloved than by Romans, offered to bear their share in the expence, he could not by any means be prevailed upon to accept their offers, as Nero had done on the like occasion; but chose rather to sell even the ornaments and furniture of his own palace and country-houses, in order to raise money wherewithal to defray the immense charges he was at in rebuilding the temples, the public edifices, and the dwellings of particulars. This conflagration was followed by the most dreadful plague that had ever raged in Rome. Dion Cassius ascribes its rise to the ashes of mount Vesuvius, which had covered the country all round to a great distanceⁿ. Titus left no remedy, human or divine, unattempted, to abate the malignity of the distemper, exerting at the same time all the care and regard of a prince, all the tenderness and compassion of a father, comforting the distressed multitude with his edicts, and relieving them with large and daily bounties^o. Towards the end of this year he finished the famous amphitheatre, which is elegantly described by Martial^p, who likewise mentions the baths that were ended about the same time. The amphitheatre, whereof the stately remains are still to be seen, had been begun by Vespasian, and stood, as we we learn from Dion Cassius, in the midst of the city, tho' its ruins lie in the outskirts of modern Rome. Titus, when he dedicated, according to custom, that noble and stately edifice, exhibited most magnificent shews, which lasted an hundred days, and raised the spirits of the people, ready to sink under the calamities they had suffered^q.

- a In the mean time, Agricola employed his second winter in measures extremely advantageous and salutary; for to the end that the people, wild and dispersed over the country, and thence easily stirred up to war, might, by a taste of pleasures, be reconciled to inactivity and repose, he first privately exhorted, and then publicly assisted, them, to build temples, houses, and places of public resort, reprimanding such as were slow, and commending those who were assiduous and forward in such pursuits. He took care to have the sons of their chiefs instructed in the liberal sciences, finding their genius superior to that of their neighbours the Gauls; and such was his success, that those, who had lately scorned to learn the Roman language, were now become fond of its elegancies: thence they began to assume the Roman apparel, and the use of the gown grew frequent amongst them. Thus by degrees they proceeded to the charms and allurements of vice and effeminacy, to magnificent galleries, sumptuous bagnios, elegant entertainments, &c. all which things were, as Tacitus judiciously observes, by the unexperienced, styled politeness, but at the bottom were nothing but baits of slavery. In the beginning of the summer, Agricola took the field again, and in pursuit of his conquests discovered new people, and continued his devastations through the several nations quite to the mouth of the Taus or Tay. Whence such terror seized the enemy, that they durst not attack him, though his troops were sorely harassed by terrible tempests; so that he had time to secure the places he had conquered by erecting forts. It was observed of Agricola by men of experience, that no commander ever chose his posts with more skill, in regard of their situation and convenience, and that no place of strength founded by him was ever taken by storm, or abandoned as not defensible. From these strong-holds frequent excursions were made; and, as they were supplied with provisions for a year, the Romans passed the winter in them without the least apprehension, every single fort defending itself; so that the enemy, in all their attempts upon them, were baffled, and thence reduced to despair, not being able, as formerly, to repair by their success in the winter, the losses they had sustained in the summer. In these expeditions Agricola never assumed to himself the glory of exploits performed by others; but to each commander, to each centurion, yielded the praise which was due to his achievements. By some he is said to have been too severe and sharp in rebuking; and truly, as he abounded in courtesy towards those who readily complied with their duty, so to the slothful and negligent he appeared stern and severe. But his anger was easily appeased: he harboured no rancour in his heart, thinking it more honourable to give open offence, than to foster secret hatred. The emperor Titus, in his eighth consulship, and consequently this year, repaired some ancient aqueducts, and at a vast expence paved with large stones the road from Rome to Ariminum cross the Apennines, where is still to be seen, not far from the present city of Fossombrone, a huge rock cut through on this occasion.
- c THE next consuls were Sex. Annius Silvanus and T. Annius Verus Pollio. The latter is by some writers supposed to be the grandfather of the emperor M. Aurelius, who was, according to Capitolinus, raised by Vespasian to the rank of a patrician, discharged twice the office of consul, and governed Rome with general satisfaction. This summer, the fourth since Agricola's arrival in Britain, was by him employed in settling and securing the places which he had already conquered, viz. all the countries on this side of the Glota and Bodotria, now the Clyde and Forth, into which rivers the tide from the opposite seas flows so far up the country, that their heads are parted only by a narrow neck of land, not above twenty miles over. This isthmus the Romans secured with forts and garisons, and penned up the inhabitants, as it were, in another island; so that they might have made the two rivers Glota and Bodotria the boundaries of their conquests, and suffered the nations beyond them to live undisturbed. But the ambition of the Romans, which they disguised under the specious name of glory, knew no bounds; hence Agricola pursued his conquests the next and the following summers, as we shall relate according to the order of time. In the east, one Terentius Maximus, passing himself upon the people for Nero, raised great disturbances in that province, and likewise in the countries bordering upon the Euphrates; but, being pursued by the Roman troops, he took refuge in the territories of the Parthians, where he was entertained by king Artabanus, who was then at variance with the Romans; but nevertheless, upon the approach of their army, thought it advisable to abandon the cause of the impostor.

Agricola brings the Britons to love the Roman customs.

He extends his conquests to the Taus or Tay.

He employs the fourth summer in securing the places already conquered.

Domitian acknowledge
emperor.

THIS year, the senate, not out of flattery, but a sense of gratitude, conferred new honours upon Titus. What honours these were, we are no-where told; but the good emperor lived not to enjoy them, being suddenly snatched away, to the inexpressible grief of the Roman people. Suetonius tells us, that he exhibited certain shews, during which he shed many tears in the presence of the multitude, and retired, as soon as they were over, into the country of the Sabines, greatly grieved, because the victim, while he was sacrificing, had broke loose, and a dreadful clap of thunder had been heard, though the day was quite bright, and not a cloud to be seen. The first night he lay out of Rome, he was seized with a burning fever; but nevertheless pursued his journey in a litter, being desirous to end his days in the same house where his father died. We are told, that finding himself on the road greatly indisposed, and not doubting but his end approached, he lifted up his eyes and hands to heaven, complaining, that he was thus to be cut off in the vigor of his age, when, during the whole course of his life, he had been guilty of one action only, which seemed to require repentance. What action that was, he did not declare; but Dion Cassius is of opinion, that it was his freely forgiving his brother Domitian, who had conspired against him, when, by inflicting upon him the deserved punishment, he might have prevented the many evils and calamities, which the excellent emperor was well apprised his brother, when invested with the sovereignty, would bring upon the state^w. Others think, that the criminal conversation he was said to have had with his brother's wife, occurred then to his memory. But Suetonius clears him from this aspersions, upon the solemn protestation of Domitia herself, who, had the charge been true, would have rather gloried in it, as she did in all other crimes, than denied it^x. Titus having with much-ado reached Cutylæ, his paternal estate, expired there soon after his arrival, on the thirteenth of September, in the forty-first year of his age, after having reigned two years, two months, and twenty days. Philostratus tells us, that he was poisoned by his brother Domitian^y. Plutarch ascribes his death to the immoderate use of baths^z, and adds, that one Regulus, who, out of complaisance, used to bathe with him, died of an apoplexy. Suetonius writes, that Domitian, who had ever sought the destruction of his brother, caused the room to be cleared before he was dead, ordered all those who could afford him any assistance to withdraw; but that writer does not charge Domitian with any other kind of violence^a. He far excelled, in the opinion of the ancients, all his predecessors, even Vespasian himself, in every virtue becoming a prince, and was equalled by few of his successors. He knew no purpose of being higher than others, but to do good to all. He was a stranger to all parade and ostentation, chusing to live with his people rather as a father with his children, than a prince with subjects; whence he was deservedly styled, the love and delight of mankind. What pity that such princes, such friends to the world, and protectors of men, should ever die! His death was no sooner known, than a general sadness, an universal consternation, appeared in Rome, which in a short time spread all over the provinces to the most distant bounds of the empire. The senators, without being summoned according to custom, hastened to the palace, and having caused the doors of the chapel, where they met, to be shut for a while, in order to indulge their grief, they opened them again, and in the presence of the multitude heaped more praises upon him after his death, than they had ever done while he lived amongst them; a plain proof of the sincerity of their esteem and affection. Domitian caused him to be ranked among the gods, and was the first who paid him divine honours; but at the same time studied both in private and in public to revile his memory, and lessen the esteem and veneration, which all orders of men had for so worthy and deserving a prince^b. Titus left only one daughter, named Julia Sabina, of whom we shall have occasion to speak in the following reign.

Titus was succeeded by his brother Domitian, who, without the least opposition or contradiction, was immediately acknowledged emperor, notwithstanding the bad opinion which many entertained of him. He was born on the twenty-fourth of October of the year 51. of the christian æra, his father being then consul elect, and appointed to discharge that office the month following. He is styled on several medals, which have reached our times, Titus Flavius Sabinus Domitianus^c. He passed his youth in great poverty, and is said to have been a pathic to Nerva, who succeeded him, for hire, and likewise to one Clodius Pollio, formerly prætor, who kept a note under

- a under Domitian's own hand, by which he bound himself, for a sum of money, to comply, when required, with his lewd and unnatural desires. He did not apply himself from his tender years to the study of history, poetry, eloquence, or any other liberal art or science; hence in all his speeches and harangues he made use of the eloquence of others. He took great delight in archery; in which he was so wonderfully expert, that he was frequently seen to shoot a great number of arrows between the fingers of one of his domestics, whom he placed at a great distance with his hand expanded, telling before between which fingers the arrow would pass, and never missing his aim^d. He was naturally cruel, suspicious, and addicted to revenge; greedy of honours, but impatient of the least toil or labour; affected the reputation of a brave commander, but carefully avoided exposing himself to any danger. Suetonius thinks, that his cruelty was chiefly occasioned by his timorousness, and no ways natural to him. Being at Rome when his father assumed the title of emperor, Vitellius placed guards about him; but he might nevertheless have easily escaped, several messengers having, by various disguises and shifts, reached him from Antonius Primus, and shewed him from what place he might fly, and upon what guard and security depend; nay, even those who guarded him, offered themselves for companions of his flight; but he, apprehending from thence that they designed to betray him, could not by any means be prevailed upon to make his escape^e. Upon the burning of the capitol, whither he had retired with his uncle Sabinus, he concealed himself in the room of one of the ministers of the temple, and the next morning was conveyed by his freed-man beyond the Tiber, in the disguise of one of the priests of Isis. When Primus had made himself master of the city, and all apprehensions of hostility had ceased, he discovered himself to his father's generals, and was by the soldiers thronging about him saluted Cæsar^f; which title was confirmed to him the day following by the senate. From that time to the arrival of his father, he bore the chief sway in Rome; but gave no attention to the cares of government, abandoning himself to all manner of voluptuousness, and making use of his power only to indulge his vicious inclinations with more liberty. He took Domitia Longina, the daughter of the famous Domitius Corbulo, from her husband L. Ælius Lamia, married her some time after, and had a son by her, who was honoured with the title of Cæsar, but died an infant, and was by Domitian ranked among the gods^g. That he had other children, though not mentioned by any historian, appears from the epitaph of one Pierius, still to be seen at Rome, who is styled the emperor's freed-man, and preceptor to his children. The monument was raised by Flavia Nicea, wife to Pierius, with the permission, as is expressed in the inscription, of Hermas, the chief freed-man of Domitia Augusta; for with this title Domitius honoured his wife Domitia Longina in the second year of his reign^h. In the beginning of his father's reign, being jealous of the glory which his brother had acquired in the Jewish war, he resolved to go into Gaul, and take upon him the command of the army which was employed against Civilis. Mucianus did all that lay in his power to divert him, as he was quite unexperienced in military affairs, from such a resolution; but Domitian continuing obstinately bent upon that expedition, Mucianus resolved to attend him, in order to check his ardour, lest, following the impetuosity of his age and instigated by evil counsellors, were he once master of an army, he might disconcert all measures, whether for peace or war. After many procrastinations and delays, they both set out at length; but received, ere they reached the Alps, tidings of the defeat of the Treverians. Hereupon Mucianus communicated, as no more than his own sentiments upon the present occasion, what he had long proposed and concealed, viz. that since, by the favour of the gods, the forces of the enemy were broken, with an ill grace would Domitian proceed, now the war was nigh concluded, and rob another of the whole glory. He added, that were the empire threatened with danger, it behoved the emperor's son to venture his person in battle; but to contend with the Caninefates and Batavians, was beneath him. Let Domitian, continued he, retire to Lions, and from thence display the power and fortune of the empire at hand, neither engaging in small hazards, nor failing to meet such as are greater. Thus Mucianus prevailed upon him to retire to Lions. From thence Domitian was believed to have tried by secret inter-agents to corrupt the fidelity of Cerealis, and to have proposed, whether he would commit to him the army and empire, if he came in person. It remained uncertain what designs he fostered, whether he meditated a war against his father, or intended to arm himself with power and forces against his brother; for Cerealis, by several evasions, eluded his suit, as that of one, who, with a childish fondness, longed for things to which he was not equal. Domitian perceiving, that Cerealis despised his youth, relinquished all functions of government, even the smallest; and, burying himself in solitude, feigned a zeal for learning, especially for poetry, thence to conceal his ambition and other passions, and to escape the jealousy of his brother. Some writers tell us, that on this occasion he applied himself in earnest to the study of poetry, and with wonderful success. Pliny the elder seems to have admired his poetical compositions^k, and likewise Quintilian^l; for both cry them up, not through flattery, says Vossius, as is manifest from the translation of Aratus, which has reached us, and was, without all doubt, done by Domitian^m. Lactantius ascribes to him the learned comment on that translationⁿ; but Vossius is of a different opinion^o. Valerius Flaccus the poet, who flourished under Vespasian, speaks of a poem written by Domitian on the taking of Jerusalem by Titus^p. He likewise wrote a book in prose about the means of preserving the hair, which is quoted by Suetonius^q. But while he pretended to place his whole delight in these studies, and affected a fondness for solitude, the king of the Parthians having demanded succours against the Alani, as we have hinted above, he earnestly solicited his father for the command of those troops; and when he found the emperor no-ways inclined to assist the Parthians, he applied to the eastern princes, soliciting them with promises and presents to desire supplies, and himself to lead them. But Vespasian was too well acquainted with his views and temper, to trust him with the command of an army. Upon the death of his father, he deliberated a long time with himself, whether he should openly revolt, and tempt the fidelity of the prætorian guards, by offering them a larger donative than his brother had promised them; but his courage failing him, he bore no other title, during the reign of Titus, but that of Cæsar, prince of the Roman youth; a title now peculiar to the presumptive heir to the empire^r. His brother no sooner expired, than he hastened to Rome; and repairing to the camp of the prætorian guards, was there by the soldiery, after having promised them the usual donative, saluted emperor. At the same time he assumed, as appears from several ancient inscriptions, all the other titles annexed to the sovereignty, which other emperors had taken successively^s. Some medals, which have reached our times, gives us room to suppose, that, in the first year of his reign, he took upon him the title of Germanicus, probably on account of his journey to Lions during the revolt of the Gauls and Batavians; for we know of no other expedition which could give him, however vain and ambitious, the least colour for assuming that surname or title^t.

Domitian, now invested with the sovereign power, which he had long and impatiently coveted, performed in the first place the obsequies of the deceased emperor, and pronounced himself his funeral oration, with an affected concern, bewailing the loss of a brother so dear to him, and by whom he was so tenderly beloved; but that his grief was only assumed, he made soon appear, by publicly reviling the memory of that excellent prince, by blaming his conduct, and persecuting all those whom he had distinguished with particular marks of his favour; nay, he openly declared in the senate, that to him both his father and brother were indebted for the empire, and that they had only restored to him what was his own gift. However, in the beginning of his reign, he studied to gain the affections of his people, by a conduct worthy of a great prince, disguising his vices, and affecting the opposite virtues. He shewed such an abhorrence to all manner of cruelty, that he once resolved, by an express edict, to forbid the sacrificing of oxen, or any living creature. He was so far from betraying any bias to avarice, that, on the contrary, he gave daily instances of a temper truly princely and munificent, presenting his officers and ministers with large sums, in order to raise them above the temptation of accumulating wealth by methods sordid and mean. He could not be prevailed upon to accept such inheritances as were left him by persons who had children; and because one Ruscus Cæpio, by his will, obliged his heir to pay a certain sum to every new senator, he declared the will void, and would not suffer it to be executed to the prejudice of his own children. All debts above five years standing, which were owing to the exchequer, he freely

- a freely forgave; and after the division of lands amongst the veterans, restored the remainder to the ancient proprietors, tho' he might, after the example of other emperors, have appropriated it to himself. He forbid, on pain of banishment, all the officers of the treasury to sue any one for debts, that were not clear and undoubted^u. He confirmed at once, as Titus had done; all the grants made by his predecessors, increased the pay of the soldiers, and finished, at an immense charge, all the public buildings, which had been begun by Titus. Plutarch tells us, that he expended above twelve thousand talents only in the gilding of the capitol; and that nevertheless each hall and gallery of his own palace far excelled that stately temple in magnificence^w. To the ancient edifices, which he either repaired or rebuilt, he added an incredible number of new ones, having a great passion for building, and seeming desirous, as Plutarch expresses it^x, to change every thing into stones and gold. He was assiduous and quite unbiaſſed in the administration of justice, punished with the utmost severity such judges as were convicted of having received bribes, and kept the magistrates of the city, as well as the governors of the provinces, in such awe, that they were never known to have behaved with so much modesty as in his time, tho', after his death, many of them abandoned themselves, as Suetonius informs us, to all manner of rapine and extortion^y. Tho', after his accession to the empire, he utterly neglected all kind of literature, and was never known to have perused any book, except the memoirs of Tiberius, yet he repaired the libraries which had been burnt in his brother's reign, procuring copies of such as had been consumed in the flames, and sending persons to Alexandria to transcribe those that were lodged in that famous library^z. Authors observe, as a thing very remarkable in Domitian, that, in the beginning of his reign, he used to retire every day for some time into his room, where his whole employment was to catch flies, and pierce them with a sharp bodkin; which custom gave occasion to Vibius Priscus, when he was asked, whether any body was with the emperor, to answer pleasantly, Not so much as a fly^a.
- Domitian*, in the first year of his reign, took upon him, as other emperors had done, the consular dignity, and chose for his colleague Titus Flavius Sabinus, his cousin-german, the son of Flavius Sabinus governor of Rome, who was put to death in the reign of Vitellius, as we have related above. The emperor resigned the fasces on the thirteenth of January; but to whom, we are no-where told, and assumed the title of censor; which office he discharged with great applause, restraining, with several edicts, the licentiousness, which generally prevailed amongst all ranks of men. He enacted severe laws against the authors of such writings as any ways reflected on persons of distinction; degraded a senator, by name Cæcilius Rufinus, for no other reason, but because he took great delight in dancing. From such women as led scandalous lives, he took away the privilege of being carried in litters, and declared them incapable of enjoying legacies or inheritances. He struck a Roman knight out of the list of judges, for taking his wife again after he had divorced her for adultery. One of his freed-men having erected a monument for his son, with the stones which were designed for the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, he caused it to be demolished, and the bones and ashes of the deceased to be thrown into the sea. He would not suffer the comedians and pantomimes to act on the public stage; but confined them to private houses and gardens. Many persons of both sexes convicted of adultery, he punished with death, &c^b. These regulations and acts of justice were received with great applause; but the death of Flavius Sabinus, which happened in the end of this, or the beginning of the following, year, caused an universal dread in the city; for the emperor, without any regard to his own blood, caused him to be assassinated, for no crime of his own, but only because the public crier had, by mistake, instead of consul, proclaimed him emperor in the assembly of the people^c. Sabinus had married Julia the daughter of the emperor Titus; which marriage proved the source of Domitian's jealousy, if Philostratus is to be credited^d, and the chief cause of Sabinus's death. In the mean time, the brave Agricola vigorously pursued his enterprizes in Britain. In the first year of Domitian's reign and the fifth of the British war, he passed the frith himself in the first ship that landed, subdued in many successful encounters nations till that time unknown, and placed forces in that part of Britain which fronts Ireland, not that he apprehended any danger from the inhabitants of that that island, but because he already entertained thoughts of reducing it; for, as it lies between Britain and Spain, and is capable of an easy communication with the coast of Gaul, Agricola considered, that it would prove of infinite use in linking together those powerful members of the empire. A petty king of the country, expelled by domestic dissention, was already received into protection by Agricola, and, under the appearance of friendship, reserved for a proper occasion^a. For these conquests Domitian assumed the title of imperator the fourth time, having taken it three time before^c, for what victories we find no-where recorded.

THE following year, Domitian entered upon his ninth consulship, having Q. Petilius Rufus for his colleague, whom Onuphrius calls Virginus Rufus, and takes for the celebrated Virginus Rufus, who so often refused the empire offered him by the soldiery^f. But Phlegon, speaking of a woman, who was, according to him, delivered of several serpents at Trent, tells us, that this happened during the ninth consulship of Domitian, and the second of Petilius Rufus^e. He is likewise styled Petilius Rufus in an ancient inscription in Greek discovered at Smyrna in the year 1679. and from thence conveyed to Rome^b. This year Domitian enacted a law, forbidding, under severe penalties, the castrating of children, and regulating the prices of such as were eunuchs already; for they were all slaves and brought from foreign countriesⁱ. Philostratus tells us, that Domitian was chiefly prompted to enact this law by a secret envy to the memory of Titus, who was greatly addicted to eunuchs, and had constantly many of them about him. Be that as it will, the law was generally applauded, and continued in force in the time of Justin the martyr^k. The same year, according to Eusebius^l, he punished four vestals convicted of incest, viz. two sisters of the family of the Ocellates, Varonilla, and Cornelia. The three former he allowed to chuse the manner of their death; but Cornelia, who had been pardoned before, he caused to be buried alive, and her accomplices to be whipt to death in the midst of the comitium. Those who had debauched the other three were only condemned to banishment^m. In the mean time, Agricola continued his conquests in Britain, or rather Caledonia. On the the summer which began the sixth year of his administration, as it was apprehended, that the nations beyond Bodotria, or the frith of Edinburgh, would all take arms, and that all the ways and passages were beset with the enemy's forces, his first step was to coast, and examine, by means of his fleet, the large communities beyond the frith, probably those of the counties of Fife, Angus, Mernes, and Aberdeen, which lie beyond Edinburgh frith. As the fleet constantly attended the army, the same camp often contained the foot and the horse and the marines, all intermixed, and severally magnifying their own feats, hazards, and adventures. The soldiers boasted their laborious marches over steep mountains and thick forests; the sailors their dangers amidst the tempests and waves, all vying together according to the usual vaunts and ostentation of soldiers. As for the Britons, upon the sight of the fleet, they were seized, as from the captives was learnt, with consternation and dismay, finding the recesses of the sea now discovered, and the last refuge of the vanquished cut off. The several people therefore inhabiting Caledonia had immediate recourse to arms, and advancing with great parade, still made greater by common report, boldly attacked the Roman forts, and caused no small terror and alarm amongst the soldiers; inso-much, that there were some, who, covering real cowardice under the appearance of prudence, advised Agricola to return to this side of Bodotria, seeing it was less shameful to retire back of their own accord, than to be repulsed and given by force. As Agricola was informed, that the enemy designed to attack him in different bodies, he divided his army into three parts, and thus marched to prevent their surrounding him; for they surpassed him in numbers and in the knowledge of the country. Hereupon the Caledonians changed their measures, and in one body fell upon the ninth legion, as the weakest of all. As the attack was in the night, they slew the guards, entered the trenches, and were already pursuing the slaughter in the camp itself, when Agricola, having learnt from his scouts what rout the enemy had taken, and following their track, commanded the lightest of his foot and cavalry to charge them, while yet engaged, in the rear, and the whole army to give a mighty shout. Thus the Caledonians were dismayed with double distress, and to the Romans their courage returned; so that they fell upon the enemy with great resolution, and drove them

- a them to the gates of the camp, where a bloody encounter ensued, the Romans who were come to the relief of their companions pressing them in the rear, and those who were in the camp in the front, and both exerting their whole might, the former to shew that they brought relief, the latter to appear not to have wanted it. At last the Caledonians were routed; and had not the bogs and woods covered their flight, by this victory the war had been ended. This battle, in the opinion of the writer whom we have quoted above ^a, was fought in the county of Fife; for Agri- cola's army was at that time, as is evident from Tacitus, on the north side of Bodotria, or the frith of Edinburgh; and the remains of a Roman camp are still to be seen in that county, at a place called Lochore. To the south of the camp is a large morass, in which are daily dug up roots of different trees; whence the above-mentioned writer concludes it to have been formerly a great wood, and thence strengthens his conjecture, that the ninth legion was attacked there; for Tacitus tells us, that if the bogs and woods had not served for shelter to the fugitives, that victory would have put an end to the war. The Roman soldiers, elated with this success, and thinking nothing could now prove unsurmountable to their bravery, demanded to be led into the heart of Caledonia, and to the utmost limits of Britain, which they hoped to find out by a constant course of victories. Thus those, who a little before had been so wary and so wise, were now after victory full of boasts and intrepidity. Instead of returning to this side of Bodotria, they were for penetrating to the utmost bounds of Britain. On the other hand, the Caledonians, ascribing the victory gained by the Romans, not to their superior courage, but to the skill and address of their general, lost nothing of their spirit and resolution, but armed their youth, removed their wives and children into places of security, and, in general assemblies of their several communities, engaged them in a league, which they ratified by solemn sacrifices. And thus they mutually retired for the winter, with minds on both sides equally irritated and bent upon war and revenge ^o. The same summer a cohort of Usipians, levied by the Romans in Germany, and thence transported to Britain, having slain the centurion and some Roman soldiers, placed among them to teach them the discipline, imbarqued in three vessels, with a design to return to their own country, forcing the pilots to conduct them. But one of these forsaking them and making his escape, or bringing them back, as we read in Dion Cassius, to Britain, they suspected, and therefore killed the other two, and abandoned themselves to the mercy of the winds and waves; which, after having long tossed them hither and thither, carried them quite round about Britain; infomuch, that, departing, according to Dion, from the eastern, they returned to the western, coast, where the Roman army was then incamped ^p. Tacitus tells us, that having sailed quite round the island, they were driven on the coasts of Germany, where, their vessels being lost, they were seized as pirates by the Suevians and Frisians; and being sold for slaves, some of them by change of masters were brought over to the Roman side of the Rhine, where they became famous by relating such an extraordinary adventure, and by discovering, that Britain was an island. Their provisions had soon failed them; so that they were obliged to make frequent descents, and engage with several of the British nations, in which conflicts they often proved victorious, and were sometimes defeated. They were at length reduced to such streights, as to feed upon one another, first upon the weakest, then upon whomsoever the lot fell. This happened in the eighty-third year of the christian æra, and the second of Domitian's reign. The same year, the emperor undertook an expedition against the Cattans, whom Tacitus describes as the most polite and most warlike nation in Germany. Domitian attacked them, without the least provocation, and while they were quite unprepared for war; laid waste part of their country; took a small number of peasants prisoners; and then, upon advice that the enemy were drawing their forces together, hastened back, and returned to Rome with all the pomp and parade of a conqueror ^q. The senate, for this pretended victory, decreed him a triumph, in which were led before his chariot great numbers of slaves by him bought, and attired like Germans. On occasion of this mock victory, he promised to increase the pay of the soldiers; but, not having wherewithal to discharge his promise, and at the same time supply his other extravagances, he soon after betook himself to all manner of rapine and violence. From this time forward, Domitian constantly wore in the senate, and at all public assemblies, the triumphal robe ^r.

Galgacus's speech to them.

THE following year, Domitian being consul the tenth time, with Appius, or, as others call him, Oppius Sabinus, the brave Agricola pursued his conquests in Caledonia with wonderful success. In the beginning of the summer, he lost, to his great grief, his son, about a year old; a misfortune which he neither bore with an ostentation of firmness and constancy, like many other great men, nor with lamentations and tears, worthy only of women. Against this affliction war proved his chief remedy. Having therefore sent forward his navy, in order to spread a mighty terror, by committing devastations in several places, he put himself at the head of his army lightly equipped; and to it added some of the bravest Britons, whose fidelity had been well proved by long experience in peace. Thus he arrived at the Grampian hills, upon which the enemy were already incamped. For the Caledonians, nothing daunted by the issue of the late battle, and boldly waiting, either to take revenge or to suffer bondage, had, by embassies and confederacies, drawn together the forces of all their communities, to the number of thirty thousand; and their youth from every quarter were still continuing to flock in, as were also such of their elderly men as were yet vigorous, and had signalized themselves in war, carrying with them their several ensigns of honour formerly gained in the field. Upon the approach of the Roman army, the Caledonians with great eagerness prepared for battle; and Galgacus, who surpassed all their other leaders both in valour and descent, is said to have encouraged them with the following speech, which the learned Lipsius looks upon as one of the finest pieces of eloquence ever committed to the Roman language:

“ When I consider the causes of the war and the necessity to which we are reduced, great is my confidence, that this day and this your union will give a happy beginning to the liberty of the whole island. Bondage we have never borne; and we are so beset, that beyond us there is no further land, nor any security left us from the sea, while the Roman fleet is hovering upon our coasts. Thus what brave men covet for glory, is to cowards become the safest expedient of all others, I mean present recourse to battle and arms. The other Britons, in their former conflicts with the Romans, had still a remaining source of hope and succour in this our nation: for of all the people of Britain, we are the most noble, placed in its remotest regions, and at a great distance from those nations that are held in bondage by the enemy; so that our eyes are yet unpolluted with the sight of lawless and usurped power. To us, who are the utmost inhabitants of the earth and the last who enjoy liberty, this extremity of the globe, this remotest recess, unknown even to common fame, has proved the only protection and defence. At present, the utmost boundary of Britain is laid open; beyond us no more people are found, nor aught but seas and rocks; and already the Romans have advanced into the heart of our country. Against their pride and ambition you will in vain seek a remedy or refuge from any obsequiousness or humble behaviour. These plunderers of the earth, these ravagers of the universe, finding countries to fail them, endeavour to rifle the wide seas and the ocean. If the enemy be wealthy, he inflames their avarice; if poor, their ambition. Neither the eastern world, nor the western, vast as they are, can satiate these general robbers. Of all men, they alone thirst after acquisitions, both poor and rich, with equal avidity and passion. Devastations, murders, and universal destruction, they by a lying name style empire and government; and when they have spread a general devastation, they call it peace. Dearest to every man, by the instinct of nature, are his children and kindred. These are snatched from us to supply their armies, and doomed to bondage in other parts of the earth. Our wives, daughters, and sisters, however they escape violence from them as from open enemies, are debauched under the appearance of friendship. Our goods are their tribute, our corn their provision, our bodies and limbs their tools for the drudgery of making cuts through woods and drains in bogs, under continual blows and outrages. Other slaves, whom nature and fortune have destined to servitude, are but once sold, and thenceforward nourished by their lords. The Britons are daily paying for their servitude, are daily maintaining and feeding their imperious lords and oppressors. Moreover, as in a tribe of domestic slaves, he who comes last is scoffed by his fellows, and serves for sport to them; so in this ancient state of slavery, to which the world is reduced, we, as the latest slaves, and thence held the most contemptible, are now destined to destruction. For we have no fields to manure,

 “ tions, is always distasteful to jealous and arbitrary rulers. And truly our situation, “ so solitary and remote, the more security it affords to us, the greater jealousy it “ raises in them. Since therefore you are thus bereft of all hopes of mercy, rouse “ your courage in defence both of your lives and glory. The Brigantes, even under “ the conduct of a woman, burnt their colony, stormed their intrenchments, and,
 “ had not such auspicious beginnings degenerated into sloth, might have with ease cast
 “ who still preserve our forces intire, and want not to acquire, but only to secure, b “ liberty, shew at once, in the very first encounter, what kind of men Caledonia has “ reserved for her own vindication and defence, Do you believe the Romans to be “ equally brave in war, as they are vicious and dissolute in peace? No; not from “ their valour they have derived their renown, but from our quarrels and divisions, “ which they have dextrously converted to the glory of their own army; an army “ compounded of a motly multitude of different nations, which by success alone are “ held together, and consequently cannot fail to dissolve upon any misfortune or “ disaster: unless you suppose the Gauls and Germans, and many of the Britons, “ whom with shame I mention, to be attached to them with any real affection: they “ have been all longer their enemies than their friends; and what restrains them at c “ present is, nothing but awe and terror; which being once removed, those who “ cease to fear will immediately begin to give proofs of their hatred. Whatever can “ incite men to victory, is found on our side. The Romans have no wives to encou“ rage and urge them: they have here no fathers or mothers to upbraid them for fly“ ing. In number they are but few, ignorant of the country, and thence struck with “ dread, whilst whatever they behold around them is wild and strange, even the air
 “ and the sky, with the woods and the sea; so that the gods seem to have delivered “ them up inclosed and fettered into our hands. Let not the vain shew and glare of “ gold and silver terrify us; this is what can neither wound nor save. In the very “ army of the enemy we shall find many on our own side: the Britons will own and d “ espouse their own cause, and abandon one foreign and unnatural to them: the Gauls “ will remember their former liberty: what the Usipians have lately done, the other “ Germans will do, and abandon the Romans. And what else have we to fear? their “ forts are ungarisoned; their colonies peopled with the aged and infirm; the municipal “ cities are weakened and rent into parties and factions, while the people are averse
 “ to obedience, and the magistrates rule with injustice. Here you see a general, here “ an army; there tributes and mines, with a long train of calamities and curses, ever “ attending a state of slavery. Whether all these are to be for ever imposed and borne,
 “ or we forthwith avenge ourselves for the attempt, this very day must determine.
 “ As therefore you advance to battle, look back upon your ancestors, who lived in “ the happy state of liberty; look forward to your posterity, who, unless you exert e “ your valour in this very field, must live for ever in a miserable state of servitude.”
 This speech was received with songs, according to the custom which then prevailed among the Caledonians, with joyful shouts, and a terrible din. Already their bands moved, and the glare of their arms appeared, while the most resolute were running to the front. As the army was forming in battle array, Agricola, tho’ he saw his men full of alacrity and hardly to be restrained, yet chose to discourse them in the following strain: “ It is now the eighth year, my fellow soldiers, since, through the auspicious “ fortune of the Roman empire and by your own valour, you have been pursuing “ the conquest of Britain. In so many marches, in so many battles, you have had f “ constant occasion to exert your bravery against the enemy, or your patience against “ the obstacles of nature. During all these struggles, we have found no cause of mu“ tual regret, I to have conducted such soldiers, or you to have followed such a cap“ tain. We have both passed the limits which we found, I those known to ancient “ governors, you those of former armies. The utmost bound of Britain is found,
 “ not by fame only and report: but we possess it with our arms and camps. Britain
 “ is intirely discovered, and intirely subdued. While we were marching, and fatigued “ with passing mountains, rivers, and bogs, I have often heard every man remark“ ably brave cry out, When shall we see the enemy? when be led to battle? Already “ they

 “ end of all your wishes ; here is room for all your valour, and all things promising “ and propitious, if you conquer ; but equally disastrous, should you be overcome.
 “ To have thus marched over a tract of country so immense, to have passed through “ thick and gloomy forests, to have crossed arms of the sea, is matter of great “ glory and applause, while we advance against the enemy ; but if we fly from “ them, whatever is now most to our advantage, will prove most to our disadvan“ tage and ruin. We are not so well skilled in the country as the enemy, nor have “ we the like store of provisions ; but we have hands and weapons, and in these all “ things. For myself, I have been long since convinced, that neither for the sol- b “ diers, nor for the general, is there any safety in turning their backs upon the foe.
 “ Hence an honourable death is far preferable to a life with reproach ; and security is “ inseparable from renown. Neither would it be a fate void of glory to fall in this “ utmost verge of the world and nature. Were people unknown to you now arrayed “ against you, were you to engage men never before tried, I would animate you by “ the examples of other armies. At present only recollect and enumerate your own “ exploits, only ask and consult your own eyes. These are the same men, who, but “ the last year, trusting to the darkness of the night, attacked by stealth a single “ legion, and were by the terror of your shouting utterly overthrown. These, of all c
 “ the Britons, are the most timorous and most prone to flight ; and therefore have “ thus survived all the rest. As in forests and woods, beasts of the greatest strength “ are driven thence by superior force, and the timorous and spiritless are scared even “ at the cry of the pursuers ; so all the bravest Britons are long since fallen by the “ sword, and only the most fearful and dastardly remain, whom at length you have “ found, not because they intended to stay and make head against you, but because “ they are overtaken and surprised. They stand in the field, struck with dread and “ bereft of all spirit ; whence you may without much danger gain over them a glori“ ous and memorable victory. Here conclude your warfare ; here complete your “ expeditions and efforts, and put an end to a struggle of fifty years, with one great d
 “ and important day ; so that the army may not be charged either with protracting
 “ the war, or with any cause for reviving it.” Agricola had scarce ended his speech, when the soldiers, transported with joy, flew to their arms. Agricola, seeing them sufficiently animated and inflamed, drew them up in battle array, placing the auxiliary foot, to the number of eight thousand men, in the centre, and three thousand auxiliary horse in the wings. The legions he would not suffer to advance, but commanded them to stand in battle-array close to the intrenchments ; for the victory, he thought, would be the more glorious, were it, by sparing them, gained without spilling any Roman blood ; and, on the other hand, they were still a sure succour, should the rest be repulsed. The Caledonians were ranged upon the rising grounds e in such manner, that the first band stood upon the plain, and the rest rose successively upon the brows of the hills, one rank close above the other, as if they had been linked together. The enemy’s chariots of war and cavalry filled the interjacent field. Then Agricola fearing, as the enemy far surpassed him in number, lest he should be attacked at once in the front and on each flank, opened and extended his front. As thence his ranks proved more weak, many advised him to bring on the legions ; but he, in all difficulties more prone to hope than to fear, without hearkening to their advice, dismissed his horse, and advanced on foot before the ensigns. The onset was begun at a distance, wherein the Britons displayed great courage and equal skill, eluding, with their huge swords and small bucklers, the missile weapons of the Romans, whilst of their own they poured a torrent upon f them, till Agricola encouraged three Batavian cohorts and two of the Tungrians, to close with the enemy, and bring them to an engagement hand to hand, as what to the veteran soldiers by a long practice was become familiar, but proved to the enemy very uneasy and embarrassing, as they were armed with little targets and with swords of enormous size ; for the swords of the Britons, as they were blunt at the end, were quite unfit for a close encounter. Hence the Batavians doubled their blows, wounded the enemy with the iron bosses of their bucklers, mangled their faces, and beating down all who withstood them in the plain, were already carrying the attack up to the hills ; insomuch, that the other cohorts, encouraged by their

“ Idem ibid. c. 33, 34

- a example, fell upon the enemy with equal ardour, and made a dreadful havock of all who opposed them; nay, such was the hurry of the conquerors, that they left many of the enemy behind them but half dead, and others not so much as wounded. In the mean time, their cavalry betook themselves to flight, and their chariots of war, mixing with the battalions of foot, and intangled with the unevenness of the place, occasioned in the plain a general disorder and confusion. The engagement had not the least appearance of a combat of cavalry; for standing obstinately foot to foot, they pressed to overthrow each other by the weight and bodies of their horses. Besides, the chariots, abandoned and straggling, and likewise the horses destitute of managers, and thence wild and affrighted, were running to and fro just
- b as the next fright drove them; insomuch, that all of their own side who met them, or crossed their way, were beaten down by them. In the mean time, the Britons, who were lodged upon the ridges of the hills, and had hitherto no share in the encounter, looking with scorn upon the small number of the Roman forces, began to descend slowly, and to surround them in the rear, while they were pursuing their victory. But Agricola, who had apprehended this very design, detached against them four squadrons of horse, which he had reserved near him for the sudden exigencies of the field. These falling upon the enemy, with great vigor and intrepidity, obliged them to retire, and put them in great disorder: then, turning against the Caledonians their own devices, they wheeled about, and attacked the enemy in
- c the rear. Hereupon the Caledonians began to retire in great confusion, and nothing was to be seen all over the open fields but pursuits, wounds, and captivity, and the present captives always slaughtered when others occurred to be taken. Some of the enemy fled in large troops, with all their arms, before a smaller number who pursued them; others, quite unarmed, rushing into danger, offered themselves through despair to instant death. On all sides lay scattered arms, and carcases, and mangled limbs; and the ground was dyed with blood. Some bands of the vanquished still fought with incredible resolution and bravery; and when they drew near the woods, they rallied, and surrounded the foremost pursuers, who, without knowing the country, had ventured too far: whence the conquerors must have suffered some
- d notable disaster, had not Agricola, who was constantly flying from one quarter to another, ordered the bravest cohorts lightly equipped to invest the enemy on all sides, and some of the cavalry to dismount and enter the narrow passes, while the rest of the horse advanced into the more open and passable parts of the wood. The Caledonians, perceiving the Romans to continue the pursuit with regular and close ranks, betook themselves to flight, not in united bodies as before, but quite scattered, no man regarding or awaiting another, but all in the utmost confusion making towards the deserts and the most remote places. The Romans followed them close; and the pursuit was not ended, but with night and a satiety of slaughter. Of the enemy, ten thousand were slain; of the Roman army, three hundred and forty,
- e among whom was Aulus Atticus, commander of a cohort, who, by his own youthful heat and also by a fiery horse, was hurried into the midst of the enemy^w (E).

The Caledonians are utterly routed.

(E) We will not take upon us to ascertain the precise place of this memorable action, our antiquaries being greatly divided in their opinions about it. However, we cannot help observing, that the chief argument, which the author of the Itinerarium Septentrionale makes use of to confute the opinions of other antiquaries, equally concludes against his own. For he approves of no place, but where some vestiges are still to be seen of a Roman camp capable of containing the army which Agricola had with him at this battle. Hence he rejects the opinions of those who pretend, that the battle was fought in the Mearns, or at the Blair of Athol, because no remains of a Roman camp are to be seen in either of these places. Against such as maintain Ardoch in Strathallan and Innerpeffery to be the spot on which the fate of Caledonia was determined, he alledges, that the camps, which are to be seen there, were not capable of containing the army which Agricola led out against the Caledonians. Having thus confuted the opinions of other antiquaries, he offers his own, which is, that the real place, where the battle was fought, is in Strathern, half a mile south of the kirk of Comerie, there being still to be seen in that place a Roman incampment, divided into two partitions or squares, which are joined together with a vast rampart of stone and earth. Our learned antiquary tells us, that having calculated the number of men contained in the southmost camp, according to the allowance of ground made by Polybius for every foot-soldier, he was most agreeably surprised to find it contained the precise number of foot which Tacitus says Agricola had along with him at the battle of Mons Grampius, viz. eight thousand auxiliaries; and that the other square, where he supposes the horse lay, contained exactly three thousand horsemen. For Tacitus, says he, plainly informs us of the number of Agricola's army at that battle; for, speaking of his disposing of the troops, he says thus; Instinctos ruentesque ita disposuit, ut peditum auxilia, quæ octo millia erant, mediam aciem firmarent, equitum tria millia cornibus affunderentur: that

THE following night proved a night of great joy to the conquerors, both from victory and spoil. But the Caledonians, both men and women, crying and howling, wandered in despair: some dragged away their wounded; others were heard calling their lost friends; all abandoned their houses, and some in rage even set fire to them: not knowing where to shelter themselves, they fled from one lurking-hole to another; then met to consult, and from their counsels gathered some hope; sometimes, at the sight of their dearest pledges of nature, they were moved to pity, sometimes to resolution and fury: nay, some, out of compassion and tenderness, murdered their children and wives. The next day displayed more fully the greatness of the victory; on all sides a profound silence, solitary hills, a thick smoke rising from the houses on fire, and not a living soul to be found by the scouts. When from these, who had been dispatched out into all quarters, it was learnt, that no certain traces could be discovered whither the enemy had fled, and that they had no-where rallied in bodies, Agricola, considering that the summer was already far spent, and consequently that he could not pursue the operations of the war, led his army into the country of the Horestians, that is, as is commonly supposed, into Angus. Having there received hostages, he ordered the admiral of the fleet to sail round Britain, furnishing him with proper forces for that expedition, which he happily accomplished; and thence proved Britain to be, as it was thought before, an island. On this occasion were discovered and subdued the isles of Orkney, till then unknown. Thule, now called Iseland, or, as others will have it, Shetland, was likewise found, hitherto hid, to use the expression of Tacitus, by winter, under eternal snow. In the mean time, Agricola himself led on the foot and horse with a slow pace, that the minds of these new-conquered nations might be awed and dismayed by prolonging his march through them. He then put his army into winter quarters. Soon after, the fleet, having sailed round the island, returned with great fame to the port whence it had departed. That port is called by Tacitus, Trutulensis, which is utterly unknown. Some, instead of Trutulensis, read Rbutupensis, supposed to be Sandwich haven. But from Tacitus it is manifest, that the fleet at that time attended Agricola in Caledonia or Scotland; and consequently must have sailed from some port of that kingdom. Thus, after many struggles and contests, Britain was at length intirely reduced; but the Romans did not long continue masters, at least of Caledonia, what Agricola won being soon after lost by Domitian. The poet Juvenal speaks of a British king, by name Arviragus, who was at war with the Romans in Domitian's reign^x; and all the Scotch historians tell us, that, upon the departure of Agricola, the Caledonians possessed themselves of the castles and forts raised by him in their country. As for the Roman historians, they scarce take any notice of the British affairs till the reign of the emperor Hadrian, who came over into Britain, where he built a wall eighty miles in length, in order to separate the Romans from the barbarians, as Spartianus styles them^y.

Agricola immediately acquainted Domitian by letters with the success that had attended his arms in Britain, and the situation of affairs there. The account he conveyed that is, Thus encouraged and rushing forward, Agricola formed them so, that the body of auxiliary foot, who were eight thousand men, composed the centre, and three thousand horse were placed in the wings. But were these eight thousand auxiliary foot and three thousand horse all the troops, Agricola had with him at this battle? Does not Tacitus to the words we have just quoted subjoin, Legiones pro vallo stare, ingens victoriæ decus citra Romanum sanguinem bellanti, & auxilium, si pellerentur: that is, The legions stood just without the intrenchments, that the victory might be the more glorious, were it gained without Roman blood; and that the legions might be ready to succour the auxiliaries, if repulsed. Hence it is evident, that Agricola, besides the eight thousand auxiliary foot and three thousand horse, had some legions with him, for which there was no room, according to our antiquary's own calculation, in the above-mentioned camp. If therefore his chief argument has any force, it confutes, with- out leaving room to any reply, his own opinion, as must evidently appear to every reader. Besides, to us it seems quite absurd to suppose, as that writer does, that some vestiges must still remain of all the Roman camps in this island, and indeed elsewhere, notwithstanding the innumerable changes and alterations that must have happened, unknown to us, in the course of so many ages. How many camps were made by the Romans in Germany, Gaul, and Italy, of which no traces remain in our days! Great cities have been overturned and utterly destroyed, by the devourer of all things, time; inasmuch, that antiquaries are at a loss about the places where they stood. But, admitting our author's supposition, it is evident from his own arguments, that the battle was not fought in the place for which he contends, the camp there being capable of containing only eight thousand foot and three thousand horse; besides which, Agricola had with him several legions, as is plain from the words of Tacitus (18).

- a veyed to him was plain and modest, without all ostentation, or any pomp of words. The emperor received it with joy in his countenance, but with anguish in his heart, Domitian is being well apprised, that his late mock triumph over the Germans was held in public derision; whereas now a true and mighty victory, gained by the slaughter of so many thousands of the enemy, was every-where sounded by the voice of fame, and received with universal applause. He could not brook that the name of a private man should be exalted above that of the prince: to the emperor alone, he thought, properly appertained the glory and renown of being a great general. Tortured with these anxious thoughts, and indulging his humour of being shut up in secret, a certain indication that he was meditating some bloody design, he at last judged it the best course upon this occasion, to smother his rancour, till the fame of these conquests, and the affection of the army to Agricola, were somewhat abated. To him, therefore, he caused to be decreed by the senate the triumphal ornaments, a statue crowned with laurel, and whatever else is bestowed instead of a real triumph, heightening these honours with many expressions full of esteem and respect. But, in the mean time, he resolved to recal him; and that this might not be ascribed to jealousy or envy, he caused a report to be spread abroad, that to Agricola was destined the province of Syria, a government then vacant by the death of Atilius Rufus, a man of consular dignity, since the same was reserved only for men of the first rank. There were many who believed, that an imperial freedman, one much trusted with the secret designs of his master, was by him dispatched to carry the instrument appointing Agricola governor of Syria, with orders to deliver it to him, were he still in Britain, for he had already named him a successor; that the freedman met Agricola crossing the chanel, and, without so much as speaking to him, returned directly to Domitian. Whether this account be true, or only a fiction, framed in conformity to the character and genius of Domitian, is, according to Tacitus, uncertain. Agricola had already surrendered to his successor, probably Sallustius Secundus, the province, now settled in perfect peace and tranquillity. To avoid all popular distinction and concourse of people to meet him, he entered Rome by night, and by night went, as he was directed, to the palace, where he was received by the emperor with a short embrace, without a word said, and then passed undistinguished amongst the crowd of courtiers. From this time forward, to lessen the reputation he had acquired of a military man and a gallant commander, a name ever distasteful to those who live themselves in idleness, he resigned himself intirely to inactivity and repose. In his dress he was modest; in his conversation affable and free, and never found accompanied by more than one, or at most two, of his friends: insomuch, that many, especially such as judge of great men from their retinue and parade, when they beheld and observed Agricola, could not conceive, whence proceeded his mighty fame; and indeed few there were, who could account for the motives of his conduct. Notwithstanding the retired life he led, he was frequently accused in his absence before Domitian, and as often in his absence acquitted. What threatened his life was no crime of his, nor complaint of any particular for injuries received, nor any thing else, save the glorious character of the man, and the perverse disposition of the emperor, hating all excellence and every virtue. With these causes concurred the worst sort of enemies, such as extolled him in order to destroy him. Besides, such times afterwards ensued, as would not suffer the name of Agricola to remain unmentioned; so that he was in constant danger of being sacrificed to the jealousy of the emperor, but nevertheless lived nine years longer^z; whence we shall have occasion to speak of him again in the course of this reign.
- f THE same year, Carionerius, king of the Cherusians, a German nation, being driven out by the Cattans, because he had submitted to the Romans and delivered hostages to them, had recourse to Domitian for assistance. But the emperor, not caring to engage in a war with that fierce nation, contented himself with conveying to his friend and ally a sum of money, instead of troops, which, he said, he could not at that juncture well spare^a. About the same time, one Ganda, a German virgin and prophetess, and revered in Germany as a deity, arrived at Rome; and being there well received by Domitian, after some private conferences with him, returned to her own country^b.

THE year following, Domitian was consul the eleventh time, and had for his colleague one Fulvius, whom Onuphrius takes to be T. Aurelius Fulvius, or Fulvus, the grandfather of Titus Antoninus. He was a native of Nisime, twice consul and governor of Rome. This year Domitian took the title of emperor four times, but for what victories we find no-where recorded. We read indeed in Dion Cassius, that the Suevians and Lygians, whom that writer places in Mæsia, solicited Domitian for succours, who sent them only an hundred horsemen; which so provoked the Suevians, that joining the Iazygians, a people of Sarmatia, they advanced with a design to pass the Danube, and lay waste the Roman territories^c. Dion Cassius does not acquaint us with the issue of this bold undertaking; but Tacitus, having told us in one place, that the Sarmatians and Suevians entered into an alliance against Rome^d, adds in another^e, that, soon after the return of Agricola out of Britain, the Romans lost intire armies in Mæsia, in Dacia, in Germany, and in Pannonia, all by the bad conduct of their generals, either altogether cowardly or fool-hardy. From several medals it appears, that Domitian returned this year to Rome from some expedition, of which not the least mention is made by the historians: perhaps he marched in person against the Suevians and Iazygians; at least several medals were stamped this year in memory of a signal victory, real or pretended, gained over the Germans^f. The emperor, after his return to Rome, abandoning himself to all manner of cruelty, caused the nativity to be cast of all the illustrious persons in the city, and put such of them to death, as were said by the astrologers to be destined to the empire. Metius Pomposianus, against whom some ill-designing persons had on the same account endeavoured in vain to stir up the emperor Vespasian, was on this occasion banished Italy, and confined to the island of Corfica, where he was soon after by Domitian's order put to death. Nerva, who succeeded him in the empire, would have suffered the same doom, had not an astrologer assured the emperor, that he had no reason to be afraid of Nerva, who could not live many days. He encouraged informers more than any other prince had done, tho' in the beginning of his reign he had treated them with great severity, and solemnly declared, that he would never give ear to their informations. Amongst these, the most famous were Metius Carus, Catullus Messalinus, and Bebius Massa, three robbers, as Pliny calls them^g, who enriched themselves and the emperor, with spoils of many thousand illustrious and innocent persons. Carus is often mentioned by the poets Juvenal and Martial, and by Pliny, against whom he presented a memorial to Domitian^h. Catullus Messalinus was blind, but nevertheless one of the most mischievous informers who frequented the court: he died about the latter end of Domitian's reign; whence it is plain, that Cataneus was mistaken in supposing him to be the same person with Catullus, governor of Cyrene, who died, according to Josephus, in the reign of *Vespasian*ⁱ. Authors observe, that this year multitudes of senators and knights were accused of treason, and either sentenced to death by the senate, or ordered by Domitian to dispatch themselves. Of these the most illustrious were, Ælius Lama, whom he caused to be publicly executed only for a jest; for the emperor, who, as we have observed above, had taken away his wife, commending one day his voice, Lamia answered, Yet, alas! I must be silent. Civicus Cerealis was murdered during his proconsulship of Asia, under colour, that he designed to raise disturbances in the state, but in reality because he had accepted the government of Asia, which had fallen to him by lot. Hence Agricola, when to his lot the proconsulship of Asia or Africa was to fall, declined the employment, and presented a petition to the emperor, begging to be excused. Domitian not only granted him his request, but suffered himself to be on that account presented with formal thanks. Neither to Agricola did he give the salary which was wont to be paid to proconsuls, and which he himself had continued to some. Salvius Coccianus was put to death for celebrating the birth-day of the emperor Otho, who was his uncle by the father's side; Sallustius Lucullus, who had succeeded Agricola in the government of Britain, for suffering a new kind of lances to be called after his own name; Junius Rusticus for publishing a writing in commendation of the celebrated Thrasea and of Helvidius Priscus; Maternus, a renowned philosopher, for having declaimed in public against tyranny and tyrants. All the professors of philosophy and every laudable science,

- a science, says Tacitus, were expelled and driven into exile: and that nothing which was worthy and honest might any-where be seen, not only against persons, but against books commending virtue or patriotism, a new kind of cruelty was exerted; for in the forum the works of men famous for their genius and parts were publicly burnt^k. Every thing gave the jealous tyrant fear and offence. Was a man nobly born and popular? he withdrew the affections of the people, rivalled the prince, and threatened a civil war. Was he afraid of popularity and lived retired? he gained fame by shunning it, was still an eye-sore, and his best fate was to leave his country. Was he virtuous and his life and morals without blame? he was another Brutus, and by the purity of his manners upbraided the vicious behaviour of the emperor. If a man seemed dull and unactive, he only put on the disguise of stupidity and sloth, till he found room for some bloody purpose. If he had a different character, and was a lively and active man, then it was plain, he did not so much as feign a desire of private life and recess, but avowed a bustling republican spirit. If he was rich, he was too wealthy for a subject; and great wealth in private hands boded ill to princes: if he was poor, he was thence the more enterprising and desperate. In short, no man could possess any advantage or quality that rendered him acceptable to his fellow-citizens, and a blessing to his country, to his friends, or to himself, but such quality and advantage was sure to awaken the jealousy and vengeance of the tyrant, and procure his doom. Hence Tacitus, speaking of these unhappy times; Mighty, says he, was the testimony which we gave of our patience; for, as our forefathers had beheld the ultimate perfection of liberty, so did we of bondage; since, through dread of informers, we were bereft of the common intercourse of speech. Nay, with our utterance we had likewise lost our memory, had it been equally in our power to forget as to be silent^l. Against the defence of innocence accused, against the most evident truth and justice, the ears of the emperor were ever shut; but calumny whispered by any informer had equal weight with real crimes proved by authentic witnesses. Falshood and flattery, says Dion Cassius, envy and rapaciousness, passed for evidence; justice was converted into cruelty, and judgment into rage; the tribunals, erected for justice and preservation of life and property, were turned into shambles; and what had the names of pains and penalties was in truth robbery and assassination. The persons of the accusers were considered as sacred and inviolable; the more they were detested by the public, the more they were protected by the emperor; and, in proportion as they deserved death and ignominy, had countenance and preferment. Their vilest forgeries, convicted and owned against the lives and fortunes of the greatest men, drew down no punishment upon them^m. In the midst of his cruelties, he abandoned himself to all manner of lewdness and debauchery, and was on that score no less infamous, than the most vicious of his predecessors. His avarice was equal to his lewdness and cruelty; not that he had any natural bias to that vice, says Suetonius; but having exhausted his treasury by the many buildings he raised, by the magnificent sports and shews which he exhibited, by increasing the pay of the soldiers, and by other wild and extravagant expences, he betook himself to all sorts of rapine and extortion, seizing, upon the least information, the estates of the most wealthy citizens: the least action or word against the majesty of the prince, was made use of as a pretence for stripping them of whatever they possessed. He confiscated inheritances, appropriating to himself all the effects of persons whom he never knew, if he could find but one witness to depose, that he had ever heard the deceased say, that Cæsar was his heir. With these and such-like artificial contrivances, he reduced to beggary the most opulent persons, not only in Rome and Italy, but in all the provinces of the Roman empire. His officers and procurators exacted the tributes and taxes with the greatest rigor and severity imaginable; but above all, he oppressed the Jews in a most cruel manner, not excepting even such of them as had renounced their religion; and with the like severity treated those, says Suetonius, meaning, no doubt, the Christians, who lived in Rome after the manner of the Jews, and seemed to profess the same superstitionⁿ. The heavy tributes, and the rigor used by the officers in exacting them, occasioned great disorders and frequent revolts in the distant provinces. In Africa, the Nasamonians, whom most geographers place in the province of Cyrenaica, no longer able to bear the heavy imposts

imposts with which they were loaded, and the insults and extortions of the collectors, rose up in arms this year, defeated Flaccus governor of Numidia, stormed his camp, and put great numbers of his men to the sword. But Flaccus was soon revenged on them; for being informed, that, elated with their success, they had abandoned themselves to jollity and carousing, he rallied his men, and coming unexpectedly upon them, while they were intoxicated with the wine they had found in the Roman camp, he cut them all off to a man. Zonaras seems to insinuate, that he extirpated the whole nation, without any regard to sex or age^o; and Aristides tells us, that by an order from one of the emperors, the whole race of the Nasamonians was cut off^p. However, that some of that race outlived this dreadful slaughter, is evident from Ptolemy the geographer, who places them, as people still in being, to the south of Libya Marmarica^q. Domitian, puffed up with the victory gained by his lieutenant over the Nasamonians, bragged in the senate, that he had cut off the whole nation; for to himself he ascribed, as Dion Cassius observes^r, all the advantages gained by his officers, tho' he bore not the least share in them, and to others every miscarriage, however occasioned by a strict observance of his orders. As he hated and suspected every man of parts, especially such as had acquired any military renown, the commanders of the armies, to recommend themselves to his favour, carefully avoided signalizing themselves by any military exploits, chusing rather to bear the insults of the enemy, than to expose themselves to the dangers arising from the jealousy of the prince^s. The same year he first assumed, according to Eusebius, the title of Lord and that of God, not being ashamed, in dictating an ordinance to one of his secretaries, to begin it thus; Our Lord and our God orders and commands, &c. About the same time he enacted a law, obliging all to pay him divine worship; and from that time forward no man dared to call him by any other name but that of Lord and of God^t; nay, some writers^u tells us, that, by an express law, all other titles, either in speaking or writing to him, were to be suppressed. Of this impious flattery we have many instances in the poets Juvenal and Martial. Pliny complains, that all the streets leading to the capitol were constantly crowded with droves of victims to be sacrificed before his statues^v. He pretended to be, and would be called, the son of Minerva, for which goddess he professed a particular veneration. He would not suffer any statues to be erected to him in the capitol, but such as were of pure gold or silver, and of a fixt weight. He filled the city with triumphal gates and arches, and by an immense number of monuments, raised at a vast charge, endeavoured to transmit to posterity the memory of his pretended victories^x. He was the first who was ever known to have been seventeen times consul. Not satisfied to have assumed the title of Germanicus, on account of his pretended victory over the Cattans, he caused the month of September to be distinguished with the same name, and the month of October with that of Domitian; because in the latter he was born, and in the former declared emperor. In short, before the end of the fourth year of his reign, he surpassed, if Dion Cassius is to be credited, all his predecessors, Nero not excepted, in pride, cruelty, rapaciousness, and all other vices, which complete the character of an accomplished tyrant^y.

The institution of the Capitoline sports.

Some account of the Dacians

THE following year, Domitian entered upon his twelfth consulship, having Servius Cornelius Dolabella for his colleague. This year were instituted the Capitoline sports, so much spoken of by the writers of those days, according to whom they were to be exhibited once in five, but, according to our way of reckoning, once in four years; for they were celebrated, as the Olympic sports, at the end of four years complete, and in the beginning of the fifth. As they were exhibited in honour of Jupiter Capitolinus, the emperor presided at them in person, attended by the priest of Jupiter, and the college of the Flavian priests^z. To this year Eusebius fixes the war with the Dacians, the most bloody and dangerous which the Romans sustained, during the reign of Domitian. The Dacians were looked upon by the Romans as the most warlike nation they were then acquainted with. They were not only men for the most part of great strength, but of equal courage, despising death, which they considered as the end of a transitory, and the beginning of a happy and lasting, life; whence with great intrepidity they braved the greatest dangers. This doctrine they had learnt of an ancient philosopher, by name Zamolxis, whom some suppose to have been the disciple

- a disciple of Pythagoras; others to have flourished long before his time^a. Dion Cassius observes, that these people were by some Greek writers called Getæ; but by the Romans Daci, which was their proper appellation; for the Getæ dwelt beyond mount Hæmus, near the mouth of the Danube and the Euxine sea; but the Dacians more to the west and nearer Germany; that is, according to the opinion of most modern geographers, in the countries now known by the names of Moldavia, Valachia, and Transylvania. But the emperor Aurelian having afterwards placed them on this side of the Danube, (we speak with respect to Rome) they gave their name to that part of Illyricum which they possessed; and this is the province, which, in the fourth and fifth centuries, was known by the name of Dacia. As for the ancient Dacia, it was then held by the Goths, whom Jornandes throughout his history confounds with the Dacians^b. At this time one Duras ruled over the Dacians; but after having for some time held the sovereignty, by an instance of moderation hardly to be matched in history, resigned it of his own accord to one Decebalus, whom he judged better qualified for the discharge of so great a trust than himself; for Decebalus was a man of great prowess and experience in war, and equally skilled in affairs of state^c. He is by Jornandes^d and Orosius^e called Dorpanæus and Diurpanæus; for a prince of that name reigned, according to them, in Dacia, when the defeat of Fuscus happened, of which we shall speak anon; and, on the other hand, we are told by Dion Cassius, that Fuscus was overthrown in battle by Decebalus. As to the issue of the war which he maintained against Rome, Tacitus speaks thus, without descending to any particulars: In the commonwealth there ensued such times, as would not permit the name of Agricola, lately returned from Britain, to remain unmentioned; so many were the armies we had lost in Mæsia, Dacia, Germany, and Pannonia, all by the misconduct of our generals. The question and contest was not now about maintaining the limits of the empire, and guarding the rivers which served for its boundaries, but about defending the standing incampments of the legions, and preserving our own territories. Thus, when public calamities were following one another, and each year was become signal for slaughters and misfortunes, Agricola was, by the common voice of the populace, required for the command of our armies; for all men were comparing his vigor, his resolution, and experience in war, with the sloth and timidity of the others. The best of Domitian's freed-men advised and pressed him to this choice out of pure affection and duty, as did the worst, out of virulence and envy, hoping by that means to compass the destruction of Agricola. But that jealous and distrustful prince dreaded nothing so much, as to see a man of courage and reputation at the head of an army^f. Thus much Tacitus in general of the war with the Dacians, in which the Romans, according to that historian, sustained great losses, and had many armies slaughtered, many brave officers killed, and many taken prisoners. For a more particular and distinct account of this destructive war, we must recur to, and depend upon Jornandes. According to him, the Dacians, dreading the effects of the emperor's avarice, broke the alliance which they had made with his predecessors, crossed the Danube, drove away the troops stationed on the banks of that river; and falling upon Appius, or Oppius, Sabinus, governor of Mæsia, defeated and killed him, committing every-where most dreadful devastations, and seizing all the forts and castles raised in their neighbourhood by the Romans. Hereupon Domitian, having with all possible expedition raised a formidable army, marched himself at the head of it into Illyricum. Upon his approach, Decebalus dispatched ambassadors to him, declaring, that he was ready to put an end to the war and renew the former treaties. But Domitian, instead of returning any answer to the deputies, ordered the flower of his forces to advance against the Dacians, under the conduct of Cornelius Fuscus, captain of the prætorian guards. He was, according to Tacitus^g, of an illustrious descent, and had in his early youth, from a passion for solitude and repose, divested himself of the senatorial dignity. Upon the death of Nero, he declared for Galba, by whom he was created procurator of Illyricum. Afterwards he embraced the party of Vespasian against Vitellius, and to the flame of war added, to use the expression of Tacitus, fresh fuel; for he took not so much delight in the rewards of perils, as in the perils themselves. He was second in the command of the forces under the famous Antonius Primus, and honoured by the senate, after the death of Vitellius, with the ornaments of the prætorship.

ship. Domitian conferred upon him the command of the prætorian guards. But after all, he was not, if Juvenal is to be credited ^h, sufficiently qualified for the chief command of an army. Hence Decebalus, despising such a general, sent a fresh embassy to Domitian, offering to conclude a peace with him, upon condition that each Roman paid him yearly two oboli; and threatening, if they rejected his proposal, to pursue the war with vigor, and destroy their territories with fire and sword. The Romans were so provoked with the insolence of this proposal, that they demanded to be led forthwith against the enemy. Accordingly Fuscus, having caused his army to pass the Danube on a bridge of boats, entered the Dacian territories, where, after several skirmishes, Decebalus and Fuscus agreed to put the whole to the issue of a general engagement. Both armies fought with equal bravery and resolution, and the victory continued long doubtful; but in the end the Romans were utterly routed, and Fuscus himself slain. The Dacians took one eagle, a great quantity of arms, all the engines of war, and a vast number of captives, who were afterwards found in the enemy's castles, and released by the emperor Trajan ⁱ.

The Dacians receive a great overthrow.

Domitian defeated by the Marcomani-ans. Concludes a dishonourable peace with the Dacians.

THE news of this defeat alarmed Domitian, who was already returned to Rome, where he made a no less dreadful havock of the senate and people, than the Dacians had done of the soldiery. He strove at first to smother the dismal tidings; but finding they were by common fame divulged all over the city, and even magnified, he left Rome a second time, giving out, that he would head the army in person. But arriving in Mæsia, he stopped in a city of that province, and sent forward his generals against the enemy. Many bloody battles were fought with various success, fortune being sometimes favourable to the Romans, sometimes to the Dacians ^k. Julianus, one of the Roman commanders, gained a signal victory, by obliging his soldiers to write their names on their bucklers, that he might by that means the more effectually encourage or upbraid each particular ^l. On this occasion Vezinas, who among the Dacians was next in authority to Decebalus, finding no other means to make his escape, concealed himself amongst the dead, and in the night retired undiscovered. Decebalus apprehending the Romans might, after their victory, lay siege to his capital, felled, during the night, a great number of trees in a neighbouring wood, covered the trunks of them with armour, and, by that contrivance, prevented the Romans, who mistook them for soldiers, from pursuing the advantages of their victory. However, Decebalus was at length reduced to great straits, and obliged to sue for peace; which Domitian would not grant him upon any terms whatsoever. But, instead of pursuing the war with vigor, and forcing him, as he might easily have done, to submit at discretion, he turned his arms against the Quadians and Marcomanians, because they had sent him no succours during the war with the Dacians. These two nations, though signal in force and renown, declining to involve their respective countries in an unnecessary war, sent deputies to the emperor, begging him to forbear hostilities, which they were not conscious to themselves to have provoked. But Domitian, instead of hearkening to their intreaties, caused their ambassadors, in defiance of the right of nations, to be murdered; which so provoked those warlike people, that, drawing together all their youth, they took the field, engaged Domitian, and put him to flight. Then the cowardly prince, now no less dejected upon his defeat, than lately elated with his victory, dispatched ambassadors to Decebalus, with offers of peace, upon very advantageous terms; which the Dacian thought it adviseable to accept, since his army had been greatly weakened by the many battles he had fought. However, he refused to go in person to Domitian; but sent his brother to treat with the emperor, whom Domitian received with particular marks of friendship and esteem, delivering to him a diadem for Decebalus, and by that means acknowledging him for king. Besides the diadem, he presented him with large sums, sent to him, at his request, a great number of artificers and workmen of all professions, and engaged to pay him yearly a certain sum, which, to the reign of Trajan, was punctually conveyed to him; but that prince would not submit to the payment of so shameful a tribute, saying, That he had never been overcome by Decebalus ^m. Domitian, upon the conclusion of such an opprobrious peace, acquainted the senate by letters, that he had at length obliged the Dacians to submit to the Roman yoke; and at the same time dispatched to Rome the ambassadors of Decebalus, with a letter written to him by a by that prince, or, as was most commonly believed, feigned by the emperor himself, wherein the Dacian owned himself conquered, and no longer able to withstand the gallantry of the Roman troops, led on by so brave and valiant a commander as Domitian. Hereupon the senate decreed him a triumph, which he enjoyed upon his return, triumphing at the same time over the Dacians, of whom he had with an annual tribute purchased a peace, and over the Quadians and Marcomanians, by whom he had been utterly defeated and driven out of the field^a; for his triumphs, says Pliny^b, were ever certain proofs of signal advantages gained by the enemy. However, the poets, who flourished under him, extol these mock victories, and compare them to those gained by the Scipios and Cæsars. Domitian, before he left Dacia, caused a stately monument to be erected to the memory of Cornelius Fuscus^c. Pliny complains that Domitian, in his marches and journeys, behaved more like an enemy than a prince, exacting immense sums from the inhabitants of the countries through which he passed, pillaging their houses, laying waste their fields, and obliging them to supply, at a vast charge, with all manner of provisions both him and his numerous retinue^d.

The following year, Domitian was consul the thirteenth time with L. Saturninus; but nothing happened, during their administration, which authors have thought worth transmitting to posterity. But the following year, when Domitian was consul the fourteenth time with L. Minucius Rufus, is remarkable for the celebration of the secular games, so called, because they were to be solemnized once in an age. They had been celebrated but forty-one years before by Claudius; but Domitian computed the time from their being exhibited by Augustus^e. They ended, as appears from several medals which have reached our age, some time after the ides of September in the eighth year of Domitian's reign^f, while Tacitus the historian was prætor^g. Domitian, pursuing this year the carnage he had begun, before he left Rome to wage war with the Dacians, filled the city with funerals, putting all those to death, who, on account of their birth or virtue, gave him the least umbrage^h. This general slaughter was in all likelihood produced by the revolt of L. Antonius, which happened this year. L. Antonius was governor of Upper Germany, where he had two legions under his command. Being provoked with the cruelties and tyrannical conduct of the emperor, and depending upon the fidelity of his soldiers, whose affections he had gained by his mild and obliging behaviour, he at once took upon him the title of emperor, and as such was acknowledged by the forces he commanded, and likewise by most of the German nations, who promised him powerful succours, not from any esteem or kindness they had for him, but through hatred to Domitian. The news of this revolt no sooner reached Rome, than Domitian, quitting the city, hastened to suppress it, leading with him the prætorian guards and the flower of the troops quartered in Italy, all the senators, and the greater part of the Roman knights, even such as had absented themselves from the city and long led a retired life, lest they should be afterwards accused of having abandoned the emperor in time of danger; a charge which might have cost them their lives. But he had not proceeded far on his march, ere he received a certain account of the total overthrow of Antonius, whose army was intirely cut off, and he himself slain by L. Maximus, according to some writers, or, as others will have it, by *Appius Norbanus*ⁱ. Perhaps these four names belonged to one and the same person; at least a letter written by Domitian to L. Appius Maximus has reached our times^j; and one Appius Maximus is said in an ancient inscription to have happily ended the war in Germany^k. While the armies of Antonius and Maximus were engaged on the banks of the Rhine, the river swelled all on a sudden to such a height, that the Germans, who came to the assistance of Antonius, could not cross it; so that his army was intirely cut off. Antonius himself being killed in the battle, his head was cut off and sent to Rome^l. Suetonius tells us, that the very day on which the battle was fought, an eagle, placing herself upon one of the emperor's statues at Rome, covered it with her wings, making a noise which expressed a kind of joy; and that at the same time a report prevailed all over the city, that Antonius was overcome, and utterly defeated; nay, that he was killed, and that his head was brought to Rome, which several persons affirmed they had seen^m. Maximus on this occasion displayed no less prudence after the victory, than he had done courage in gaining it; for upon the death of Antonius, he seized and burnt all his papers, that the emperor might not make use of them to the prejudice of any man. Domitian, however, made a diligent search after his accomplices, torturing in a most cruel manner persons of all ranks and conditions, upon the least suspicion of their having been privy to the conspiracy, or having lived in friendship and intimacy with Antonius. On this occasion great numbers of persons were executed or banished, and their estates seized. Of the many who were accused, two persons only escaped unpunished, viz. a tribune of senatorial dignity, and a centurion, who saved their lives at the expence of their reputation, by making it appear, that they had been pathics, and consequently incapable of engaging in any hazardous enterprize, or having any interest in matters of this nature, either with the general or the army^b. After this revolt, Domitian would not suffer two legions to be quartered in the same camp during the winter; but kept them all separate and at some distance from each other, lest, depending upon their strength, they should form dangerous designs, and raise new disturbances^c. This year another counterfeit Nero appeared in Asia; and having, with a great multitude of followers, struck terror into the neighbouring provinces, retired to the court of the Parthian king, who received him with great marks of distinction, supplied him with a chosen body of troops, and seemed inclined to quarrel on his account with the Romans. But in the end he was prevailed upon by Domitian to deliver him up to the governor of Syria^d. This, without all doubt, is what gave occasion to the poet Silius to celebrate the emperor's triumph, and extol his victories over the Ganges, the Bactrians, and, in short, over all the countries of the east^e.

THE following year, T. Aurelius Fulvius and L. Atratinus being consuls, Domitian took the title of emperor three times; but for what exploits we know not. Some writers, and amongst the rest the learned cardinal Noris, are of opinion, that Domitian this year undertook a second expedition against the Germans^f, the more because the poet Statius supposes the Germans to have been by Domitian twice conquered^g. But these triumphs were in all likelihood only for pretended victories and real overthrows. Thus we have seen him triumph over the Dacians, of whom he had purchased a peace, by engaging to pay them an annual tribute, and over the Marcomanians and Quadians, by whom he had been shamefully put to flight. The next consuls were Domitian, the fifteenth time, and M. Cocceius Nerva, who was afterwards raised to the empire, the second time; for he had been consul in the second year of Vespasian's reign. Some modern writers^h tell us, that having been banished by Domitian the year before, in this he was recalled, and honoured with the consulship. They quote Dion Cassius; but in that writer we find no such account. Philostratus indeed writes, that Nerva, who succeeded Domitian, was banished to Tarentum; but from his words it is manifest, that Nerva did not incur the displeasure of Domitian, till he had finished his second consulshipⁱ. Nothing happened this year, either at Rome or in the provinces, which the few historians, who have written of these times, and whose works have reached us, thought worth recording. The consuls of the following year were M. Ulpius Trajanus, who succeeded Nerva in the empire, and Acilius Glabrio. As Glabrio was a man of great strength and activity, the emperor obliged him to fight in the arena with a huge lion, whom he overcame and killed. The people with loud shouts applauded his victory; which roused the jealousy of the emperor, who thereupon, under colour of some crime or other, banished him, and soon after caused him to be murdered in the place of his exile, as if he had attempted to raise disturbances in the state^k. A modern writer would fain persuade us, that he was put to death for professing the christian religion^l; but the arguments which he makes use of are destitute of all solidity and quite trifling. This year Domitian exhibited a great many shews, both in the amphitheatre and the circus, which are celebrated by the writers of those times, as the most costly and magnificent that Rome had ever beheld. Near the Tiber he caused a vast lake to be dug, in which a sea-fight was represented with such numbers of ships as amounted to complete fleets. In the combats of gladiators, not only men, but women, entered the lists. In the amphitheatre two great combats were exhibited, one of horse, the other of foot: with the former, which was quite new, the populace were so taken, that, forgetting the emperor's cruelties, year Domitian undertook an expedition against the Sarmatians, who had cut in pieces a whole legion with the officer who commanded them^c: but as to the issue of this war, we are quite in the dark: all we know is, that on this occasion he quarrelled likewise with the Marcomanians, and on his return assumed the title of emperor, for the twenty-second and last time. He returned to Rome in the month of January, and, instead of triumphing, contented himself with presenting a crown of laurel to Jupiter Capitolinus^d. Statius and Martial^f make frequent mention of this war, extolling, with their usual flattery, the supposed exploits and pretended victories of their hero.

of the times.

THE following year, L. Nonnius Asprenas and Sextilius Lateranus being consuls, Domitian began to rend the commonwealth with cruelties without all respite, as Tacitus expresses^e, and to put in execution the design, which he had long since formed, of utterly extirpating the senate, and destroying all who were any-ways considerable, either for their birth or virtue. That historian describes the miseries of these calamitous times in general terms thus: The islands were peopled with exiles; the rocks contaminated with murder and blood. But more hideous still were the ravages of cruelty at Rome. It was treasonable to be noble; capital to be rich; criminal to have borne honours, criminal to have declined them; and the reward of worth and virtue was quick and inevitable destruction. Nor were the iniquities of the informers more shocking, than their great and distinguishing rewards; for upon some were bestowed, as the spoils of the state, the pontifical dignities and those of the consulship; others were sent with the character of procurators into the provinces; some were made prime ministers and confidants at home; and, in every station exerting all their terrors and pursuing their hatred, they controuled and confounded all things. Slaves were suborned against their masters, freed-men against their patrons; and such as had no enemies were betrayed and undone by their friends. The age, however, continues our historian, was not so utterly destitute of all virtue, as not to afford commendable examples of friendship and magnanimity. There were mothers who accompanied their banished sons; wives who followed their husbands into exile; in relations were found resolution and succour; in sons-in-law constancy and duty; in slaves such fidelity as baffled all the menaces and horrors of the torture; illustrious men struggling under the greatest distress, supporting it with constancy, and displaying a fortitude in death equal to that of the most celebrated ancients^a. The same writer, after having recounted the death of Agricola; He saw not, adds he, the court of the senate besieged, nor the senate inclosed with armed men, nor the butchery of so many persons of consular dignity, nor the flight and exile of so many women of the prime nobility, all effected in one continued havock. Even Nero with-held his eyes from scenes of cruelty: he indeed ordered murders to be perpetrated, but saw them not. The principal part of our miseries under Domitian was, to be obliged to see him, and be seen by him, at a time when all our sighs and sorrows were watched and marked down for condemnation; when that cruel countenance of his, always covered with a settled red, whence he hardened himself against shame and blushing, served him to observe all the pale horrors at once possessing so many illustrious menⁱ. Thus Tacitus describes in general terms the calamities of those unhappy times. The persons whom he mentions in particular to have been this year put to death by Domitian, are Helvidius, Rusticus, and Senecio. Helvidius was the son of the celebrated Helvidius Priscus, of whom we have spoken above. He had been raised to the consulship, in what year we know not; and was, on account of his extraordinary virtue, abilities, and accomplishments, in great credit with persons of all ranks, though he endeavoured, through fear of giving the emperor umbrage, to shun the applauses of the multitude, and conceal his talents in solitude and retirement. However, he was accused of treason, and it was pretended, that in a poem, by him composed, he had, under the borrowed names of Paris and Œnone, reflected on the emperor for divorcing his wife Domitia. When the accused appeared to plead his cause before the senate, one of the judges, by name Publicius Certus, formerly prætor, seized him with the assistance of some other senators, and, without allowing him to speak in his own defence, dragged him to prison, where he was by the emperor's orders soon after executed^k. As for Certus,^l thirteenth of July, the former to M. Lollius Paulinus Valerius Asiaticus, and the latter ^a to C. Antius Julius Quadratus. This year was remarkable for the death of the celebrated Agricola. His end proved afflicting to his family, says Tacitus, sorrowful to his friends, and matter of trouble even to foreigners and such as knew him not. The common people, during his sickness, were not only frequent in their visits to his house ; but, in all public places, in all private companies, made him the subject of their conversation : nor, when his death was divulged, was there a soul found, who did not lament it as a public misfortune. What heightened the general concern was, a prevailing rumour, that he was dispatched by poison. That there was any proof of this, Tacitus, his son-in-law, will not take upon him to aver. However, he tells us, that, during the whole course of his illness, Domitian caused frequent visits to be made him, indeed much more frequent than princes are wont to make, both by his favourite freedmen and his most trusty physicians ; whether from real concern for his health, or eagerness to learn the probability of his death, our historian will not determine. It is certain, that on the day in which he expired, continual accounts were by messengers, purposely placed, every instant transmitted to the emperor, informing him how fast his end was approaching ; and no one believed he would have been thus eager to hear tidings, had he been to feel any sorrow from hearing them. However, upon the news of his death, he affected to shew in his countenance some grief and concern ; for being now secure against the object of his hatred, he could more easily dissemble his present joy, than lately his fear. It is incredible, how great was the satisfaction which he expressed, when upon reading the last will of Agricola, he found himself left joint heir with his excellent wife and tender daughter. This he took to have been done out of judgment and choice ; so blinded he was by continual flattery, as not to know, that to no prince, ^b but a tyrant, did ever any good father bequeath his fortune. Agricola was born, according to Tacitus, on the thirteenth of June, during the third consulship of the emperor Caligula, and died on the twenty-fourth of August, during the consulship of Collega and Priscus, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, the ninety-third of the Christian æra, and twelfth of Domitian's reign. But as to the time of birth, some mistake has certainly crept into the text of Tacitus, there being but fifty-three years two months, and some days, from the thirteenth of June of the year of the Christian æra 40. when Caligula was the third time consul, to the twenty-fourth of August, in the year 93. Agricola therefore either died in the fifty-fourth year of his age, or was born in the second consulship of Caligula, that is, in the year 38. of the Christian æra. ^c Tacitus delivers the following glorious and affecting character of him : His character. If posterity desires to know his make and person, he was rather genteel and well-proportioned than tall : in his aspect there was nothing terrible ; his looks were extremely gracious and pleasing, a good man you would have readily believed him, and been glad to have found that he was a great man. Tho' he was snatched away, while his age was yet in full vigor ; yet, if his life be measured by his glory, he attained to a great length of days. For every true felicity, namely such as arises from virtue, he had already enjoyed to the full. As he had been likewise distinguished with the consular and triumphal honours, what more could fortune add to his lustre and renown ? Excessive wealth he coveted not ; an honourable share he possessed. ^d As behind him he left surviving his daughter and his wife, he may be even accounted happy, since by dying while his credit was no-ways stained, while his fame was in its full splendor, and his relations and friends in a state of security, he escaped the evils to come and the misery of the latter times. We shall close our account of this great commander, this virtuous citizen, with the tender and affecting words of Tacitus, who thus addresses him after his death : Happy therefore art thou, Agricola, not only as thy life was glorious, but as thy death was seasonable ! Thou didst, as I am informed by those who heard thy last words, accept thy fate cheerfully and with firmness ; as if, for thy part, thou wouldst have saved the credit of the prince. But to myself and thy daughter, besides the grief of having our father snatched from us, it proves a further accession of sorrow, that we had not an opportunity of attending thee in thy sickness, of cherishing thy drooping spirits, and pleasing ourselves with seeing and embracing thee. We should greedily have received thy instructions and precepts, and engraved them for ever in our hearts. ^e This

^a This is our grief, this our unspeakable misfortune, that, by our long absence from thee, thou wast already lost to us four years before thy death. Thou wast, no doubt, abundantly supplied with whatever thy condition required, by thy loving wife, the best of mothers, who attended thee. Yet fewer tears were shed at thy funeral, and at thy last hour somewhat was wanting to satisfy thine eyes. If for the manes of good men any place be allotted; if, as philosophers hold, the spirits of great men perish not with their bodies; pleasing be thy repose! Recal us, thy family, from this our weakness in bewailing thee, to the contemplation of thy virtues, for which it were unjust to lament or to mourn. Let us rather adorn thy memory with immortal praises, and by following, as far as our weakness will allow, and ^b adopting thy excellencies. This is true honour, this the duty incumbent upon every near relation. Thus I would have thy daughter and wife to reverence the memory of a father and husband, and to be ever ruminating upon all his doings and sayings; and rather to adore the image of his mind, than that of his person. Not that I mean to condemn the use of statues in marble or brass; but as the persons of men are frail and perishing, so are likewise the images of them: the form of the mind is eternal, and cannot be represented or preserved by art or materials foreign to its nature, nor otherwise but by a conformity of manners. What we loved in Agricola, what we admired, remains, and will for ever remain, imprinted in the minds of men, and conveyed through a continual succession of ages by the voice of fame to the latest posterity. Many of the ancients lie buried in an obscure and inglorious oblivion; but Agricola shall live recommended to future ages, and his fame continue for ever². Thus far Tacitus, who wrote the life of Agricola in the reign of the emperor Trajan, without which, and a short passage in Dion Cassius, the memory and exploits of one of the greatest commanders and best citizens, Rome ever bred, would have been buried in oblivion. Tacitus, as he himself informs us, had, together with his wife, been four years absent from Rome when his father-in-law died; but where, or on what account, we are no-where told. Some writers, without the least foundation, suppose him to have been banished by Domitian; but Lipsius is of opinion, that he retired of his own accord from the city, not being able, as he was ^d a man of a virtuous and humane spirit, to behold the sufferings of the Romans under so cruel and bloody a tyrant³.

THE same year, Bebius Massa, an infamous accuser, was himself accused of ex- Bebius Massa, tortion by the Bithynians, whom he had plundered and oppressed, in a most tyran- a noted accunical manner, while he governed that province. The senate appointed Pliny the ser, arraigned, younger and Herennius Senecio, originally a Bithynian and formerly quæstor in the same province, to plead the cause of the Bithynians; which they did so effectually, that Bebius was condemned by the senate, and the consuls were ordered to seize his estate and effects. But as they, taken up with more pressing affairs, put off from day to day the execution of the judgment, Senecio, fearing the delinquent might in the mean time privately convey away part of his goods, resolved to apply to them ^e for an immediate execution of the sentence, and begged Pliny to act therein in concert with him. Pliny at first declined engaging in an affair which he thought foreign to the profession of a pleader; but, Senecio continuing obstinate in his resolution, he at length consented to solicit jointly with him the consuls to seize without delay the effects of Bebius, that reparation might thence be made of the losses sustained by the Bithynians. Accordingly they went together to the consuls, where they found Bebius, who, upon hearing their suit, was so provoked against Senecio, that he summoned him before the emperor, as guilty of treason. The very name of treason struck the whole assembly with terror. But Pliny, without betraying the ^f least fear, addressing Bebius, told him, he was sorry he did not charge him with The constancy
the same crime, since by his not accusing him, as well as Senecio, of treason, men and firmness might believe that he had not acted against him with equal zeal, and that he should of Pliny.
be grieved if he knew that any one entertained of him so bad an opinion. This firmness and intrepidity in Pliny was by all highly applauded; and Nerva, who was at that time in exile at Tarentum, congratulated him by letters upon his steady conduct. Pliny himself wrote to Tacitus, acquainting him with what had passed, and begging him to insert it in his history, which he looked upon as a work that would never die; but the letter of Pliny has outlived that part of Tacitus's history^b. This year

- a Certus, he was named for the consulship, which he seems to have discharged four years after, that is, in the second year of Nerva's reign, when Pliny demanded leave of the senate to arraign him as a criminal, in order to clear his friend Helvidius, and make his innocence appear, at least after his death, since no one had been allowed to speak in his favour while living. The senate put a stop to all prosecutions of this nature, but yet degraded Certus, and deprived him of the consular dignity; whence he died a few days after in great agonies and terror, imagining, as he himself owned, that Pliny pursued him with a drawn sword. Pliny published the speech which he pronounced against him in the senate; but it has been long since lost¹.
- b Herennius Senecio was, as we have related above, accused of treason by Bæbius Massa, whom he had accused of extortion at the suit of the Bithynians. The charge alledged against him was, that he had written the life of Helvidius Priscus, at the request of Fannia his widow, and made use of the memoirs with which she had furnished him. Tho' Senecio had with all possible care avoided such expressions as might seem in the least to reflect on the emperor, yet, because he could not help commending a man whom the prince had condemned, Domitian caused him to be sentenced to death, and the sentence to be without delay put in execution. Fannia owned of her own accord, that she had persuaded Senecio to write the life of her husband, and supplied him with materials for it. For this crime she was, by a decree of the senate, confined to a desert island, whither she carried with her, as her only comfort, the history of her husband's actions, which had been the cause of her banishment, tho' it was declared capital to read or keep it. Arria, her mother, the widow of the famous Pæ- tus Thrasea, was likewise banished; but they were both called home in the beginning of the reign of Nerva^m. The emperor, as Tacitus informs usⁿ, did not content himself with condemning Senecio for celebrating the praises of Helvidius Priscus, and Arulenus Rusticus, of whom anon, for those of Pætus Thrasea; but ordered the magistrates to commit their books to the flames, imagining, that in the same fire he should abolish the voice and utterance of the Roman people, with the liberty of the senate, and all the ideas and memory of mankind. The third person, mentioned by Tacitus to have been sacrificed by Domitian this year, was Lucius Junius Arulenus Rusticus. He professed the philosophy of the Stoics, was tribune of the people when Pætus Thrasea was condemned by a decree of the senate in the reign of Nero, and as such would have interposed against it, had not Thrasea himself restrained him^o. He was prætor in the short reign of Vitellius, by whom he was sent to Petilius Cerealis, one of Vespasian's commanders, to mediate an accommodation. On which occasion he was wounded by the soldiery, who sternly rejected all terms of peace; and, notwithstanding the character of an ambassador, altogether sacred, would have been massacred, had it not been for the protection of a guard appointed by Cerealis^p. The crime laid to his charge by Domitian was, his having, in a book published by him, commended Thrasea, and likewise Helvidius Priscus, as men of honour and integrity. He was accused by one Marcus Regulus, who even published a book filled with most bitter invectives against him^q. Pliny seems to have entertained a mighty opinion of his accomplishments and integrity^r, as does likewise Plutarch, who tells us, that he was by Domitian's orders put to death for no crime of his own, but merely to remove from the emperor's sight one who, with his exemplary life, seemed to reproach him with his debaucheries. That writer adds, that while he himself was one day declaiming in public, a soldier, entering the assembly, presented to Rusticus, who was hearkening to him with great attention, a letter from the emperor. Hereupon he immediately interrupted his discourse; but Rusticus, putting the letter, without even opening it, into his bosom, desired him to pursue his speech, and would not open the letter till Plutarch had done^s. Dion Cassius writes, that Domitian, not long before he was killed, dreamt, that Rusticus was pursuing him with a drawn sword^t. Junius Mauricus, the brother of Rusticus, who is highly commended by Pliny^u, was banished, as was likewise Pomponia Gracilla, the wife of Rusticus; but they were both recalled by the emperor Nerva^w. At the same time was executed by the emperor's orders one Hermogenes of Tarsus, being a cruelties, they bestowed upon him higher encomiums, than they had ever given either to Vespasian or Titus. During the sea-fight, a violent shower fell; but nevertheless the emperor continued till the fight was ended, often changing his cloaths; and would not suffer any of the spectators to retire; whence, as the shower lasted some hours, many were seized with distempers, and some even died. Dion Cassius describes at length an entertainment, to which the emperor invited the principal men among the senators and knights; an entertainment, says that writer, which more than any thing else displays his tyrannical temper, and how wantonly he abused his power. At the entrance of the palace, the guests were received with great ceremony, and conducted to a spacious hall hung round with black, and illuminated with a few melancholy lamps, which were only sufficient to discover the horror of the place, and the several coffins, upon which were written in capitals the names of the several senators and knights invited. Great was their fright and consternation at the sight of so dismal a scene; for the emperor had often publicly declared, that he could not think himself safe so long as one senator was left alive, and that amongst the knights there were few whom he did not look upon as his enemies. After they had long waited, expecting every moment their last doom, the doors were at length all on a sudden burst open, when a great number of naked persons, having their bodies all over dyed black, entered the hall, with drawn swords in one hand, and flaming torches in the other. The guests, at this dreadful appearance, giving themselves up for lost, already felt all the agonies of death; but those whom they looked upon as their executioners, having for some time danced round them, set at once open the doors, and acquainted them, that the emperor gave the company leave to withdraw. Thus did Domitian insult these two illustrious orders, shewing, says Dion Cassius, how little he feared them, and at the same time with how much reason they might dread his resentment, since it was in his power to cut them all off, without exposing himself to the least danger^p.

THE next consuls were Domitian, the sixteenth time, and Q. Volusius Saturninus. This year, the emperor observing a vast plenty of wine and as great a scarcity of corn, concluded from thence, that the husbandmen neglected the tillage of the earth to attend the cultivating of their vines. To prevent therefore this inconvenience for the future, he published an edict, forbidding any more vines to be planted in Italy, and commanding half the vines in the provinces to be immediately rooted up. Hereupon the cities of Asia sent a solemn embassy to him, begging he would suspend the execution of the edict with respect to their lands, since their chief revenues accrued from wine, and the neighbouring provinces abounded with corn. At the head of this embassy was Scopelianus, professor of eloquence at Smyrna, who, insinuating himself with wonderful address into the emperor's favour, prevailed upon him, if Philostratus is to be credited^q, to repeal the edict, and allow all nations subject to Rome full liberty of planting and cultivating what vines they pleased. Suetonius tells us, that to this he was chiefly prompted by the general discontent, which his edict produced amongst persons of all ranks, both in the city and the provinces, where many lampoons were published, one among the rest, importing, that, in spite of all edicts, wine would not be wanting for the sacrificing of Cæsar^r. But after all, Eutropius^s and Vopiscus^t speak of this edict as continuing in full force in most provinces of the empire, till the reign of the emperor Probus, that is, for the space of almost two hundred years. From several medals it appears, that the city of Chalcis in Syria began its æra in the autumn of this year, the 92d after the birth of Christ, according to the common method of computing, and the eleventh of Domitian's reign; whence some learned chronologers conclude, that this small kingdom, formerly possessed by the brother, and afterwards by the son, of Agrippa, the last king of the Jews, was then by Domitian united to the empire^u. It was in all likelihood on this account, that the city of Chalcis took the name of Flavia, which we suppose to have happened after the death of Aristobulus, who reigned at Chalcis in the year 72. of the Christian æra^w.

His edict against planting of vines.

THE following year, Pompeius Collega and D. Priscus were consuls. Pliny names the former among the consulars who were still living in the reign of Trajan^x. From an ancient inscription it appears, that both consuls resigned the fasces on the thirteenth being accused of speaking disrespectfully of the emperor, under borrowed names, in a history which he composed: all those, who were concerned in transcribing or selling it, were condemned to be crucified^a. The same year, and chiefly out of hatred to Rusticus, who, as we have hinted above, professed the philosophy of the Stoics, all philosophers were, by a decree of the senate, driven out of Rome, and every laudable science expelled Italy, that nothing which was worthy and honest, says Tacitus, might any-where be seen^y. Epietetus, the famous Stoic, was, in virtue of this decree, obliged to abandon the city^z. Lucius Telestinus, who had been consul in the reign of Nero, chose rather to retire from his native country, as a philosopher, than to maintain his dignity there by renouncing that profession^a. Pliny bestows mighty encomiums upon the philosopher Artemidorus, who, on this occasion, left Rome. He had contracted great debts, but for laudable purposes, says Pliny, who supplied him with money to discharge them, when his other friends, tho' possessed of great wealth, abandoned him in his distress. The philosopher would afterwards have reimbursed Pliny; but he generously presented him with the sum which was owing to him^b. Pliny went frequently to visit him in the place of his retirement; by which means he exposed himself to no small danger, his actions and conduct being the more narrowly observed, as he was at that time prætor. He was himself well apprised, that Domitian suspected him, as he had lived in great intimacy with Senecio, Helvidius, and Rusticus. And truly, had not Domitian been seasonably cut off, Pliny would have undergone the same doom which most of his friends had suffered: for, after the emperor's death, a memorial was found among his papers, presented to him against Pliny by the celebrated informer Metius Carus^c. Some philosophers, dreading the resentment of the emperor, renounced their profession, and increased the herd of informers. Some, abandoning Italy, fled to the most western coasts of Gaul; and others to the deserts of Libya and Scythia. Dion Chrysostomus, a celebrated sophist, took shelter in the country of the Getæ, where he earned a livelihood by tilling the ground, and carrying water, having always with him, to comfort him in his distress, a treatise of Plato and an oration of Demosthenes^d. In the height of his persecution, Apollonius Tyaneus came to Rome, if Philostratus is to be credited^e, and was there received with great marks of esteem and veneration by Caspius Ælianus, commander of the prætorian guards. He had not been long in the city, ere he contracted a strict friendship with Nerva, Rufus, and Salvidienus Orfitus, whom he solicited to conspire against Domitian, and to deliver the world from so bloody a tyrant. The author of his life tells us, that the conspiracy was actually formed; but that the conspirators putting off, for want of courage, the execution of it, the emperor, in the mean time, suspecting their design, accused them of treason before the senate: the charge was not proved; but nevertheless Rufus and Orfitus were confined to the islands, and Nerva to the city of Tarentum^f. Orfitus was soon after put to death^g in the place of his exile. Of Rufus we find no farther mention made by the writers of those times. As for Nerva, if he was banished, as Philostratus writes, he returned home the same, or the following, year; for he was at Rome, as is plain from Dion Cassius^h, when Domitian was murdered: nay, that writer takes no notice of the banishment of Nerva, which makes us suspect the truth of what Philostratus writes, who is often guilty of very considerable mistakes. Sulpicia, a Roman lady of great distinction, wrote a poem upon the expulsion of the philosophers, wherein she inveighs with great bitterness against Domitian, and even threatens him with death. She is highly commended by Martial for the purity of her manners and the elegance of her compositionⁱ; for she published several other pieces, but was not, as she seems to boast, the first Roman of her sex known to the muses^k.

The following year, Domitian entered upon his seventeenth and last consulship, having for his colleague Flavius Clemens, of whom we shall speak anon. This consulate of Domitian is the subject of one of the poet Statius's poems^l. In the beginning of the year was discovered a dangerous conspiracy against the emperor; at the head of which was Juvenius Celsus, whom some writers take to be the celebrated civilian Publius Jubenius Celsus, who was prætor in the reign of Trajan and consul in a in that of Adrian, and is highly commended by Pliny^m. Be that as it will, Celsus, finding himself betrayed, begged and obtained a private audience of the emperor; in which throwing himself at his feet, and accosting him as a deity with the titles of Lord and of God, he protested, that as to himself, he was quite innocent of the crime laid to his charge; but would, provided he was allowed a short respite, discover all those who were concerned in the plot, and produce undeniable proofs of their guilt. Hereupon the emperor dismissed him untouched; but Celsus, putting off, under various pretences, from time to time, the promised discovery, escaped by the death of Domitian, which happened the following year, the danger that threatened himⁿ. Dion Cassius observes, that Domitian about this time caused the road to be paved leading from Sinuessa to Puteoli^o; and Statius speaks of another road by him repaired at a vast expence, that, as we conjecture from the poet's words, which led from Rome to Baiæ^p. This year, the fourteenth of Domitian's reign and 95th of the Christian æra, is remarkable for the cruel persecution, which was by the bloody tyrant raised against the Christians, of whom infinite numbers were put to death both at Rome and in the provinces, the emperor having dispatched letters and edicts into the most remote provinces of the empire, commanding all those who professed that religion to be treated as declared enemies to the state^q. This persecution is taken notice of by Suetonius, who tells us, that he obliged those who lived at Rome after the manner of the Jews, to pay the same taxes as if they were really Jews, and treated them with no less rigor and severity^r. That Suetonius meant the Christians, is evident; for all the pagan historians, whether Greek or Latin, constantly speak of them as resembling the Jews in their manners, tho' not originally of that nation. Among the many illustrious persons, who suffered for so good a cause, we may deservedly reckon the emperor's own relations; viz. Flavius Clemens, his cousin german and colleague in the consulship, and the two Flavia Domitilla, the one the wife, the other the niece, of Flavius Clemens. He was the son of Flavius Sabinus, the brother of Vespasian, who was killed by the soldiers of Vitellius, while he was governor of Rome, as we have related above. His eldest son, named likewise Flavius Sabinus, was consul with Domitian in the first year of his reign, and soon after, by the emperor's orders, put to death. Flavius Clemens married, in compliance with the emperor's desire, Flavia Domitilla, who was nearly related to Domitian, but not his sister, as Philostratus writes^s; Domitilla, his only sister, being dead before Vespasian was raised to the empire^t. Flavia Domitilla was, as appears pretty plain for Dion Cassius^u and Quintilian^v, the daughter of Domitilla, and the niece of Domitian. By her Clemens had two sons, to whom Domitian, as he had no issue of his own, resolved to leave the empire; and therefore changed their names, causing one of them to be called Vespasian, and the other Domitian. Quintilian^x tells us, that he was charged with the care of instructing and educating the two grandsons of the emperor's sister; which is a convincing proof, that Flavia Domitilla, the wife of Clemens, was daughter to Domitilla the emperor's sister; for these two youths were, without all doubt, the sons of Clemens by Flavia Domitilla^z. Clemens was this year consul; but had scarce resigned the fasces, when he was, upon a slight and groundless suspicion, says Suetonius^y, cut off by the emperor's orders. Dion Cassius tells us, that he was accused of impiety or atheism; a crime, says that writer, for which many others were at that time condemned, who had adopted the manners of the Jews^z. Thus the Christians are constantly described by the Pagan writers, as is evident from Origen and other Christian writers of the primitive times^a. As for the crime of impiety or atheism, this was one of the charges commonly brought against the Christians, on account of their refusing to pay any worship to the pretended deities of the gentiles^b. Suetonius, speaking of Flavius Clemens, says, he was no-ways to be feared, in respect of his sloth and inactivity; which was another charge, as Tertullian observes^c, brought against the Christians, on account of the retired life they led, and their despising the dignities, which by others were so ambitiously coveted. It is therefore, in our opinion, pretty plain, that the only crime alledged against Flavius Clemens was, his professing the Christian religion;

religion; and consequently, that he ought to be ranked among those illustrious heroes, who have sealed their faith with their blood. A modern writer of great note supposes St. Clement, who at this time was bishop of Rome, to have been of the imperial family^d; but therein confounds him, as we conjecture, with Clement the consul, ascribing to the former what he must have read of the latter. Flavia Domitilla, wife to Flavius Clemens, was likewise arraigned of impiety; and, besides, refused to comply with the orders of the emperor, commanding her to marry another person a few days after the death of her husband^e. She was therefore banished to the island of Pandataria, in the bay of Puteoli, now known by the name of Santa Maria. Eusebius mentions another Flavia Domitilla, confined at the same time and for the same cause, to the island of Pontia, near that of Pandataria; and supposes her to have been the daughter of Clemens's sister^f. Scaliger takes this Domitilla to be the same with the wife of Flavius Clemens, not aware that Eusebius follows therein and quotes a Roman historian, by name Brutius, who flourished in those times, and whom some writers take to be Præfens, named also Brutius, to whom one of Pliny's letters is inscribed^g. To these two illustrious women Tacitus perhaps alluded, when he wrote, that Domitian, towards the latter end of his reign, drove into exile several ladies of the prime nobility^h. St. Jerom mentions Domitilla in particular, whom he honours with the title of saint, and tells us, that she suffered a long martyrdom in the island of Pontia, to which she was confined by Domitian for professing the Christian religion; As to Clemens's two sons, to whom Domitian designed, as we have observed above, to bequeath the empire, we find no farther mention made of them by the ancient historians; but we suppose, that if they were not put to death by Domitian, the excellent princes Nerva and Trajan, who were enemies to all bloodshed and slaughter, suffered them to live unmolested. Gruter proves from an ancient inscription, that Clemens had likewise a daughter, named Flavia Domitilla, who was married to one T. Flavius Onesimus^k; but no historian speaks either of her or her husband. Trebellius Pollio, in his history of the thirty tyrants, under the emperor Gallienus, mentions a celebrated commander, by name Domitian, descended from Flavius Clemens and the niece of the emperor Domitian^l; whence it is plain, that the children of Clemens had issue: During this persecution, St. John was confined to the island of Patmos in the Archipelago, where he wrote the Apocalypse; and a great many illustrious champions of the Christian faith, mentioned by the ecclesiastic writers, suffered for the same glorious cause death or banishment, with a constancy and firmness worthy of the religion which they professed. Lactantius will have this cruel persecution to have ended with Domitian's life, and not before; for then all his acts were annulled by the senate, and consequently the edicts which he had enacted against the Christians^m. But two of the most ancient ecclesiastic writers, viz. Hegeſippus, quoted by *Eusebius*ⁿ, and Tertullian^o, tell us in express terms, that Domitian, before his death, put a stop to the persecution which he had raised against the church, and recalled all those whom he had banished on the score of their religion. This same year, Domitian caused Epaphroditus, formerly freed-man and secretary to Nero, to be put to death for having aided that prince in dispatching himself, when he ought to have defended him. By this instance of severity he hoped to deter his own freed-men from any attempts upon his life; and this, as Dion Cassius observes, was the only motive which prompted him to exert such rigor against one whom he had admitted to his confidence, and honoured with the same employment which he had enjoyed under Nero^p. This is, as is commonly believed, the Epaphroditus, to whom Josephus inscribed, at least three years before, his antiquities; a plain proof, that he was then in great favour with the emperor.

THE next consuls were Caius Fabius Valens and Caius Antistius Vetus, of whom the former was ninety years old when he entered upon his consulship, and seems to have died before it expired^q. Many prodigies are said to have happened this year, at Rome and in the provinces. The city was for eight months together almost daily alarmed with dreadful claps of thunder, and flashes of lightning: the capitol, the temple

- a temple of the Flavian family, and the emperor's own chamber were thunder-struck; the inscription upon one of the emperor's triumphal statues was beaten off, and, by the violence of the storm, carried into a neighbouring monument; the tree, which had been thrown down in Vespasian's time, as we have related above, and rose up again, fell down the second time; the oracle at Præneste, which had always returned favourable answers, and promised him good fortune and success at the beginning of each year, presaged nothing now but calamities and slaughter; Domitian himself dreamt, that Minerva, to whom, as his tutelar deity, he paid a particular worship, and whose feast he annually celebrated on the Alban mount, had withdrawn herself from the chapel which he had consecrated to her, telling him, that Jupiter had disarmed her, and that she could protect him no longer. But nothing terrified him so much as the answer of an astrologer, by name Ascletarion, and what ensued thereupon; for he being accused of having foretold the death of the emperor, and not denying the charge, Domitian asked him, Whether he knew what would be his own doom? The astrologer answered, He was to be, and that in a short time he should be, devoured by dogs. Hereupon the emperor, to convince the world of the falsehood of his art, ordered him to be immediately put to death, and his body to be burnt. The first part of the sentence was put in execution; but before the body was half consumed by the flames, it was blown down, together with the funeral pile, by a violent storm, and devoured, pursuant to the prediction, by the dogs^a. Another astrologer, by name Larginus Proculus, foretold publicly in Germany, that the eighteenth of September would prove the last day of Domitian's life. Hereupon he was apprehended, by the governor of the province and sent to the emperor, in whose presence he maintained the truth of his prediction, and was on that account condemned to be executed on the nineteenth of the aforesaid month; but Domitian being murdered the day before, as Proculus had foretold, he was not only dismissed unhurt, but presented by Nerva with a large sum, and ever after had in great esteem^r. No wonder, therefore, that Domitian, terrified with these predictions and prodigies, and moreover alarmed by his own guilty conscience, lived in continual disquiet: there was no accident so trivial, no person so contemptible, as not to dismay him, and put him upon sanguinary precautions. Of the eminent persons, either of the senatorial or equestrian order, he was under perpetual apprehensions, and making daily victims: their wealth and race, their poverty, names, and quality, frightened him; he feared friends and enemies; those who advised him in council, those who diverted him at his leisure hours, his most intimate friends and confidants, were all martyrs to his jealousy and fury: he dreaded all men and every thing; several of his freed-men he put to death, deposed the commander of the prætorian guards, discharged great numbers of officers, &c. But the more he made others suffer, the faster he multiplied his own torments. At length he would not suffer any criminal, however loaded with chains, to plead before him, till he had first secured their chains in his hands^s. A young child, with whom he used to divert himself, having one day, while the emperor was asleep, taken a paper from under his head to play with it, the empress happening to meet him, desired to see it; when, to her great surprise, she found it contained the names of several illustrious persons destined to slaughter, and her own name at the head of them, with those of Norbanus, of Petronius Secundus, captains of the prætorian guards, and of Parthenius, the emperor's chamberlain. To these Domitia immediately communicated the whole, and by them a resolution was, without further deliberation, taken to dispatch the tyrant, before he had time to put his bloody design in execution^t. Of this Suetonius takes no notice; but nevertheless tells us, that Domitian perished by a conspiracy of his friends and freed-men, not without the privy of his wife^u. The death of Clemens hastened, according to the same writer, his own ruin^v, either because the cruelty he exercised towards those of his own family occasioned a general dread and despair, or because it provoked Stephanus, who was freed-man and procurator to Domitilla, the wife of Clemens, and besides was at that time accused of having embezzled part of her effects^x. Be that as it will, Stephanus not only joined the conspirators; but, as he was a man of great strength, took upon him to dispatch the tyrant^y. Domitian had, if Suetonius is to be credited, long before an apprehension, not only of the year and day, but of the hour and manner of his death

 One night his father Vespasian, who gave great credit to the predictions of astrologers, and retained one of them, by name Seleucus, constantly about him; observing that Domitian at supper abstained from mushrooms, derided him as one ignorant of his own fate, since he seemed to be under greater apprehension of poison, than of the sword. This Domitian ever after remembered, and was thence strangely affected by ^b
His jealousy. the bare sight of a drawn sword or any other weapon. From this diffidence and fear it was, that, however ambitious, he refused the new and extraordinary honour that was decreed for him, namely, that as often as he was consul, a certain number of Roman knights, chosen by lot, should walk before him amongst his lictors in their robes, with lances in their hands. When the time which he chiefly dreaded and suspected drew near, his jealousy increased to such a degree, that he caused the gallery, in which he usually walked, to be set round with a certain stone called phengites, by which images were reflected as in a looking-glass; so that he could discover what ^c

The day before he was murdered, he ordered some choice fruit, which were presented to him, to be reserved against the next day, adding, If it be my fortune to use them: then turning to those about him, To morrow, said he, the moon will appear bloody in Aquarius, and something will happen which will be much talked of. About midnight he was so terrified, that he leaped out of his bed. However, he went the next morning to the forum to administer justice, and returned to the palace an hour before mid-day, the time which he chiefly dreaded. Having therefore asked, what time of the day it was, one of the conspirators, on purpose to deceive him, told him, it was noon. Whereupon overjoyed, as if he had happily escaped all danger, he thought of nothing but abandoning himself to mirth and jollity. As he was going to bathe, according to the Roman fashion, before dinner, Parthenius, his chief chamberlain, accosting him, told him, he had something of great importance to impart to him, and such as could not be deferred. Hereupon the emperor, ordering all his attendants to withdraw, retired to his chamber, where Parthenius introduced Stephanus to him, who, the better to disguise his design, had appeared for some days with his left arm wrapt up and in a sling, as if he had received some hurt. He presented to Domitian a memorial, wherein he pretended to discover a dangerous conspiracy formed by his cousin Flavius Clemens, whom he averred to be ^d
He is wounded by Stephanus. still alive, and by several others, whose names were all set down, with the places of their abode. While the emperor was reading the memorial with great attention, Stephanus drawing suddenly a dagger, which he kept concealed, struck it into his belly. The emperor, finding himself wounded, called to a boy, who happened to be in the room, to reach him a dagger which lay under his pillow, and to run for assistance; but under his pillow was found only a scabbard, and the doors were all locked and well secured. Domitian, notwithstanding his wound, struggled some time with Stephanus, and even threw him with great violence to the ground, striving to wrest the dagger out of his hand, and with his fingers, tho' all cut and mangled, to thrust out his eyes. At length Parthenius, who had withdrawn when Stephanus came in, fearing some of the guards might, in the mean time, hearing the noise, come to his relief, opened the door of the chamber; and falling upon the emperor with Claudianus, Maximus, Satureius, and a celebrated gladiator, dispatched him with many wounds. ^e
And dispatched by him, and the other conspirators. Many, who were not privy to the conspiracy, alarmed at the noise, hastened to the emperor's apartment; and, finding him wallowing in his blood, killed the brave Stephanus. The other conspirators made their escape as soon as the murder was perpetrated. Thus died Domitian, notwithstanding all his precautions and his pretended divinity, after having lived forty-four years, ten months, and twenty-six days, and reigned fifteen years and five days. For his death the common people shewed neither ^f

The troops quartered in the country of the Getæ, were ready to revolt when they understood he had been assassinated; but the philosopher Dion Chrysostomus, who had retired to that province, as we have related above, checked their fury, by a speech which he made to the mutinous legion upon the guilt of tyrants, and punishments due to such as abuse their power, a power, to the oppression of the people committed to their care^b. But, on the contrary, the senate could not disguise their joy: they assembled in haste, and after having, in the most opprobrious manner imaginable, reviled his memory, they commanded ladders to be immediately brought, in order to pull down, and tear to pieces all his images. An infinite number of statues of gold and silver, erected to him in the different quarters of the city, were by their orders broken and melted down; his triumphal arches were overturned, and his name declared infamous; nay, they enacted a decree, commanding all inscriptions, in which he was mentioned, to be razed, his name to be struck out of the consular tables, his body to be thrown into the Tiber, and his memory to be abolished for ever^c. Several ancient inscriptions are still to be seen, in which the name of Domitian is razed^d. All his acts were annulled, and those whom he had banished recalled. A woman, by name Phyllis, who had been charged with the care of his education, while he was yet an infant, caused his body to be privately conveyed upon a bier, as that of a person of the meanest condition, to a country-house she had at a small distance from the city; where she burnt it, and carrying the ashes, without being observed, to the temple which he had built for the Flavian family, mixed them with those of Julia the daughter of Titus, whom she had likewise brought up. Domitian was the last emperor of the Flavian family, and likewise the last of those princes, who are commonly styled the twelve Cæsars.

c As the celebrated philosopher Apollonius Tyaneus acted a chief part in the late revolutions of the Roman empire, and made at this time a great figure in the world, a succinct account of his life and actions cannot be looked upon as foreign to the present subject, nor be ill received by our readers. Of the other writers who flourished under Domitian, we shall speak in our notes (F). Apollonius was born three or four years before

(F) These were Quintilian, Valerius Flaccus, Martial, Statius, Juvenal, Silius, &c. Marcus Fabius Quintilianus was, according to St. Jerom and Ausonius, a native of Calagorina, now Calaborra, in Old Castile. What profession his father followed, we find no-where recorded; for all we know of him is, that he wrote some declamations, which are quoted by his son (15). Our Quintilian studied rhetoric under Domitius Afer, who was stricken in years when Quintilian was very young (16), and died, as is plain from Tacitus (17), in the fifth year of Nero's reign. Hence it is manifest, that Quintilian did not come first to Rome with the emperor Galba, as St. Jerom supposes (18); neither can we conclude, as some have done (19), from his having studied at Rome while he was very young, that he was born there. He pleaded several causes at Rome before queen Berenice (20), and consequently under Vespasian; for in his reign Berenice came to Rome, and was by Titus sent back to her own country, in the very beginning of his reign. Vespasian having settled a salary upon the professors of eloquence, to be paid yearly out of the exchequer, Quintilian was the first who opened a free school at Rome. He discharged that important office with great reputation, and to the satisfaction of all, for the space of twenty years; during which time he acquired great wealth, what by his salary, what by the presents made him by the parents of the children whom he instructed (21). Both Juvenal and Martial speak of him as an able orator; and Pliny the younger, who was one of his disciples, seems to have entertained a high opinion of him. After he had taught publicly for twenty years, he resigned his charge, and writ a book about the causes of the decay of eloquence (22). Whether this be the dialogue which is commonly ascribed to Tacitus, we will not take upon us to determine, there being, as to this particular, great disagreement amongst authors. When Quintilian had finished this treatise, he was prevailed upon by his friends to undertake a more laborious work, viz. his twelve books of rhetoric, which will be ever admired by all persons of taste and judgment. This performance cost him two years labour, and it was much against his will that he published it before he had kept it by him for some time, in order to examine it as the work of another. It is inscribed to one Marcellus Victorius, and filled with commendations of Domitian, altogether unworthy of a man of Quintilian's character (23). While he was employed in composing this work, Domitian charged him with the education of his sister's grandsons, as we related above (24). He was afterwards honoured with the consular ornaments, at the recommendation of Flavius Clemens, then in great favour with the emperor (25). Ausonius seems to insinuate, that, after having acquired considerable wealth at Rome, he was, by what misfortune we know not, reduced to earn a livelihood by teaching rhetoric at Besançon and Lions. Perhaps upon the death of Clemens, who was his chief patron, he was banished Rome (26). Whether it was to him, or to another of the same name, that Pliny the younger presented, in a most genteel and obliging manner, a considerable sum, on occasion of the marriage of his daughter with Nonius Celer, has by some writers been questioned (27). Sidonius Apollinaris bestows high encomiums upon Quintilian, and equals him to the most elegant writers of antiquity (28). As for the declamations which pass under the name of Quintilian, and are frequently mentioned by the ancients, it is evident, they were not written by him, but either ther by his father, or, as a modern author conjectures (28), by his grandfather, since Seneca the elder, the father of Seneca the philosopher, who flourished in the reign of Augustus, speaks of the author of these declamations as a person more ancient than himself (29). This is the opinion of M. Pitheu concerning the declamations ascribed to our Quintilian, which he published in 1580. and inscribed to the celebrated Thuanus. Besides these, there are nineteen declamations more, commonly thought to have been written by Quintilian ; but by Vossius ascribed to Posthumus the younger, who, as we shall relate in the sequel of this history, assumed the name of Cæsar, and that of Augustus in Gaul, about the year 260 (30).

C. Valerius Flaccus Setinus Balbus was a native of Padua, as is evident from Martial (31), and not of Setia in Campania, as some have conjectured from the name of Setinus. He wrote an epic poem on the voyage of the Argonauts, divided into eight books, which he began in the reign of Vespasian, to whom it is inscribed, and continued under Domitian ; for he was, according to Vossius, prevented by death from putting the last hand to it (32). He died while Quintilian was writing his books of rhetoric, that is, in the latter end of Domitian's reign. Quintilian (33) and Martial (34) commend his performance ; but the most able critics amongst the modern writers speak of it with the utmost contempt, discover in it a great many material faults, and few, if any, beauties (35).

The poet M. Valerius Martialis, so famous for his epigrams, was a native of Bilbilis, (36), which stood at a small distance from the present city of Calataiud in the kingdom of Arragon (37). He was born in the reign of Claudius, came to Rome in that of Nero, being then twenty years old, and lived there thirty years (38), favoured by the emperors, especially by Domitian, whom on all occasions he flatters in a most shameful manner. Upon that prince's death he left the city, and retired to his own country ; where after three years, which he passed without writing, he was prevailed upon by Terentius Priscus to compose his twelfth book, in which he speaks of the emperors Nerva and Trajan (39). Pliny, in whose commendation he had written an epigram, had a particular kindness and esteem for him ; whence he presented him, upon his departure from Rome, with a sum of money to defray the expences of his journey (40). As to his writings, the emperor Lucius Verus used to call him his Virgil (41) ; but few, either before or since that prince's time, seem to have entertained such a mighty opinion of his compositions. Scaliger approves of what he himself wrote of his epigrams viz. that some of them were good, some indifferent, and some bad. Most critics have found fault with his thoughts, his style, and, above all, with his puns, which are often very low, and with his pretended witticisms (42). Besides, some of his epigrams are, for their lewdness, infamous, perhaps beyond any thing written in the Latin tongue. His epigrams are comprised in fourteen books ; besides which, that de spectaculis is commonly ascribed to him, tho' Vossius takes it to be a collection of verses written partly by Martial, and partly by other poets of that time, upon the shews which Titus exhibited in the year eighty of the christian æra (43). Martial died, as we conjecture from Pliny's letters, about the end of the first century. He is by Lampridius (44) surnamed Cocus, perhaps because his father, or he himself in his youth, followed that mean profession.

Statius flourished at the same time ; but is never mentioned by Martial, which some ascribe to jealousy, Statius being highly esteemed by Domitian, on account of his making, with extraordinary ease, extemporary verses upon any subject whatever ; which Martial durst not attempt. He wrote two epic poems, viz. the Thebais, comprised in twelve books, and the Achilleis, which consists only of two, the poet being prevented by death from accomplishing that work (45). They are both inscribed to Domitian. Besides these two poems, he wrote several other pieces upon various occasions, which have likewise reached us, under the title of Sylvæ, and are comprehended in five books. His compositions were mightily esteemed at Rome in his own time, and are still admired by the young poets ; nay, Julius Scaliger is of opinion, that of all the ancient poets he comes nearest to the inimitable Virgil. But better judges look upon Statius rather as a bad historian than a good poet, and despise his bombast style, and odd expressions. His Sylvæ, which were for the most part written off-hand, and without premeditation, are by most critics more esteemed than his epic poems, there being in them some very good thoughts, mixed with such as are quite trivial and common (46). Some writers have confounded P. Statius Papinius, who was a native of Naples, with Statius Surculus, or rather Ufulus, who was born in Toulouse, and, in the reign of Nero, taught rhetoric in Gaul (47). Statius acquired great fame by his Thebais, but no wealth ; whence he was obliged to write pieces for the theatre, and support himself by that means (48). One Placidus Laetantius, who flourished in the sixth century, wrote a learned comment upon Statius, which has not reached our times (49).

Decius Junius Juvenalis was contemporary with Statius and Martial, and continued to write under Nerva and Trajan ; for he speaks of the banishment of Marius Priscus, who was condemned in the third year of Trajan's reign, and one hundredth of the christian æra (50). He was born at Aquinum, whence he came to Rome while he was yet very young, and there gained great credit by his satires, which were read by many Romans, who perused no other book (51). It were much to be wished, that in censuring the manners of others, he had not shewed himself quite destitute of modesty, nor inveighed against the abuses which prevailed in his time, in a manner rather calculated to teach his readers to be vicious, than to inspire them with aversion to vice. From his life, written many ages since, and quoted by Sidonius Apollonaris (52), it appears, that a player, in great favour at court, offended at some verses of his seventh satire, had interest enough with the emperor to get him removed from Rome and sent into Egypt,

- a sixth year of the christian æra. The surname of Tyaneus he borrowed from the city of Tyana in Cappadocia, the place of his nativity. His birth was foretold and accompanied, if the author of his life is to be credited^e, by many prodigies. When he was but fourteen years old, he applied himself to the study of the Pythagoric philosophy, He applies himself to the study of the Pythagoric philosophy. first at Tarsus, the capital of Cilicia, and afterwards at Ægæ, another city of the same province, under the direction of one Euxenes, whose manners did not answer his profession. But Apollonius following his precepts, without regarding his manners, retired at the age of sixteen to a house in the country, led there a life of great austerity, abstaining, pursuant to the maxims of his sect, from all manner of flesh, suffering his hair to grow, going bare-foot, and clad only in linen, that he might use nothing proceeding from any living creature. From his country-house he removed, after some time, to the temple of Æsculapius in the city of Ægæ, where he soon became known, great numbers of votaries flocking daily to the temple of that pretended deity, for the preservation or recovery of their health. There Apollonius began to set up for a censor and reformer of manners, having already, it seems, a mighty opinion of his own virtue^f. His father dying about the time that Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, was accused of having betrayed the Romans, that is, about the seventeenth year of the christian æra, he took possession of his inheritance; but reserved a small share of it for himself; the greatest part of it he yielded to his brother, who led a vicious and dissolute life, from which he was by this means retrieved; the rest, save a very small portion, he divided amongst his necessitous relations. Being thus disengaged from every thing that could divert him from the study of philosophy and the practice of virtue, he passed five years in silence, agreeable to the custom of the Pythagorics; wherein he found, as he himself owned, great difficulty. During that time, he appeased, says the author of his life, several tumults and seditions in Cilicia and Pamphylia, especially at Aspenda, one of the chief cities in the latter province, where Egypt, to command a legion quartered in the utmost bounds of that province; where he died soon after of grief, being fourscore when he was obliged to undertake that journey. Some writers conjecture this player to have been one Pylades, who was highly favoured by Trajan. Quintilian in all likelihood alluded to Juvenal, when he wrote, that, in his time lived some poets, authors of satires, who would one day be ranked amongst the best writers (53). Salmasius is of opinion, that the ancient scholiast of Juvenal was contemporary with Spartianus, who flourished under Dioclesian and Constantine the Great (54). Julius Scaliger and some other critics prefer Juvenal to Horace; but now-a-days few, if any, men of taste acquiesce to their judgment, thinking they sufficiently honour Juvenal, by placing him amongst the Latin satirists next to Horace, but next at a great distance.

Caius Silius Italicus wrote a poem, highly commended by Martial (55), on the second Punic war. Before he applied himself to the study of poetry, he had pleaded many years at the bar, and had even been consul; which office he discharged the year that Nero was killed. He is not by our modern critics much esteemed as a poet; but greatly commended for the purity of his style, wherein he is thought to excel all the writers of his time (56). He adheres with great exactness to truth, and relates some events, which we read no-where else (57). He died in the second year of the reign of Trajan, by abstaining from all food, being no longer able to bear the pain occasioned by an impostume, which the physicians could not cure (58). He died the last of all those who had been consuls under Nero, and was himself the last consul under that prince (59).

From what he says of Domitian (60) it is plain, that he wrote after the war with the Dacians. Most writers have supposed him to be a native of Italica, and thence called Italicus; but Italicus was, as appears from the letters of Pliny and the consular tables, not an epithet, but his name; and besides, had he been born in Italica, he would have thence been called Italicanus, or Italicensis (61).

Vossius is of opinion, that Terentianus, who, in Martial's time, governed Syene in Egypt (62), is the same person with Terentianus Maurus, who wrote a poem on the measure of verses, which has reached our times, and is greatly esteemed by all persons of taste; but others ascribe that excellent performance to Posthumius Terentianus, to whom Longinus, about the year 270, inscribed his book on the sublime. Several other poets are mentioned by Martial as flourishing at this time, namely, Curtius Montanus, Turnus, and Scæva Memor, who were brothers; Arun-tius Stella, Codrus or Cordus, Paccius, Faustus, Rubrenus Lappa, M. Unicus, Ligurinus, Theodorus, Canius, Licinianus, Voconius Victor, and Passienus Paulus (63). Turnus acquired, it seems, great reputation by his satires, and was, tho' of a mean descent, very powerful at court under the emperors Titus and Domitian (64). Scaliger ascribes to Scæva Memor, upon what grounds he has not thought fit to impart to us, the tragedy intitled Octavia, which is commonly believed to have been written by Seneca (65). Suidas mentions one Epaphroditus, author of several books upon the grammar; which have been long since lost. He was a native of Bæotia, had been slave to Modestus governor of Egypt; but afterwards became famous at Rome in the reign of Nero, and died in that of Nerva, in the seventy-fifth year of his age (66).

where the populace rose, and were ready to burn the chief magistrate alive, for not obliging some of the wealthy inhabitants to produce their corn, during a famine, and sell it at a reasonable price. He went afterwards to Antioch, to Ephesus, and to several cities, where he took upon him to revive the worship of some deities or idols, which now began to be neglected. He practised every-where secret mysteries, to which those alone were admitted, who had observed silence for the space of four years. He took upon him the character of legislator, pretending to require nothing of others, but what he had performed himself: he even boasted a thorough knowledge of all languages, without ever having learnt them; and had the impudence to give out, that the most secret recesses of mens hearts and their most private thoughts lay open to him^s. However, he had yet but seven disciples, and these too abandoned him, as soon as he declared his intention of travelling as far as India, to visit the philosophers there, known by the name of Bramans, or Bracmanes; so that he left Antioch, attended only by two domestics; but at Niniveh was joined by Damis, a native of that place, who, of all the disciples he ever had, proved the most addicted to him; for he observed with great attention, and carefully registered, not only his most minute actions, but even his words. These memoirs of Damis falling afterwards into the hands of Julia Augusta, the wife of the emperor Severus, she imparted them to Philostratus, who chiefly copied from them what he wrote of his pretended hero. Apollonius, on his journey from Niniveh to Babylon, learned, as he passed through Mesopotamia, what to his time had been a great secret, namely, that of understanding the answers of oracles delivered by birds. Thus this wise philosopher adopted the follies peculiar to each country through which he passed. Upon his arrival at Babylon, he was received by the mages of the place, with whom he often conferred in private. Philostratus describes Babylon as a city above seventy miles in compass, with walls of an extraordinary height and breadth, as if it had been no less magnificent and beautiful in the time of Apollonius, than formerly in that of Nebuchadonezzar; whereas it is plain from Pliny, who was contemporary with Apollonius, that Babylon then lay in ruins, and scarce any building remained, except the temple of Belus^b. Trajan, who, not many years after, was prompted by a commendable curiosity to visit so celebrated a place, found it quite buried in its ruinsⁱ; and Pausanias, who wrote in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, tells us, that Babylon, the greatest city the sun ever saw, had in his time nothing left but its walls. These remained long after, the space within being made a park by the Parthian kings for the keeping of wild beasts, and the diversion of hunting. It is therefore plain, that Philostratus was no less mistaken in his description of Babylon, than he is in supposing, that the kings of Parthia, in the time of Apollonius, resided there, it being plain from Strabo, that they then passed the winter at Ctesiphon near Seleucia, and the summer at Ecbatana^k. He tells us, that the king's name who then reigned was Vardanes, and that, two years and two months before, he had recovered his kingdom, which had been unjustly seized by his brother Gotarzes, adding, that Apollonius passed twenty months at the court, and found, about six months after, the same prince still on the throne^l; so that according to Philostratus, Vardanes must have reigned four years and upwards: whereas it is plain from Tacitus^m, that Vardanes began to rule over the Parthians in the seventh year of Claudius's reign, and was dead some time before the end of the ninth. Apollonius left Babylon, and, taking leave of the king, set out for India; where he was received with great marks of esteem by a king named Phraortes, of whom Philostratus relates wonders; and by him introduced to Hiarchus, the chief of the Bramans, who at that time was but eighteen years old. If what Philostratus relates of these philosophers be true, they were far from being gods, tho' they impiously passed themselves for such upon the undiscerning multitudeⁿ. Apollonius passed four months with them, held frequent conferences with the chief men amongst them, to which not even Damis was admitted, and ever after entertained a mighty opinion of their sect. After he had learnt all the mysteries of their profession, he left India; and returning by sea, landed at the mouth of the Euphrates, or rather the Tigris; went from thence by land to Babylon, then to Niniveh, and from Niniveh to Antioch. He was not, it seems, much admired at Antioch; for, after a short stay in that city, he removed to Ionia, and settled in that country, residing sometimes at Ephesus, and sometimes at Smyrna^o. He is said to have

From Ionia he went to Ilium, where he imbarqued for Lesbos, and from thence sailed to Athens, in which city he reformed innumerable abuses, and utterly abolished the inhuman spectacles of gladiators. He travelled all over Greece, reviving every-where the ancient superstition of the Greeks, and establishing the idolatrous worship of the gods. The Eleans invited him to the sports, which were to be celebrated on occasion of the CXth olympiad, seven years before Nero undertook the cutting of the isthmus, and consequently in the year of the christian æra 61. He complied with their invitation, and, by his warm exhortations, inspired many, both Greeks and foreigners, with the love of virtue and abhorrence of vice. At Corinth he was kindly received, and ever after admired by Demetrius, the most celebrated Cynic of those days, and his disciple Menippus. At Lacedæmon, where he passed great part of the winter, he is said to have persuaded the inhabitants to resume their ancient manner of living^q. But of this great and remarkable reformation, no notice is taken by any other writer. In the beginning of the spring, he sailed from Lacedæmon to Crete, and from thence to Rome, where he stayed, performing wonderful things, related at length by the author of his life, till he was obliged to quit the city, in virtue of an edict enacted by Nero, driving all philosophers out of Rome. He then retired to Cadiz, where, in a private conference with Galba, he encouraged him to revolt from Nero, He encourages Galba to revolt from Nero. and assume the sovereignty. From Cadiz he crossed over to Africa, from Africa to Hetruria, and thence to Sicily, where he received the tidings of Nero's death. However, he would not return to Rome, but sailed to Achaia or Greece, where he remained the winter, and early in the spring passed over into Egypt, where he was followed by vast crouds, the superstitious Egyptians flocking from all quarters to hear and see him. Philostratus would fain persuade us, that Vespasian went into Egypt for the same purpose; but of the true motive of his journey, we have spoken elsewhere. However, Vespasian, who was not exempt, as Tacitus observes, from such superstition, while he was in Egypt, went to visit Apollonius, and seemed to entertain a mighty opinion of him. He consulted him in private about the state of his affairs, and paid great deference to his judgment. Dion and Euphrates, two celebrated philosophers, advised Vespasian to renounce the sovereignty, after he had overcome Vitellius, and restore the republic to its former liberty. But Apollonius opposed their sentiments, which occasioned a warm debate, Apollonius being, it seems, impatient of all contradiction. Vespasian followed the opinion of Apollonius, who thereupon took the liberty to instruct him how to govern with equity and moderation. Vespasian would have rewarded him with great generosity for his excellent precepts; but the philosopher would not accept the least acknowledgment^r. From Alexandria Vespasian departed for Rome, and Apollonius soon after for Ethiopia, with a design to visit the philosophers of that country, whom Philostratus calls Gymnosophists; a name by all other writers given to the philosophers of India. Is consulted by Vespasian. Of the thirty disciples he had at this time, ten only accompanied him in this journey, the others chusing to remain at Alexandria. He was at first received very coldly by the Ethiopian philosophers, who had been prejudiced against him by Euphrates; but they were soon reconciled to each other, and held several private conferences, which Apollonius interrupted to view the sources of the Nile; but he did not go beyond the third cataract. He returned to Egypt, about the time that Titus took the city of Jerusalem, which he entered on the eighth of September of the year 70. The next year Titus returned to Rome, and was met by Apollonius at Argos, who the same year travelled all over Phænicia, Ionia, Cilicia; visited several cities of Greece; and, if Codinus is to be believed, went to Byzantium, and there set up several talismans, or magical figures, which remained till the year 870. when the emperor Basilius caused them to be removed^s. From Byzantium he returned to Greece, and from thence to Rome; where he endeavoured to stir up the people against the emperor Domitian, and exhorted Nerva, who was afterwards emperor, to head them. Domitian was informed of his private practices, and at the same time told, that in the neighbourhood of Rome he had sacrificed a child, in order to discover, by viewing its intrails, what success would attend Nerva, if he engaged in the con-

conspiracy. Hereupon the emperor wrote to the governor of Asia, whither Apollonius was already retired, ordering him to seize him, and send him in chains to Rome. But Apollonius, before the order arrived, had left Asia, in order to return to Rome. At Puteoli he found Demetrius the celebrated Cynic, who acquainted him with the emperor's edict, ordering all the philosophers to depart Rome; and at the same time exhorted him to retire, lest he should fall a sacrifice to the rage of Domitian, who bore an irreconcilable hatred to all philosophers, and to him in particular. Apollonius replied, that he could not follow his advice, without betraying Nerva; and that he was very sure it was not in the power of the tyrant to put him to death. He therefore pursued his journey to Rome, in the habit peculiar to philosophers; but obliged Damis, his only companion, to quit it, lest he should be discovered and seized^t. He no sooner arrived at Rome, than the emperor ordered Casperius Ælianus, captain of the prætorian guards to seize him. Casperius, who had a particular veneration for him, under pretence of examining him in private, instructed him how to make his defence, when summoned before the judges; and then, as he durst not dismiss him, committed him to prison; where Apollonius comforted his fellow prisoners, fifty in number, and encouraged them to bear their confinement, and the miseries attending it, with constancy and patience. After he had been thus confined for the space of six days, he was brought before the emperor, who examined him concerning the designs of Nerva. Apollonius answered, That Nerva had never entertained the least thought of conspiring against him, or assuming the sovereignty, tho' he was at that time actually contriving, according to Philostratus, the means of deposing the emperor, and seizing the empire, being instigated thereunto by Apollonius himself^u. Domitian, finding he could draw no satisfactory answer from him, ordered his beard to be shaved, a great affront to a philosopher; and commanded him to be led back to prison, loaded with chains, from which, however, he was two days after discharged, at the request of Casperius. While he was in bonds, he assured Damis, who attended him even in prison, that the emperor, notwithstanding his great power, could not hurt him; and, in so saying, drew with great ease his leg out of the chain. He was a few days after brought again before the emperor; who, after having examined him in the presence of many persons of distinction, declared him innocent, and afterwards had a private conference with him, in which Apollonius displayed to him the great evils that must necessarily ensue from the prince's giving ear to informers. As for myself, said he, I am not under the least apprehension: you may cause me to be seized; but put me to death you cannot; that the laws of fate and my destiny will not allow. Apollonius, having thus spoke, disappeared, and was seen that evening at Puteoli, three days journey distant from Rome^w. From Puteoli he passed over into Sicily, and from thence into Greece, where he remained two years, followed and admired by vast crowds, and persons of all ranks and ages, whom, by his precepts and example, he animated to despise wealth, and place their whole happiness in the pursuit of virtue. From Greece he returned to Ionia, residing partly at Smyrna, and partly at Ephesus; but frequently visiting all the cities of that province. While he was discoursing to a numerous assembly at Ephesus, the same minute that Domitian was slain, he began all on a sudden to lower his voice, as if he had been seized with fear; but nevertheless pursued his discourse for some time, tho' faintly, and often stopping, as if he had been intent upon something else. At length he quite gave over speaking, fixed his eyes stedfast on the ground; and, after a short silence, Strike home, he cried, Strike the tyrant home. As the numerous assembly was greatly surprised, he no sooner returned to himself, than he bid them be of good cheer and rejoice; For the tyrant, added he, is dead; he is just now expired^x. The same thing is related by Dion Cassius, as an event not to be doubted; nay, he adds, that Apollonius, during his trance, as he calls it, named Stephanus, crying out so as to be heard by the whole assembly, Courage, brave Stephanus! courage! dispatch the tyrant^y. Nerva, who succeeded Domitian, had no sooner taken possession of the empire, than he wrote to Apollonius, inviting him to Rome. The philosopher returned answer, That, by the decrees of fate, they were never more to see one another. However, some time after, he wrote to the emperor a letter, filled with excellent precepts for governing with equity and moderation. This letter he sent by Damis, whom he charged to deliver to the emperor several rules of government by word of mouth in his name. While Damis was

- a was at Rome, he received advice, that Apollonius had disappeared; whence he concluded, that he had sent him to Rome, on purpose that he might not be present at his death: hence he is generally thought to have died this year, the first of Nerva's reign and ninety-sixth of the christian æra. Damis, in his memoirs, made no mention of his death; and Philostratus declares, that in his time no one could give any probable account of it. Some pretended, he died at Ephesus; others related, that he went into a temple at Lindus in the island of Rhodes, and was never afterwards seen. Philostratus assures us, that, tho' he had travelled into several countries, he could no-where find his tomb, nor hear any certain account of the manner of his death^k. This succinct account of the life of Apollonius is swelled by Philostratus with a great number of miracles and predictions, upon which he makes long descants. Amongst other miracles wrought by his hero, he tells us, that he restored to life a young woman of a consular family; but at the same time seems to doubt, whether or no she was quite dead: and truly, had he ever wrought such a miracle, he would have been, as Eusebius rightly observes^l, more famous than he ever was. His prodigies are attested only by Philostratus, who, as Lipsius observes^m, is guilty of many gross mistakes, and often contradicts himself in what relates to the Roman history. What can seem less probable, than his account of what passed at the interview between Apollonius and Domitian? Eusebius calls his book a romance; and Photius looks upon it as a heap of inconsistent fablesⁿ. Most of the fathers speak of it in the same style^o, as do likewise Suidas^p and the most judicious among the modern writers, viz. Scaliger^q, Vives^r, Vossius^s, Casaubon^t, &c. Many of the pagans themselves seem to have entertained but a very indifferent opinion of Apollonius, notwithstanding his boasted virtue and miracles. Even those who bore him no hatred looked upon him as a magician, and scrupled admitting him to their mysteries^u; nay, the same opinion still prevailed in the time of his panegyrist Philostratus, as he himself witnesses^w. Lucian, speaking of one of his favourite and most faithful disciples, calls him a celebrated and professed magician^x. In the epitome of Dion Cassius by Xiphilin, we read, that the wicked emperor Caracalla had a particular esteem for Apollonius, whom he looked upon as the most accomplished impostor and forcerer the world had ever seen.
- d No one can peruse his life, tho' written with the utmost partiality, without discovering in all his actions a great deal of pride, arrogance, and presumption, and an extraordinary opinion of his own virtue. Before his journey to India, when the image of the Parthian king was shewn him, and he commanded to adore, according to the custom of the country, he returned to the king's officers this arrogant and haughty answer; The prince whom you adore, may reckon himself happy, if he deserves by me to be only esteemed and commended^y. He imagined himself possessed of all virtues in an eminent degree, took upon him every-where the character of censor, legislator, instructor, &c., pretended to know every thing, to foresee future events, to be acquainted with the most hidden thoughts of those with whom he conversed; nay, he suffered himself to be by the multitude acknowledged for a god, and divine worship to be paid him; which he indeed once refused, but the only motive which prompted him to reject it was, fear of being envied^z. Philostratus cries up his disinterestedness and the purity of his manners; but tho' he would receive no presents from kings or emperors, yet he accepted, and even asked, a considerable sum of one of the pontiffs^a. As to the purity of his manners, he was commonly thought not to be free from all blame^b; at least his favourite disciples wallowed, if Lucian is to be credited, in all manner of lewdness^c. As he held the metempsychosis, or transmigration of souls, he caused a lion to be publicly adored, pretending, that the soul of Amasis, one of the ancient kings of Egypt, had passed into that animal^d. Philostratus endeavours to excuse, in the best manner he can, his hero for quarrelling with the philosopher Euphrates, on whom he lays all the blame. But either the same writer, or another of the same name, who had read the life of Apollonius, and often refers his readers to it, owns, that neither Apollonius nor Euphrates behaved on that occasion as became philosophers^e. panegyrist, to discredit and cry down Euphrates, he was, two hundred years after ^a his death, generally esteemed the greatest philosopher of his time ^f. Apollonius himself, before their quarrel, spoke of him to Vespasian as a man of an unblemished character, not foreseeing, for all his pretence to a prophetic spirit, that he was soon to change his style, and inveigh against him as one of the most wicked of men ^g. Pliny the younger, who was intimately acquainted with Euphrates, bestows mighty encomiums upon him ^h; and Arrian, in his comments upon Epictetus, not only extols his eloquence, but commends him greatly for having lived like a philosopher, before he assumed the habit peculiar to that profession ⁱ. He died in the beginning of Adrian's reign, with whose permission he put an end to the infirmities attending old age with a draught of poison ^k. He published some writings against Apollonius, which Philostratus promises to refute ^l. Eunapius seems to ascribe other works to him upon more noble subjects, by which he gained great reputation ^m. As no one could give any certain account of the death of Apollonius, his countrymen, the inhabitants of Tyana, believed him immortal, and consecrated a temple to him close to their city ⁿ. His images were set up in many temples; and the emperors, instead of checking, countenanced this superstition, by the honours which they themselves paid to the impostor. Adrian collected and lodged in the palace at Antium a great many of his letters ^o. Antonius Caracalla honoured him with divine worship, and consecrated a temple to him ^p. The emperor Alexander kept his image in a private place of his palace, together with the images of our Saviour, of Abraham, and of several princes, who had governed with equity and moderation ^q. Vopiscus tells us, that he read in certain memoirs; and also heard of persons of credit, that the emperor Aurelian being resolved to give up the city of Tyana to be plundered by his soldiers, Apollonius appeared to him, and diverted him from that design; and adds, that the emperor, convinced by that miraculous apparition, that Apollonius was a god, vowed to him an image, a temple, and a statue ^r; but whether he performed his vow, Vopiscus does not inform us; neither does he vouch the truth of the apparition, tho' he professed a particular veneration for Apollonius, and even designed to write his life in Latin, as Philostratus had done in Greek, that his stupendous actions, says he, may ^d be known to the whole world. But, notwithstanding the great esteem which several of the emperors had for him, and his many pretended miracles, he was, at the beginning of the fourth century, generally looked upon as an impostor and a magician ^s. Eunapius, who wrote in the beginning of the fifth century, attempted to retrieve the reputation of his pretended hero ^t; but was therein attended with no better success than a late writer of no mean character; for, in spite of the utmost efforts of men, falsehood must in the end yield, and truth prevail. Philostratus has transmitted to us several letters written by Apollonius, most of them very short, with a long apology, which he had composed with a design to pronounce it before Domitian, not knowing ^u, tho' a great prophet, that the emperor would not hear it, and that in writing it he laboured to no effect. Besides this apology and a great number of letters to persons of all ranks and conditions ^w, he wrote a treatise upon judicial astrology, comprised in four books ^x, and another upon sacrifices, wherein he pretended to shew with what kind of victims each deity was most pleased. The former treatise was not much esteemed: but the latter was received with general applause. It is once quoted by Eusebius ^y, and mentioned likewise by Suidas ^z. His theology, out of which Eusebius quotes a passage ^a, and his treatise upon sacrifices are in all likelihood one and the same work.

^a THE present account having, through mistake, been omitted in the reign of Caligula, its proper place, the reader, we hope, will overlook that involuntary omission, and not take it amiss, that we supply it here; the persecution of the Jews at Alexandria, the embassy of Philo to Caius, and the audience he had of that prince, being too remarkable incidents to be passed over in silence.

^b THIS dreadful persecution happened in the second year of the reign of the emperor Caligula and 39th of the Christian æra, while Egypt was governed by a Roman knight, named Avillius Flaccus, to whose base connivance it was chiefly owing. Flaccus had governed that province with great reputation, during the five last years of the reign of Tiberius, who had a particular value and kindness for him. But, upon the death of that prince and the accession of Caligula to the empire, he changed his conduct, grew remiss in the administration of justice, and made it his whole study to gain the affections of the people of Alexandria, hoping by that means to recommend himself to the favour of the new emperor, whose resentment he dreaded; and indeed not without reason, for he was no friend to the family of Germanicus, and was generally thought to have contributed to the disgrace and death of Agrippina, the mother of Caligula. Three crafty Egyptians, Dionysius, Lampo, and Isidorus, who had been declared enemies to Flaccus, while he ruled with due severity, being apprised of his fears, remonstrated to him, under colour of friendship, that the surest means of winning the hearts of the Alexandrians was, to withdraw his protection from the Jews, of whom many thousands lived in Alexandria, and to abandon them to the mercy of the Egyptians, who had ever borne an irreconcilable hatred to the Jewish nation. This counsel Flaccus readily embraced, well knowing, that it would not displease the emperor, whose hatred the Jews had provoked, by refusing to acknowledge his pretended divinity. Besides, Flaccus was of himself, it seems, no friend to the Jewish nation: for that people having the year before, in the first month of Caligula's reign, decreed him all the honours which were consistent with their religion, and consigned the decree to Flaccus, that, by his means, it might be conveyed to the emperor, he, instead of transmitting it to Rome, as he promised to do, suppressed it; which was doing them the greatest unkindness imaginable, and drawing upon them the resentment of a cruel and ambitious prince ^a. In the mean time, Agrippa, who had been set at liberty by Caligula, and declared king of the tetrarchy, which his uncle Philip had held, with the addition of that of Lysanias, as we have related in our history of the Jews ^b, arriving from Rome at Alexandria, on his journey to his new kingdom, was insulted by the populace of that metropolis in a most outrageous manner, tho', to avoid the concourse of people, he had entered the city by night ^c. As Flaccus winked at these insults, instead of restraining them, the rabble grew more outrageous; and, assembling in crowds, began, with great tumult and uproar, to demand, that the statues of Caius might be be placed in the Jewish oratories, or places of prayer, of which there were many in Alexandria, and all over Egypt. Flaccus not offering to oppose, but seeming rather to approve, the design, the rabble thronged immediately to the oratories, cut down the groves and trees about them, levelled some of them with the ground, and set fire to others; which, together with oratories, consumed several noble monuments erected by the emperors in honour of the Jews, and a great many adjoining houses. Such oratories as the rioters could not demolish, because the Jews, who lived near them, were very numerous, they profaned, by placing in them the emperor's statues. In the largest of them all they erected a statue of brass, representing Caius, in a chariot drawn by four horses, which had been formerly consecrated to Cleopatra, the great-grandmother of the last queen of that name. They did not, as Philo observes, shew great respect to Caius, in dedicating to him what had been formerly dedicated to a woman. But the merit, on which they laid the chief stress, was their increasing the number of temples consecrated to this pretended deity, tho' even in that they did not so much regard his honour, as the satisfying of their own hatred to the Jews. The Alexandrians took care to acquaint the emperor with the transactions of each day, who is said to have read their accounts with incredible satisfaction, partly because he hated the Jews, and partly because he believed the Alexandrians chiefly actuated, in afflicting the Jews, by a sincere zeal for his honour^d. The example of Alexandria was followed by all the other cities of Egypt; in which province there were at this time a million of Jews, and a vast number of oratories, of which the largest and most beautiful were styled synagogues^e. They were all demolished, consumed by fire, or profaned with the emperor's statues. A few days after the Jews had been thus stript of their oratories, Flaccus published an edict, declaring all the Jews aliens at Alexandria, without allowing them time to make good their claim to the rights of citizens, which they had long enjoyed undisturbed^f. The Jews, who were never famous for bearing injuries with patience, when they could prevent or revenge them, made, in all likelihood, some efforts towards the maintaining of their rights; which, though Philo has not thought fit to mention them, gave probably occasion to greater disorders. For the Alexandrians, considering them as men abandoned by the emperor to their mercy, laid hold of this opportunity to vent their rage upon a people whom they had ever abhorred, and looked upon as enemies to the rest of mankind. The city of Alexandria was at that time divided into five quarters, which took their names from the five first letters of the alphabet. In each of these, some Jews dwelt, but two were almost entirely peopled by them, and thence called the quarters of the Jews. They were therefore by the outrageous multitude violently driven out of all the other parts of the city, and confined to one quarter; the houses, from which they had been driven, were plundered, and all their effects seized, as if they had been conquered in war. The rioters did not, says Philo, commit these robberies like thieves in the night, who are afraid of being brought to justice, but in the face of the sun, shewing what they had taken to all they met, with as much confidence, as if it had been an inheritance or purchase: nay, they publicly divided the spoil in the market-place, in the presence of those very persons whom they had plundered, adding mockery to their violence. As Flaccus never offered to check or restrain them, they broke open the shops and ware-houses of the Jewish merchants, which were then shut on account of the public mourning for the death of Drusilla, the emperor's sister; and thence conveyed away and sold to the best bidder all their effects. Thus were the Jews at once driven from their habitations, reduced to beggary, and cooped up in a narrow corner of the city, where the Alexandrians doubted not, but they would soon perish, either by the inconveniencies of the place, for most of them were obliged to lie in the open air; or by famine, for they were allowed to carry no provisions along with them; or by the infection of the air and want of free respiration, many thousands of men, women, and children, being shut up in so close and smothering a place. The Alexandrians watched them narrowly night and day, to prevent them from making their escape. But in the end, hunger prevailing over fear, several found means to withdraw either to the sea-side, or to some remote burying-places; but such of them as were discovered, were tortured in a most cruel manner, put to death, and their bodies ignominiously dragged through the streets of the city. Those

Jews who, not having any notice of the uproar, happened to come to the city from their country houses, were treated with the same cruelty, and hurried away to the torture, or torn in pieces by the enraged multitude. Some of the rioters lay night and day on the banks of the river, waiting there for the Jewish merchants; and as soon as any vessel arrived belonging to that nation, they leaped into it, seized the effects, and then burnt it, together with the owners. In short, when Jews appeared in any part of the city, except the narrow quarter allotted to them, they were sure of being tortured, in a most barbarous manner, and massacred. The least inhuman among the rioters dispatched them with the sword, or with fire, often burning whole families, without respecting the old men, or pitying the infants; and employing for fuel such of their effects as no one thought worth purchasing. Others more cruel, to prolong the torments of those unhappy wretches, having tied them to stakes, kindled round them fires of moist and green wood; so that, after they had long borne the torment of a slow fire, they perished at length, suffocated with the smoke, when their bodies were but half burnt. Others, with ropes fastened to their feet, were dragged through the streets and public places of the city, the populace insulting their bodies even after they were dead, trampling them under foot, and mangling them with such brutal cruelty, that not one member remained intire to entitle them to a funeral. They then, by way of mockery, pretended to bewail those whom they had thus inhumanly butchered: but if any of their friends or relations lamented them in earnest, they were immediately seized, whipt without mercy, and, after suffering all the torments which cruelty itself could invent, condemned to the ignominious punishment of the cross.

Flaccus might, with one word, have put a stop to the fury of the populace; but he the whole time pretended ignorance of the very things he saw and heard. However, he sent at last for the leading men amongst the Jews, as if he designed to make up all differences between them and the people of Alexandria. The Jews had at Alexandria an ethnarch, or chief of their nation, whom Josephus calls, as is commonly believed, alabarch^b. They had likewise a council, which was established by Augustus; and out of this Flaccus caused thirty-eight persons to be seized, to be bound like criminals, some with cords, others with chains, and in that condition to be dragged through the great market-place to the theatre, where the people were celebrating the birth-day of Caius, and there, in the presence of their enemies, to be whipt so unmercifully, that some of them died soon after. In inflicting this punishment, he chose the most ignominious method, (for different methods were then in use) treating them as public thieves and robbers. Those who outlived this cruel punishment were imprisoned and kept under close confinement, till Flaccus himself was arrested, that is from the thirty-first of August, which was Caius's birth-day, to the latter end of September. During this solemnity, which seems to have lasted several days, many Jews were crucified, after the people assembled in the theatre had diverted themselves with scourging, racking, and torturing them at their pleasure. With these scenes of cruelty they were daily entertained, till the Jews, either expiring on the rack, or hurried away to execution, gave room to dancers, players, and other diversions in use amongst the Romans; diversions truly less horrible, but perhaps not more innocent. Such women as were suspected to be Jews were by the insulting populace seized, carried into the market-place, and there exposed naked to public view. Those who proved not to be Jews were immediately dismissed; but to the Jewish women they caused hogs-flesh to be immediately brought, which if they eat, they too were dismissed untouched: but if, on the contrary, they adhered to their law, they were exposed to the greatest indignities imaginable, racked with all manner of torments, and put to a cruel death. Such was the condition of the Jews at Alexandria for the space of about two months; for the persecution continued to the feast of tabernacles. Philo, to whom we are indebted for this account, suffered, no doubt, with the rest of his nation; for he too was an Alexandrian Jew. We cannot help thinking his account somewhat exaggerated; and besides, are convinced, that the Jews gave some occasion to the unheard-of cruelty of the Alexandrians, which he has not thought fit to relate. King Agrippa, upon whose arrival the tumult began, did not in all likelihood continue long in a city where he had been so ill received. However, during his stay there, he was informed informed of the decree formerly made by the Alexandrian Jews in honour of Caius,^a and procured a copy of it, which he immediately transmitted to Rome, acquainting the emperor at the same time with the conduct of Flaccus, who had suppressed it. This provoked Caius to such a degree, that he immediately dispatched a centurion, by name Bassus, with a band of soldiers, to seize Flaccus. Bassus arrived in a few days at Alexandria, and, landing by night, inquired for the officer who commanded the troops quartered in the city, with a design to impart to him the emperor's orders, that he might hold his men ready in case of any resistance. A soldier, whom he met in the street, informed him, that the officer supped that night with Flaccus, at the house of one Stephanio. Hereupon the centurion sent one of his soldiers in the disguise of a slave to Stephanio's house, who, upon his return, informed him,^b that Flaccus was attended only by a small number of his domestics, and that no soldiers were to be seen in or about the house. Upon this intelligence, Bassus immediately entered with all his men; and, having left a party to guard the gates, went with the rest directly to the banquetting-hall, where, to the great terror of the guests, he seized Flaccus, without meeting with the least opposition, and carried^c him in bonds on board his vessel. Flaccus starting up, when the centurion first appeared, attempted to make his escape; but finding himself in a minute surrounded by armed men, he looked upon himself as lost, and yielded. When news of what had happened was brought to the Jews, who continued still shut up in the same place, they did not at first give any credit to it, but looked upon it as a snare laid for them. However, conjecturing from the noise and uproar which they heard in the night, that something extraordinary had happened, some of them stole out, and, upon their return, confirmed the joyful tidings, that Flaccus was certainly arrested. Hereupon, with one voice, they returned thanks to the Almighty for their deliverance, passed the rest of the night in singing hymns, and, upon the return of the day, went all in a body to the sea side, to renew there, as they had no oratories where they could assemble, their thanksgiving with more solemnity. Soon after, Bassus set sail with his prisoner, who, after having much suffered during the voyage, arrived at length at Rome, where he had the mortification to see himself accused by Isidorus and Lampo, who, with their flattering speeches, had put him upon persecuting the Jews.^d But his greatest enemy was the emperor himself, who, on this occasion assuming the quality of judge, condemned him to banishment, declared his state and all his effects forfeited, and seized them for himself. The only favour which Lepidus, who was his friend and then very powerful at court, could obtain for him, was, that he should be confined to Andros, and not to Gyaræ, pursuant to his sentence, which was the most desert and abandoned island in the Archipelago. He was therefore sent under a guard to Andros, and there shewn to the inhabitants, who were ordered to watch him, that he might not make his escape. Some months after, he purchased a small farm, and there led a solitary and retired life, till he was, together with the other exiles, massacred by Caius's orders. He defended himself with great bravery against those who were sent to dispatch him, but was in the end overpowered and cut in pieces.^e

THE grievances of the Alexandrian Jews did not end with the authority of Flaccus. The tumult still continued, that unhappy people were still cruelly insulted by the enraged populace, and the magistrates of Alexandria refused to acknowledge the Jews for citizens, since Flaccus had declared them aliens. Hereupon both parties resolved to send deputies to Rome, and refer the decision of their controversy to the emperor. At the head of the Jewish embassy was Philo, and the celebrated Apion the chief of the ambassadors from the city of Alexandria. Philo was a Jew of the sacerdotal race, and sprung from one of the most illustrious families of Alexandria,^f where his brother was alabarch, or the chief of his nation in that city.^g Josephus calls him a person every-way extraordinary^h; and truly his works were highly esteemed both by the Christians and Pagans, and he ranked amongst the best writers of his time. He was not only well versed in the sacred books, to which the whole knowledge of the Jews was, generally speaking, confined, but thoroughly acquainted with the philosophy of the gentiles, and thought to surpass all the philosophers of his age, in the knowledge of the maxims and tenets of Plato and Pythagoras. - a applied himself chiefly to the study of the Platonic philosophy, and with such success, that it was commonly said at Alexandria, Either Plato imitates Philo, or Philo Plato. The philosophers, who flourished in those times, styled him the second Plato, or the Jewish Plato^m. Apion was likewise a man of great learning. He was, according to some, a native of Oasis in Egypt; according to others, of the island of Creta, now Candia. Be that as it will, he was presented with the citizenship of Alexandria, and thence passed for an *Alexandrian*ⁿ. He is by some writers styled Pleistonicus, which signifies, illustrious for many victories^o; but how he came by that name, we are no-where told. Suidas calls him Mochthus, perhaps instead of Mochtherus, which signifies laborious^p. He was by profession a grammarian; for so were those
- b formerly called, who were well versed in polite literature. Julius Africanus styles him the most inquisitive of all the grammarians; and adds, that no one was better versed in antiquities, or had made more discoveries^q. He was brought up by Didymus, a celebrated grammarian of Alexandria, and afterwards instructed by Apolonius and Euphanor^r. He taught rhetoric at Rome under the emperors Tiberius and Claudius, and was esteemed a man of great erudition, and well versed in the Greek historians: his style was elegant and easy, but he is thought to have exaggerated the things which he relates to have been seen or heard by himself^s. He visited all the cities of Greece, as Pliny informs us^t, in the beginning of Claudius's reign, and was every-where received as a second Homer. However, Seneca seems to have made no great account of his erudition, which chiefly consisted, as he writes,
- c in the knowledge of grammatical trifles. Of his works, and those of Philo, we shall speak anon.

- THE ambassadors were, according to Josephus, three of each side, but five according to Philo, who was one of them, and consequently is more to be depended upon, if we will not suppose with a modern writer^u, who strives to reconcile Philo and Josephus, that two more were afterwards sent by the Jews, and the like number by the Alexandrians. They set out from Alexandria in the midst of winter; and arriving at Rome, were forced to wait there till the return of Caius from Gaul, which happened on the thirty-first of August. The Jewish ambassadors, in the mean time,
- d conveyed to the emperor, by means of king Agrippa, who was then at Rome, a memorial, wherein they laid before him their deplorable condition, acquainted him with the hardships they had undergone, assured him of their attachment to his person and government, and in a most submissive manner implored his protection. When the emperor returned to Rome, the Alexandrian ambassadors gained privately, with great sums and larger promises, the famous Helico, who was by birth an Egyptian, had formerly been a slave, but was then in great favour with Caius, and his chamberlain. The Jewish deputies were no sooner informed, that Helico had been gained over by their enemies, and did them all the ill offices with the emperor that lay in his power, than they strove in their turn to bring him over to their interest; but
- e he would not hearken to any of their proposals, nay, would not so much as allow them access to him. They therefore resolved to apply directly to the emperor, and accordingly drew up a memorial, which was but an abstract of the longer address, which they had a little before transmitted to him by means of Agrippa. This they presented to him in the field of Mars, as he was coming from the gardens of his mother Agrippina. Caius received the ambassadors with a cheerful and smiling countenance, and signified to them with a sign of his right hand, that he would befriend them; nay, he ordered Homulus, the introducer of ambassadors, to acquaint them, that he would hear them himself, as soon as he was at leisure. From this favourable reception, it was generally concluded, that the Jews would gain their cause, and triumph over their enemies. But Philo, whom age and experience had taught
- f not to lay great stress upon fair words and outward appearances, dreaded the effects of the emperor's pretended friendship, and reasoned with himself thus: Here are ambassadors from all parts of the world, and why should the emperor distinguish us from the rest? He knows we are Jews, and consequently, that we should think ourselves happy to be only treated like other nations. Can we reasonably expect any extraordinary favour from a prince of another nation, or suppose that he has not a greater kindness for the Alexandrians than for us? He is partial to them without dispute; and for their sake it is, that he is eager to determine the affair. I should be glad he would prove an impartial judge; but am afraid we shall find him an advocate for them, and an enemy to us. In the mean time, Caius, leaving Rome, went to see one of his magnificent palaces, which stood on the sea-side; and thither the Jewish ambassadors followed him, expecting every moment to be called and heard by him, pursuant to the promise he made to them by Homulus. At Puteoli they were first informed of the danger they were in, not only of losing their cause against the Alexandrians, but of seeing their religion and nation utterly extirpated, in virtue of the order which the emperor had transmitted to Petronius, governor of Syria, commanding him to set up his statue in the temple of Jerusalem. Upon this intelligence, Philo, seeing no prospect of success as to the business with which he was charged, would have returned home with his colleagues, could he have done it with honour. But though he now despaired of success, yet he thought, that his dropping the suit might be looked upon as the effect of fear; and that his countrymen, who had sent him, might with some reason complain, as if, through want of courage, he had betrayed their cause. However, the storm which threatened the Jews on account of the statue of Caius soon blew over, and Philo was in the end admitted, with his colleagues, to the emperor's presence. But they no sooner appeared before him, than, from the fierceness of his looks, they concluded, that the emperor intended to act not like a judge, but as an accuser rather and a party. For, instead of advising with men of knowledge and experience, and hearing both sides indifferently in their turns, especially in a case of this consequence, where the lives and liberties of so many men were at stake, and privileges disputed, which for the space of four hundred years had never so much as been called in question, the tyrant gave them plainly to understand, that he did not design to proceed according to the ordinary methods of law and justice. The emperor was then at a small distance from the city, passing a few days at two country-seats, which, it seems, stood very near each other, and had formerly belonged to Mecenas and Lamias. Having therefore commanded the gardens belonging to both houses, and the several apartments, to be opened, in order to view them, and entertain himself with the curiosities there, he sent at the same time for the Jewish and Alexandrian ambassadors, who were introduced to him while he was thus employed. Philo and his colleagues no sooner came into the emperor's presence, than they threw themselves prostrate at his feet, addressing him with the titles of emperor and Augustus. The emperor received them, notwithstanding the profound respect they shewed him, in such manner, that they began to despair, not only of success in their embassy, but even of their lives. For, with angry looks and a scornful smile, Are you not execrable wretches, said he, declared enemies of the gods, since you have the impudence to dispute a divinity that all the world acknowledges, and to set up against Caius a god whom you cannot so much as name? At the same time, lifting up his hands towards heaven, he uttered such blasphemies, as Philo, who was struck with horror in hearing them, dares not repeat. The Alexandrian ambassadors, concluding from this reception, that they had already gained their cause, could not dissemble their joy; and there was not one attribute peculiar to God, which they did not indifferently ascribe to Caius, who was highly delighted with their flattery. In order to provoke him still more against the Jews, Isidorus, a crafty insinuating slanderer, addressing the emperor, If you knew, said he, the mortal hatred which these men, and their whole nation, bear to you, you would abhor and detest them much more than you do. When all the world were offering up their vows and prayers for the safety of your person, and the prosperity of your government, these alone, I mean all the Jews without exception, stood out with their usual stubbornness and obstinacy. At these words, the Jews cried out with one voice, that they were slandered, that they had offered hecatombs and sacrifices for the happiness of Caius and the empire; and that after they had sprinkled the altar with the blood of the victims, they did not feast among themselves, as most other nations do, upon the flesh, but committed the whole sacrifice to the sacred fire: And this, added they, we have done upon three remarkable occasions, upon your accession to the empire, upon your recovery from that fit of sickness which proved so sensible an affliction to most nations, and finally, for the success of your arms in Germany. You did perhaps offer sacrifices, replied Caius, I allow it: but it was to another, not to me: and what honour do I receive from a from your sacrificing to another? These blasphemous words struck us, says Philo, with horror, and chilled the very blood in our veins. In the mean time, Caius hurried from one apartment to another, taking a view of all the rooms and offices, finding fault where any thing was amiss, and directing how it should be mended. Thus he visited every corner of both houses, the Jews being obliged all along to attend him, tho' jostled and derided by the whole company, especially by their adversaries, who were the whole time mimicking them, like buffoons on the stage: and truly the whole, says Philo, looked rather like a comedy, than a serious negotiation; but as they were now at the mercy of the tyrant, who was both their judge and their enemy, they had no defence left them but silence and patience. After Caius had given some

b necessary orders about his buildings, he turned to the Jews, and gravely asked them, Why they so much scrupled eating hogs-flesh? Hereupon the whole company, some out of flattery, others because they were diverted with the question and mockery, burst into so loud a laughter, that some of Caius's officers were highly offended at the liberty they took, thinking it inconsistent with the respect due to the majesty of the prince. To the emperor's question the Jews answered with great respect, That several people and places had their several fashions and customs, and that their adversaries were prohibited some things as well as they: some people, for instance, said one of them, abstain from lamb. Very well, replied Caius merrily; I cannot blame them; for lambs-flesh is not very savoury. After the emperor had thus rallied and ridiculed them for some time, in the end he asked them all on a sudden in a passion, What c title they had to the privileges of Alexandrian citizens, and to the freedom of that city? Hereupon they began to lay before him their reasons; but he, finding they were of great strength, and not knowing how those which they had already alledged could be well confuted, started up in the midst of their discourse, and ran into a great hall; where, after he had walked a while, he caused the windows to be shut; and then returning to the Jewish ambassadors, he asked them with an air more composed, What they had to say? But they had scarce begun to speak, when Caius, instead of hearkening to them, left them again, and ran in great haste into another room to see several originals done by the most famous painters of antiquity. The Jews, finding d themselves so often interrupted, and expecting nothing from so merciless a tyrant but immediate death, had recourse to the true, for protection against the pretended, god. Their prayers were heard, and Caius, without further outrages, dismissed them, saying, These men are not so wicked, as ignorant and unhappy, in not believing me to be a god. The Jewish deputies departed, reckoning themselves fortunate in having thus escaped with their lives safe; not that they dreaded any kind of death, says Philo, which, had it been any-ways conducive to the preservation of their law, they would with great pleasure, have embraced; but because their destruction would have been inevitably attended with the utter ruin of those who had sent them. As for the subject of their embassy, they could not promise themselves a favourable sentence from a e judge, who would not so much as hear them, being highly incensed against their whole nation, as the only people subject to Rome, who refused to acknowledge his divinity. They continued in the city, waiting with the greatest anxiety imaginable for the decision of their cause; for upon the sentence, which the emperor might think fit to pronounce, depended the fate of the whole Jewish nation, who would be everywhere persecuted and stripped of their effects, privileges, oratories, &c. if the emperor should countenance the Alexandrians in their cruel and unwarrantable proceedings against them^f. Josephus seems to speak of another audience granted by Caius to the Jewish and Alexandrian ambassadors; wherein Apion inveighed with great bitterness

f against the Jews, alledging many things against them; but his main charge was, that whereas temples and altars were erected to Caius by all other nations, and the same adoration paid to him as to the rest of the gods, the Jews alone obstinately refused either to consecrate images to him, or to swear by his name. When Philo was about to reply in behalf of the Jews, Caius in a great rage commanded him to be silent, and with dreadful menaces bid him be gone. Hereupon Philo, turning to his colleagues, Let us take courage; said he; now Caius is against us, God will be for us^g. What sentence Caius pronounced in the end, we find no-where recorded: all we know is, that, during his whole reign, the Jews were grievously persecuted and oppressed by the Alexandrians^h; and that Alexander Lyfimachus, brother to Philo, and alabarch of the the Alexandrian Jews, was, by Caius's orders, committed to prison, and there detained till he was discharged by Claudius; upon whose accession to the empire, the Jews, notwithstanding their boasted patience, betook themselves to arms, which occasioned a great tumult at Alexandria. Claudius, upon the first tidings of the commotion, wrote to the governor of Egypt, injoining him to appease it; and, at the request of the two kings, Agrippa and Herod, enacted an edict, which he sent to Alexandria, confirming to the Jews all the privileges they had ever enjoyed in that city, and declaring all the proceedings of Caius against them null and voidⁱ (E).

(E) To this relation we shall subjoin a succinct account of the works of Philo, of Apion, and some writers who flourished under the princes of the Flavian family. Philo described in five books the evils suffered by the Jews under Caius; and these books, as he made frequent digressions in them upon the vices of that prince, he styled ironically, Of the virtues of Caius (1). Of these five books Eusebius takes that which has reached our times, under the title of Philo's embassy to Caius, to be the first (2). Photius styles it, Caius blamed (3). The second of these five books is, according to both these writers, that which is commonly known by the title of Philo against Flaccus, and which Photius calls Flaccus blamed (4). However, the book against Flaccus seems to have been written before that of his embassy; since, in the end of the latter (5), he tells us, that he has already described the inexpressible calamities suffered by the Alexandrian Jews; and these calamities are the chief subject of his book against Flaccus. The three other books, or parts of that work, have been long since lost; for Photius seems to have been acquainted with no other, but the two above-mentioned, books written by Philo on that subject (6). Philo is said to have read them during the reign of Claudius in full senate, when they were heard with uncommon applause, and ordered to be deposited in the public library (7). The author seems to address himself to the emperor Claudius in his book against Flaccus. St. Jerom mentions in his catalogue several books written by Philo; but of these (which is very surprising) takes not the least notice. The reader will find in Eusebius (8) and St. Jerom (9) a catalogue of his other works upon the scripture, and various different subjects. Eusebius commends the sublimity of his thoughts in explaining the scripture (10); and Origen writes, that most of his books upon the law of Moses were generally esteemed by men of learning (11). Photius, on the contrary, thinks he frequently neglects the obvious and literal, to hunt after an allegorical, sense (12). The same writer observes, that Philo often follows opinions contrary to the principles of the Jewish religion, and that he does not seem to disapprove the superstitious honours paid to the emperor Augustus. St. Jerom ascribes to him the Greek interpretation of the proper names in the pentateuch and the prophets (13). Some writers will have him to have been likewise the author of a Latin history, containing the most remarkable incidents from the creation to the reign of Saul; but others think that work, which often contradicts the scripture, altogether unworthy of Philo (14). St. Jerom says, that some ancient writers ascribed to Philo the book of wisdom (15); but that he was not the author of that book, is plainly shewn by a modern writer of no mean character (16). Some writers tell us, that, in the reign of Claudius, he became acquainted with St. Peter at Rome, and contracted a friendship with that apostle (17); nay, Photius adds (18), that he embraced the christian religion, and afterwards renounced it upon some discontent. But the silence of all other writers, with respect to this particular, makes us question the truth of what Photius asserts.

Apion wrote several books (19), of which we find one only quoted by the ancients, namely, his history of Egypt, containing a particular and distinct account of all the curiosities and antiquities of that country. Eusebius (20) and Tatian (21) cite some passages out of the fifth book of this work, which was in all likelihood the last. As all the Alexandrians bore an irreconcilable hatred to the Jews, no wonder that Apion filled his writings with false and slanderous accounts of them; which Josephus with great erudition confutes in a book, which he published against him and other pagan writers, in defence of the Jews, and intituled, An answer to Apion. Several persons seeming to question the truth of what he had advanced in his Jewish antiquities, alleging, that if the race of the Jews was as ancient and illustrious as Josephus makes it; the Greek historians would have taken notice of them, he undertook another work, wherein he not only shews, that several historians have mentioned the Jews, but confutes the calumnies published against them by divers authors, especially by Apion. This work is by Eusebius (22) and St. Jerom (23) intituled, Of the Jewish antiquities. Apion not only strove to discredit the Jews in his history of Egypt, but wrote a book, of which they were the only subject (24), filled with calumnies against that nation, falsehoods, and accounts altogether fabulous; which Josephus confuted, after he had ended his antiquities. Apion, after having in his writings derided circumcision in a most scurrilous manner, was himself by a distemper obliged to submit to it, but to no effect; for the wound putrifying, he died soon after, by a just judgment, says Josephus, in great misery and torments (25). The famous adventure of a slave named Androcles, who was nourished, during the space of three years, by a lion, whom he had cured of a wound, and by the same known in the sight of all Rome, when he was exposed in the amphitheatre to be devoured by the wild beasts, must have happened about this time; for Apion, as quoted by Aulus Gellius (26), assures us, that he was an eye-witness of that surprising and affecting scene; and adds, that the grateful lion was saved, and the slave presented with his liberty.

Justus, the son of Pistus, contemporary with Josephus, and of the same religion, but a native of Tiberias in Galilee, wrote likewise in Greek the history of the Jewish war, of the taking of Jotapat, and of the destruction of Jerusalem. This history he composed soon after the war, but did not publish it till Vespasian, Titus, and king Agrippa were dead, that is, twenty years after he had wrote it, about the thirteenth year of Domitian's reign. Josephus, who was at variance with him, tells us, that he so long suppressed his history, because he durst not stand the test and censure of the world, while so many persons were yet alive, who were able to disprove him (27). St. Jerom, and several other writers, speak of this history of Justus (28), and observe, that he was no-ways a candid historian, and that he often contradicted point-blank the memoirs or commentaries of Vespasian, Titus, and other generals. We have therefore no cause to regret the loss of such a work. This history is probably different from another done by the same author, containing the lives and reigns of all the Jewish kings, from Moses to the death of young Agrippa (29). This work, which Photius (30) calls a chronicle, was ended in the third year of the reign of Trajan, and is probably what St. Jerom (31) and Suidas (32), who translated it, call Justus's short commentaries. Another writer, by name Antonius Julianus, flourished about this time, and published an account of the Jewish war, and the destruction of Jerusalem. For Minucius Felix, who wrote in defence of the Christian religion in the beginning of the third century, refers the pagans to Antonius Julianus, and to Josephus, telling them, that in the writings of these historians, they will find, that the Jews were not abandoned by God till they had abandoned him; and that they only suffered what they had been forewarned they should suffer, if they continued to disobey his law (33). We find two persons bearing that name mentioned by the ancients, viz. Antonius Julianus, procurator of Judæa, who was with Titus, as Josephus informs us (34), at the siege of Jerusalem; and Antonius Julianus, a native of Spain, and professor of rhetoric at Rome, often quoted and commended by Aulus Gellius, who was one of his disciples (35). He flourished about the middle of the second century, and wrote some rhetorical and grammatical books (36). A history in Hebrew and Latin of the Jewish war has reached our times, done by one Josephus, the son of Gorion, who pretended, it seems, to pass himself upon the world for the celebrated Josephus. But the ablest critics take him to have been a Jew born in Gaul in the seventh century, and his history to be only an abridgment of the Latin translation of Josephus's history, which is commonly ascribed to Rufinus, with the addition of many gross mistakes, and fabulous accounts (37). As for the history of the destruction of Jerusalem, which bears the name of Hegeſippus, it is but a translation of the history of Josephus, wherein the author allows himself a great latitude, retrenching several things, and adding harangues, descriptions, and even some events which he had probably found in other historians. We must not confound this writer, as some have done, with another of the same name, who flourished in the second century, and was a native of Greece, whereas the compiler of Josephus was, as is evident from some passages in his work, quite ignorant of the Greek tongue (38). Besides, he mentions the city of Constantinople, and tells us, that having by degrees eclipsed the cities of Antioch and Alexandria, it was no longer the fourth, but the second, city of the Roman empire (39). It is therefore plain, that he did not write before the reign of Constantine the great, nor even before the end of the fourth century. Vossius is of opinion, that he flourished about the latter end of the tenth century; but the propriety of his expressions, and the elegance and sublimity of his style, are a convincing proof, that he wrote before the total and general decay of learning, that is, before the fifth century. Hence the learned bishop Pearson takes him for an author of the fourth or fifth century (40); and father Mabillon quotes two manuscripts of Hegeſippus's history, both written, as he conjectures from the characters, before the seventh century (41). Gronovius takes St. Ambrose, concealed under the assumed name of Hegeſippus, to be the true author of that history, being induced thereunto by several of St. Ambrose's phrases, which he observed in it (42). But the same phrases are often common to several writers of the same age; and the style of Hegeſippus is, in our opinion, far more easy and proper than that of St. Ambrose, or of Paulinus, Sulpicius Severus, Aper, Eucherius, or Hilarius; for to each of these the work, which bears the name of Hegeſippus, has by some writers been ascribed. To the history of Hegeſippus is annexed an anacephalæosis, or summary of the chief matters contained in it, which by some is thought the work of the same author; but Gronovius speaks of it, and not undeservedly, with great contempt (43). In this summary, and not in the history itself, is found the suppositious letter from Pilate to Tiberius concerning our Saviour. The history of Hegeſippus is quoted by John of Salisbury, who flourished in the twelfth century, and by John of Trittenheim, abbot of Spanheim, in his learned book of ecclesiastical writers; but he, by confounding the author of this work with the above-mentioned Hegeſippus, who flourished in the second century, has led many others into the same mistake (44).

Of Flavius Josephus, the most famous of all the historians who flourished under the princes of the Flavian family, we have already spoken in the several parts of this work; and therefore shall close this note only with a few remarks on his history of the Jewish wars, and the destruction of Jerusalem. This history he composed at Rome, in the reign of Vespasian, in his own language (45), which was much the same with the Syriac, and afterwards translated it into Greek, with the assistance of some persons who were better acquainted with that tongue than he (46). For the knowledge of the several languages was not a thing practised or valued by the Jews, but looked upon as a profane study, the sum of their wisdom and learning consisting in the knowledge of their laws and the right understanding of the scripture (47); which, however, it is plain they never did rightly understand with relation to the Messiah. The Syriac history was immediately dispersed over all the eastern countries, and greedily read by the Arabians, Adiabonians, Babylonians, Parthians, and all the Jews beyond the Euphrates (48). Some copies of this work, which was divided into five books, are still extant (49). The Greek translation proved both troublesome and expensive to him him (50). He divided it into seven book, and did not put the last hand to it before the fifth year of Vespasian's reign; for he mentions the temple of Peace as finished, which was consecrated the following year, the sixth of Vespasian's reign; and ends his history with the death of Catullus, which did not happen, as is evident from Dion Cassius, before that time (51). Josephus closes his history with these words: As for my style, and manner of writing, I submit it to the judgment of the reader; but as to the candour and sincerity of my accounts, I do here declare to the world, that I have kept strictly to truth, and have had nothing else in view throughout the whole work. Of what passed amongst the Romans he was an eye-witness; and learnt of the deserters, who all applied to him, every step taken by the enemy (52). Besides, Titus imparted to him his own commentaries or memoirs (53); so that he was thoroughly acquainted with every thing that happened during the whole time of the war. As soon as he had ended his Greek translation, he presented it to Vespasian, to Titus, to king Agrippa, and to several others who had been eye-witnesses of what he relates (54); which he would never have done, had he been conscious to himself of having swerved in the least from truth. King Agrippa, in sixty-two letters to Josephus, authentically witnessed the candour and sincerity which reigns throughout the whole work (55); and Titus, not satisfied with ordering it to be published, and lodged in the public library, signed, some read transcribed, with his own hand the copy, which was to be placed there as an authentic relation of the Jewish war, and the destruction of Jerusalem (56). Hence Suidas gives to Josephus the title of lover of truth, as peculiar to him (57). But after all, his history is not quite exempt from faults; some of which he himself corrected in the works he afterwards published (58). It was either a deplorable ignorance, or inexcusable flattery, that prompted him to misinterpret the scripture, and apply to Vespasian the prophecy, importing, that in those days a prince should come out of Judæa, who should rule over the whole world; which could be understood of the Messiah alone. Photius speaking of the Greek translation of this history, greatly commends it, even on account of the style, which to him seems easy, proper, and no less elegant than that of the best Greek historians (59); and St. Jerom calls Josephus, the Livy of the Greeks (60). Hence it is evident, that the many obscure passages, odd phrases, and irregular constructions, which are to be met with in this work, ought to be ascribed to the copists, and not to the author. When Josephus had ended his history of the Jewish wars, he undertook the general history of his nation, from the beginning of the world to the twelfth year of the reign of Nero, when the Jews revolted, and strove to shake off the Roman yoke, which was the occasion of their utter ruin. Of this work, which is comprised in twenty books, and was finished by Josephus in the fifty-sixth year of his age, that is, in the thirteenth of Domitian's reign, and towards the end of the ninety-third of the Christian æra, we have spoken in various places of this history; and therefore shall only repeat here, that he frequently contradicts point-blank holy writ; of which the reader will find many instances in father Posssevin's learned Apparatus (61). Of the famous passage concerning our Saviour, we have spoken at length in our history of the Jews (62). To the general history of the Jews, which Josephus himself intituled the Jewish antiquities, tho' brought down to the twelfth year of Nero's reign, he added the particular history of his own life, which he finished before the death of Domitian, that is, before the eighteenth of September of the year 96. of the Christian æra. Eusebius and St. Jerom look upon his life as part of the twentieth book of his antiquities; and likewise upon his books against Apion, as a continuation of the same work (63). Besides the above-mentioned works, a discourse composed by Josephus has reached our times, wherein he shews, that it is in the power of reason to command and subdue the passions: whence the treatise is by some styled, the rule of reason; but by others, the history of the Maccabees, because Josephus describes there at length the glorious death of those illustrious champions. This piece St. Jerom cries up as a most elegant performance (64); and St. Gregory of Nazianzus refers his readers to it for a true and affecting account of the martyrdom of the Maccabees (65). We find Josephus quoted by some ancient writers for things, of which no mention is made in his works which are still extant. Thus Orosius refers us to him for an account of the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius (66); and Origen quotes him as asserting, that the Jews generally ascribed the destruction of Jerusalem, and the ruin of their nation, to their putting unjustly St. James to death (67). Josephus himself promises in his antiquities the history of Monobazes, king of the Adiabeniens (68), of whom nevertheless no farther mention is made in his works which have reached us. Vossius likewise assures, that in the printed copies of Josephus many things have been left out, which he found in the manuscript copies of the ancient Latin translation (69) ascribed by father Posssevin to the celebrated Rufus of Aquileia (70). Josephus, at the end of his antiquities, promises a shorter relation of the Jewish war, and of all that had happened to that unhappy people from the beginning of the said war to the time in which he ended his antiquities, that is, to the 93d year of the Christian æra (71). He likewise proposed writing four books of the opinions of the Jews concerning God and his nature, and of their laws, that he might have an opportunity of informing the world, why by their law some things were allowed them, and others forbidden (72). But neither Eusebius, nor any other writer, mentions these works; which inclines us to believe, that he was prevented by death from executing his design, and that he died about the latter end of Domitian's reign. Photius ascribes to him an anonymous book, Of the substance of the universe (73). Posssevin is of opinion, that he wrote a book on the seventy weeks of Daniel (74); and truly St. Jerom says, that he speaks of them much at length (75), which he does not in any of his works which have been transmitted to us. Josephus lived at Rome from the return of Titus to that city in 71. till his death, which happened about the latter end of Domitian's reign, who was killed in 96. He was highly esteemed and favoured by the three princes of the Flavian family: for Vespasian made him free of the city, lodged him in the house in which he himself had lived before he was emperor, settled upon him a yearly pension, and assigned him certain lands in Judæa. Titus shewed him no less kindness than his father had done;

done; and Domitian, as well as his wife Domitia, conferred on him still greater honours. This drew upon him the hatred of his envious countrymen, by whom several false accusations were brought against him, but he was always declared innocent. In the reign of Vespasian, a Jew, by name Jonathan, being sent to the emperor in chains, for having, at the head of two thousand men, raised great disturbances in Cyrene, declared, that Josephus had assisted him underhand with arms and money. But Vespasian, giving no credit to the calumny, commanded his head to be struck off. Domitian likewise punished with great severity some Jews, and an eunuch, who was tutor to Josephus's son, for falsely informing against him (76). Thus he lived at Rome, highly favoured by the emperors; and was, after his death, honoured by the Roman people with a statue (77).
